Of the subsequent proceedings of the meeting, I need say nothing, except that the refusal to permit even the friends of the movement the privilege of criticism sufficiently exhibits the real intent of Mr. Comstock and his allies, who are "stealing the livery of heaven to serve the devil in," and availing themselves of the popular hatred of obscenity to conceal their crusade against freedom of thought.

Yours respectfully, BENJAMIN R. TUCKER.

Mr. Colgate's Defense.

It seems that a complaint was made against Mr. Samuel Colgate, the President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, for sending through the U. S. mails a pamphlet in regard to vaseline wherein it was spoken of favorably as a preventive when combined with a certain other drug. It is stated, however, that Mr. Colgate pleaded ignorance of the contents of the pamphlet, and the complaint was dismissed. It therefore appears that this plea of ignorance will answer for the President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice when the same plea will not be accepted in other cases coming under the condemnation of this same society. Is this meting out equal justice to high and low? Does it substantiate the statement in the annual report of the society that they proceed with entire impartiality in all cases? We do not care to lengthen this article by mentioning cases, but we certainly know of one wherein ignorance did not save the party prosecuted. We heard of one other from a very authentic source. Furthermore, it is not impertinent to inquire how it happens that the immaculate head of a firm who occupies such an important position as the President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice should not exercise care in revising what he sends out in the way of printed matter when everybody else is expected to do so? The pamphlet referred to was used as freely as any common trade circular. In ordinary cases the one so offending would have been called into court to show whether he was thus offending without knowledge of the contents of his pamphlet, or otherwise. It is unusual in such cases to accept the statement of the party implicated unless sustained by evidence. Why, then, was the case dismissed? Why does not the agent of the society himself take it up and press it against his president with the same heartlessness that he pursues other people quite as good as his president, for the very same offense? Or, is what Rev. Sidney Smith said of such societies generally so soon to be applicable to this young society, that some would join it "to hide a bad character and others whose object is to recommend themselves to their betters by a sedulous and bustling inquisition into the immoralities of the public?"—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Annual Call.

The Pennsylvania Yearly Meeting of Progressive Friends will hold its twenty-sixth annual session at Longwood, Chester Co., Pa., at 10 o'clock A.M. on the second Fifth-day of the sixth month (Thursday, June 13), 1878, to continue two or three days.

We meet to consider the great questions which underlie the present and future well-being of the human race; our duties to each other and to mankind, as equal members of a common brotherhood; to take sweet counsel together how we may best labor, with the lowest as well as with the highest, to bring our lives into harmony with the divine laws of the universe, and kindle in our hearts holy aspirations, and that love for what is pure and beautiful and true which will establish "peace on earth and good will among men."

We welcome all who are earnestly seeking the true meaning of life and its duties.

Longwood is near Rosedale Station, on the Baltimore Central Railroad, about thirty miles southwest from Philadelphia, with which it has connection by three daily trains each way.

JOY AND SORROW.—It is a noticeable fact that while many of the animals nearest to man in degree of intelligence express their pains in distinct vocal utterances, comparatively few seem to utter any sounds of joy or satisfaction. Singing birds are, of course, a striking exception, if, as seems probable, their untiring warblings express sensations of pleasure. In the case of the dog, for example—though, according to Mr. Darwin, he has a special bark for his moments of supreme delight—the sounds of distress and of vexation are much more marked than those of satisfaction. The predominance of sorrowful over joyous utterances in the lower animals is illustrated in the familiar fact that no animal except man is capable of laughing, even though (according to Mr. Darwin) some of the anthropoid apes rise to something like a smile of pleasure. When man is defined or described as the laughing animal, this means not that he laughs more than he weeps, but simply that other creatures do not laugh at all. In man, who has well-marked sounds both for joy and grief, we may trace a similar predominance of painful over pleasurable utterances. It is an old reflection that weeping precedes laughter by a considerable interval in the individual experience. Mr. Darwin tells us that he first observed unambiguous traces of a smile in two of his children when they were forty-five days old, whereas, as every mother knows, new-born infants are wont to greet the world with something indistinguishable from a doleful cry. Adults are not allowed to cry, at least in good society; and with respect to these it is of course true that laughing outweighs crying. But though we are not allowed to cry, we may do a good deal in the way of grumbling, repining, and murmuring. And it is certainly true of a good many of the people we know, that they much oftener complain of the circumstances and events of their lives than express themselves as pleased and satisfied with them.—The Cornhill Magazine.

A. J. Davis' New Book.

In the very friendly notice which THE TRUTH SEEKER gives of A. J. Davis' recent work entitled, "Views of our Heavenly Home," the paragraphist, as is usual with writers and with people generally at this late day, seems to have lost sight of the career and early claims of the noted clairvoyant.

Although the notice of this book in your live journal, Mr. Editor, was no doubt written with the very best and kindest of intentions, it falls into a misapprehension quite prevalent in these days. Allow me therefore to make a needed correction; and at the same time to answer some inquiries I have often received relative to the author's special methods, with which I have had some acquaintance in times past.

In the notice referred to, the following sentence occurs: "It is not a little curious how Mr. Davis ascertains with so much accuracy about the geography and topography of the heavenly country in the vicinity of the 'milky way' that he can make maps, and sketch designs of its hills, lakes, rivers, etc."

Readers of the author under consideration have no doubt observed that he never conjectures, assumes theories; nor has he much regard for accepted science, which to his clairvoyant vision is manifestly erroneous. In his advocacy of the harmonial philosophy, he is very much in earnest seeking truth for truth's sake, and if he can offer nothing but theory or speculation as is common with scientific investigators in many departments of science, he prefers to be silent.

It is well known that his method of investigating a subject is entirely unlike that practiced by scientific men. It is especially peculiar, and as a phase of mind it demands the attention of all students of mental philosophy. It is as much a matter of impersonal justice that we respect the exercise of this highest and most wonderful faculty of the mind, as it is that we respect the more ordinary step by step process of reasoning. For it anticipates discovery, corroborates ascertained scientific truth, and it would subserve research in every domain in nature were its claims appreciated and duly employed. But the higher phase of clairvoyance is not yet accepted, not yet recognized by scientific men, nor will it be so long as they look upon it as a show, as a curiosity, as an amusement, and not as a mental process inherent in man. And so long as they strive to coerce it into external methods and commercial uses just so long will it evade their acquaintance. They have found it to be an uncompromising faculty and found also that they cannot bring it into subjection nor manipulate its powers successfully to meet them on their own ground. Hence they reject it as unreliable.

A quarter of a century ago, this specialty of Mr. Davis in the use of this faculty of the mind—which he claims is common to all men but still rarely unfolded in this life—was the subject of discussion in every journal and in almost every civilized country on the globe. Since a great part of the then existing generation has passed away, and new events obliterate the past, his faculty of clairvoyance with its wonderful exercise and revelations seems to have been forgotten to a great extent, as all things are apt to be forgotten by the ever-changing, ever-passing people the mass of whom are not readers nor students. But the really investigating mind can find all relating to it still on record, and if he be one who leaves no stone unturned in his research will find a psychological mine that will richly repay the toil of a careful study.

The mathematician who has been accustomed to daily exercise of his special talent, the musician or artist who has been constant in the devotion and study of his art, ultimately attains to a wonderful degree of perfection, skill, and rapidity of execution. It is so with the author to whom reference is made. Clairvoyance has been no easy-going, indolent, amusing, or trifling matter with him, but the perfect exercise of this faculty is the result, after its first offering, of earnest, constant, systematic labor. He has been as devoted, and as hard a worker in this department of mind, as even Humboldt, Beethoven, LeVerrier, or Raphael were in their special labors. It has never been a hap-hazard thing with him; but his present attainment has been the result of careful, studious, and persevering labor, not only for its perfect development, but for its true and legitimate use. No student in mathematics has ever labored more faithfully or perseveringly in his realm of research than this author has in the realm of mind for which he is noted.

And this labor of half a century may well claim the attention of thinking minds, and of the scientific world as the labor of other students command it in other departments of research and inquiry.

No doubt "it is a little curious how he ascertains with so much accuracy" about matters in the other life, especially when we lose sight of the vast and varied interior experience he has had. This has been literally encyclopediac. The public would be surprised—amazed—did it know how persistently, and with what tireless perseverence and skill he verifies new facts which he had ascertained, traces causes to their ultimates or the reverse before he puts them on record. The objection which many people—and among them scientific men as well—have to some things he has stated is, that he investigates by a mental process, unacknowledged by accepted authority; but by virtue of this process he has really penetrated into the hidden or interior realms of nature and mind vastly further than they have done who criticise. Hence to the external mind, his statement of truth and pure law appears to be incomprehensible or impossible. Notwithstanding this prevailing tendency of the general mind to disregard the claims of the harmonial philosophy, the convictions of our author move him, as they move the astronomer, to relate what he has actually seen by the telescope of clairvoyance, and by virtue of this specialty we should accord him a full and candid hearing. It will be seen on investigation that many of these statements made thirty years ago have been only recently verified by advanced scientific research.

As to the "geography and topography of the heavenly country in the vicinity of the 'milky way,'" he does not claim that the sketches given are accurate in detail, like the sketches and geographical maps of our earth, but they are only comparative representations—something to give a remote idea, it may be, but still a realizing sense of its naturalness, as a realm of arisen humanity.

He says that "inasmuch as you cannot conceive of the existence of a physical world of matter in which is 'no matter,' but only a sensation or an illusion of the mind, so you cannot conceive of 'another world' without its own appropriate sceneries, continents, climates, societies, religions, governments," etc., hence he has attempted to give sketches, maps, and diagrams, which he himself refers to in one place in his book as "quite imperfectly set forth," but still the attempt was to delineate what exists—what he actually saw—a positive entity or reality in the other life. He is not an artist, but the rude sketches given, he thought, might serve to make the description more realistic, even at the sacrifice of proportions, finish, or of a photographic accuracy. Neither could any engraver, from any verbal description, catch the exalted view as he witnessed it; nor could the author convey to the artist the unspeakable grandeur of the scene. Hence the artist necessarily fails here to reproduce the scene with any sort of accuracy. Still the author felt that, however short a coarse wood-cut might fall of the reality, it would convey a sense of naturalness to the mind of the reader, which mere words would fail to do.

The paragraph quoted speaks of "the heavenly country in the vicinity of the milky way." Such is not exactly the language of the author, and is like speaking of our sun as being in the vicinity of the little asteroids, Pallas or Vesta—making the main object the inferior. The milky way, as we see it, is only the receding edge view of our irregularly-shaped stratum of stars—the star-field to which we belong. As vast and as much beyond comprehension as this star-field is, it is but a drop in the ocean of similar star-fields, strung as on a belt of contiguous clusters, around the immensity of space. This belt is the outmost of concentric systems, and he terms it the sixth circle of suns. Far within this almost infinite circle, and parallel or concentric with it is the measureless zone—the divine Summer-Land—to which all mankind are traveling.

As will be seen by reference to a diagram on page 115 of his book, the Spirit Land is shown or represented just below the star-fields marked M. It is an edge view, but it is a continuous zone, while the star-fields are made up of individual globes. Hence the extent of surface on the zone is incalculably greater than that of all the suns and planets combined.

On a subject so vast and all-comprehending as this necessarily is, it is difficult, not only to make it clear, in the space of a few paragraphs, but it is also difficult to set before the reader a clear explanation of the author's peculiar methods of research into this boundless realm, or into nature's interior domain, where reside the causes of all the organized phases of matter by which we are surrounded. This can be found in extenso in his published works.

It is to be regretted that the comprehensive record of his investigations is not more thoroughly studied by those who desire to know more of the material and spiritual evolutions that environ us. Those who read those records in a kindly spirit—who are teachable and are actuated by a spirit of simple truth rather than by an ambition to criticise or to substitute a theory which has not the excuse of a possible realization—will find a marvelous storehouse of golden sheaves laid up by the faithful industry of this peculiar student of nature.

Denouncing Mediums.

At a meeting of Spiritualists, held in the parlors of the Third Unitarian church, of Chicago, Wednesday, May 22d, the following resolutions with regard to Messrs. Bastian and Taylor, and also with reference to mediums in general, were adopted with but a single dissenting vote:

WHEREAS, A respectful request has been made to Bastian and Taylor by a large number of those interested in the investigation of spirit phenomena that, in view of the many recent exposures of professed mediums, and of the doubts and disbeliefs excited in the public mind as to the genuineness of any form of materializations, and in justice to themselves as professional mediums, and to the cause they profess to regard, they would give a series of test seances, that their exhibitions might be observed under conditions affording accuracy of observation, and which reasonable request Messrs. Bastian and Taylor have refused to grant; and,

WHEREAS, Truth always should seek and submit the most thorough and searching investigation; therefore, be it

Resolved, That in our opinion, their refusal to satisfy the just demands of the Spiritualists of Chicago, is presumptive evidence of practices upon their part, which will not bear investigation.

Resolved, That we will not give countenance, encouragement, or support to Bastian and Taylor until they give evidence of the validity of their claim, as they have been requested to do; and we recommend to all Spiritualists throughout the United States that they discountenance them, lest the large and deserving class who follow the vocation of mediumship and the cause shall suffer from their final exposure which is sure to follow.

Resolved, That the daily papers of this city and the publications devoted to Spiritualism throughout the United States be requested to publish these resolutions.

A Challenge.

The following was sent by Judge Worcester, a gentleman widely known in Illinois, to the Hon. George R. Wendling. All papers friendly to the Liberal cause will confer a favor by copying:

WHITEHALL, ILL., May 15, 1878.

Hon. Geo. R. Wendling, Shelbyville, Ill., Dear Sir: During the past few months the papers have contained frequent notices of your lecture in defense of Christianity from a secular or worldly point of view. By associating your name with that of Col. Ingersoll, a man of national reputation, and professing to answer his arguments against the Christian theology, you have acquired some prominence and become quite a favorite among a class of clergymen and their adherents who feel their own utter inability to reply to Ingersoll in a way to command attention. Your lecture has secured you some reputation and put money in your pocket, showing indeed that 'Godliness is great gain," even now, in spite of the encroachments of the new ideas on the old theology.

Now, sir, since you have seen fit to leave your profession for the honors and profits of the public rostrum, and become a 'defender of the faith,' we propose that you give the public an opportunity to judge as to the truthfulness of your positions and the strength of your arguments in a debate, when a competent representative of Liberalism can have an opportunity to expose your fallacies, or you to show the impregnable character of the faith you defend. We respectfully challenge you to a public oral debate with B. F. Underwood, of Massachusetts, on the subjects discussed in your lecture, the same to last as long as you desire, to take place in Whitehall, and to be reported verbatim. I am authorized by Mr. Underwood if you accept this challenge to make arrangements in his behalf. The debate may take place at such time as can be mutually agreed upon.

By an early reply, you will greatly oblige

Yours respectfully, L. E. WORCESTER.

We clip the following from The Winsted Press:

Dr. S. B. Chase, homœopathic physician of New York City, whose arrest at the instance of Anthony Comstock for selling two female syringes we noted last week, has been given an honorable acquittal by the Grand Jury of the city and county of New York, which sends word to her to prosecute Comstock for damages for false imprisonment and injury to her business. This is good news, as evidence of returning reason on the part of the officials of New York, and proof that Mrs. Chase in selling her syringes and advocating their use has violated no law. We hope she will sell more of them, and will add that her address is 56, West 33d St., N. Y. City. But Mrs. Chase's good fortune cannot bring back justice (and lost life in many cases) nor reputation blasted by libel, to the scores of Comstock's victims, who though innocent of all crime have suffered imprisonment and disgrace in consequence of his abominable outrages. The people should not rest until the law is so changed as to protect innocent and defenseless people from possible oppression by Comstock and his fellow Inquisitors. A petition is now before Congress praying for a change. Keep an eye upon it.

The Principles and Objects of the Newark, N. J., Liberal League.

The ultimate object and aim of our organization is the complete emancipation of mankind from error—error of early education, error of preconceived opinion, and error of inheritance, which, if left to time only, will require ages to eradicate.

We recognize ignorance to be the impassable barrier between man and liberty—liberty of thought, liberty of action, and liberty of conscience, which also prevents the free enjoyment of all life's pleasures that are the common inheritance of man.

We hold that ignorance, bigotry, and intolerance, are synonymous terms, that the last two are the natural result of the existence of the first, and that ignorance is not only found among the masses but prevails in different degrees in and among the so-called "educated classes," hence we recognize the great necessity of organization in order to cope successfully with error.

We have therefore formed a society which, as its name indicates, will endeavor to embrace all liberal-minded persons without regard to race, color, or previous condition of mental servitude, and with a broad free platform that all men can stand upon whose prejudices do not blind them to the truth.

We propose to make our organization a place of education, where the human mind can be instructed in the truths of science and natural laws, freed from all creeds and superstitious dogmas, in fact, a school where we, as grown up children, may learn the intricate road to true happiness through those attributes of the universe, justice, wisdom, and truth.

We hold that the most direct and surest way to that condition of happiness called heaven is through true enlightenment and education based upon science, philosophy and reason, and by these means man will eventually emancipate himself and his fellowmen from mental, political, and social slavery, and will gradually bring him nearer to the all controlling principle of the universe.

These are our objects and our aims, and we invite all persons, young and old, to cooperate with us in our efforts to free ourselves and our fellow-men and women from the slavery of ignorance and error.

Free Love.

THE SPECIAL CONVENTION OF THE NEW ENGLAND FREE LOVE LEAGUE met in Paine Hall Building, Appleton St., Boston, Sunday and Monday, May 26th and 27th, at 10:30 A. M., 2.30 and 7.30 P. M., each day. E. H. Heywood, Secretary, presented the following resolutions:

Whereas, it is alleged by certain members of the City Government of Boston that by the bare fact of admission fees towards expenses being demanded and taken at the door a public meeting becomes a private assembly for amusement, like a theatre or circus, and as such requires to be specially licensed by municipal authority which thereby presumes to say what meetings may be held and what opinions may be expressed within the city limits; and whereas, in face of the fact that the meetings of this League, as of all other reform associations, are avowedly unlicensed and admission fees at the door, when deemed necessary to defray expenses, have always been taken by other reformatory, religious and philanthropic assemblies, certain members of the Board of Aldermen usurped illegal, unconstitutional and arbitrary power to suppress a Convention of this League advertised to be held in Nassau Hall, April 14th and 15th, 21st and 22d, last; therefore

Resolved, That the meetings of the New England Free Love League are described in the nineteenth article of the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights and are held under the guarantee of that article and of article seventh.

Resolved, That if, which is here denied, any existing laws or ordinances of the city of Boston authorize officers to assimilate meetings of the Free Love League to theatrical entertainments, circuses, or other amusements, or require the League to take out a license for its meetings, such laws are in violation of the Bill of Rights and Constitution of Massachusetts, and hence are null and void.

Resolved, That since certain Aldermen of Boston, against law, custom, and precedent, have invaded the natural and constitutional right of the people "orderly and peaceably to assemble and consult for the common good," and have assailed the sacred right of Free Speech in the person of Angela T. Heywood, a member and officer of this League, its Executive Committee are hereby authorized by legal process, if possible to obtain a decision of the Supreme Court on the whole question, and to take such other means of redress as may seem advisable and necessary.

Resolved, That asserting Freedom of Conscience in love and the Right of Private Judgment in morality we seek the abolition of marriage by legal and constitutional means, favoring no measures or practices inconsistent with sound morals or intelligently pure religion; that parties capable of making sexual contracts are, when wiser by experience, capable of dissolving such contracts in order that healthful, prosperous and fruitful union of the sexes be promoted, and that most sacred of human rights, the right of children to be well conceived and well born be respected.

Resolved, That the prosecution of "Cupid's Yokes," "Sexual Physiology" and "Fruits of Philosophy" in Federal and State courts and the pretended aversion to social-reform writings as "obscene literature" reveal the morbid sensualism now accepted as moral; that, whatever lewd law-makers and the invasive ignorance of judges and jurors may decree to the contrary, we shall continue to proclaim the redeeming gospel and practical religion of Free Love until the grave issues of sociology are brought within the domain of reason and moral obligation.

Resolved, That since the Federal "obscenity" statutes and all State laws against so-called "obscene literature" restricting liberty of speech and press, invade thought, hinder social progress and enable inquisitorial bigots to persecute more intelligent people, we seek their immediate and unconditional repeal; in order that freedom of conscience, of reason, and growth in love and parentage, as in religion, may be held sacred and inviolate.

Resolved, That the lasciviously false reports which Anthony Comstock makes of the opinions, expressions, and purposes of members of this League to clerical and congressional committees and the favors with which his lecherous lies are received indicate the mental depravity of those in Church and State who employ this . . . . . to supervise the morals of intelligent people; and until men become responsible gentlemen in bestowing the life element they possess, statutes against preventing conception, or which may otherwise invade the natural right of woman to say what she shall or shall not do with such life element—Nature's best gift received by her through man—are repulsive to good sense and at war with the Nature of Things.

Resolved, That since what is now accepted as "government" is an irresponsible expression of Heism, having no basis in right and repulsive to growing intelligence, questions of love, as of labor and religion, should be considered in the light of impersonal truth, irrespective of sex; that woman's revolt against male usurpation (of which the suffrage movement is but one phase) is a struggle to regain her now confiscated personality, for her spiritual, industrial, and social emancipation, when liberty will indeed be the bride of Order, and Free Love become the beneficent Providence in human affairs.

SPRINGFIELD HYGEIAN HOME.

That others may know more of what we are trying to do, I will simply state that during the three years we have been here nearly 1,000 persons have been successfully treated by us for a great variety of diseases, both acute and chronic, including Fever and Ague, Congestive Chills, Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Neuralgia, Female diseases, Insanity, Consumption, Inflammatory Rheumatism, White Swellings, Paralysis, etc. But one death occurred in all that number, and every one benefited or permanently cured where the laws of life were strictly adhered to. With a fair trial, where cure is possible, we may safely promise good health to all. Please state definitely the nature and probable cause of your disease, when contracted, age, amount of drugs taken, etc., and we will give you an honest reply as to the probability of recovery.

For circular and other information, please address J. S. LYON, M.D., Springfield, Mo., Box 247. 4t

Gems of Thought.

A MASK of gold hides all deformities.—Decker

I AM sorry to see how small a piece of religion will make a cloak.—Waller.

REPENTANCE clothes in grass and flowers the grave in which the past is laid.—Sterling.

NO REPROACH is like that we clothe in a smile and present with a bow.—Lytton.

OUR greatest glory consists not in never falling, but in rising every time we fall.—Goldsmith.

REPUTATION is what men and women think of us. Character is what God and angels know of us.—Thomas Paine.

WHEN man seized the loadstone of science, the loadstar of superstition vanished in the clouds.—W. R. Alger.

THE purest treasure mortal times afford is spotless reputation; that away, men are but gilded loam or painted clay.—Shakspere.

NOTHING exposes religion more to the reproach of its enemies than the worldliness and hard-heartedness of the professors of it.—Matthew Henry.

SUFFERING becomes beautiful when any one bears great calamities with cheerfulness, not through insensibility, but through greatness of mind.—Aristotle.

THE severest punishment of any injury is the consciousness of having done it; and no one but the guilty knows the withering pains of repentance.—Hosea Ballou.

A PAIR reputation is a plant, delicate in its nature, and by no means rapid in its growth. It will not shoot up in a night, like the gourd of the prophet; but, like that gourd, it may perish in a night.—Taylor.

SCIENCE corrects the old creeds, sweeps away with every new perception, our infantile catechisms, and necessitates a faith commensurate with the grander orbits and universal laws which it discloses.—Emerson.

THE faith that does not throw a warmth as of summer around the sympathies and charities of the heart, and drop invigorations like showers upon the conscience and the will, is as false as it is unsatisfying.—Paul Potter.

RESENTMENT is, in every stage of the passion, painful, but it is not disagreeable unless in excess; pity is always painful, yet always agreeable; vanity, on the contrary, is always pleasant, yet always disagreeable.—Home.

I BELIEVE that remorse is the least active of all a man's moral senses. We grieve at being found out, and at the idea of shame or punishment, but the mere sense of wrong makes very few people unhappy in Vanity Fair.—Thackeray.

TRUE religion is always mild, propitious, and humble; plays not the tyrant, plants no faith in blood, nor bears destruction on her chariot-wheels; but stoops to polish, succor, and redress, and builds her grandeur on the public good.—Miller.

I HAVE heard a good story of Charles Fox. When his house was on fire, he found all efforts to save it useless, and being a good draughtsman, he went up to the next hill to make a drawing of the fire—the best instance of philosophy I ever heard of.—Southey.

BE stirring as the time, be fire with fire, threaten the threatener, and out-face the brow of bragging horror; so shall inferior eyes, that borrow their behavior from the great, grow great by your example and put on the dauntless spirit of resolution.—Shakspere.

TRUE resignation, which always brings with it the confidence that unchangeable goodness will make even the disappointment of our hopes and the contradictions of life conducive to some benefit, casts a grave but tranquil light over the prospect of even a toilsome and troubled life.—Humboldt.

PAIN and pleasure, good and evil, come to us from unexpected sources. It is not there where we have gathered up our brightest hopes that the dawn of happiness breaks. It is not there where we have glanced our eye with affright that we find the deadliest gloom. What should this teach us? To bow to the great and only source of light, and live humbly and with confiding resignation.—Goethe.

EVERY duty brings its peculiar delight, every denial its appropriate compensation, every thought its recompense, every love its elysium, every cross its crown; pay goes with performance as effect with cause. Meanness overreaches itself; vice vitiates whoever indulges in it; the wicked wrong their own souls; generosity greatens; virtue exalts; charity transflures; and holiness is the essence of angelhood.—Mildmay.

ALL the ends of human felicity are secure without revenge, for without it we are permitted to restore ourselves; and therefore it is against natural reason to do an evil that no way co-operates the proper and perfective end of human nature. And he is a miserable person whose good is the evil of his neighbor; and he that revenges in many cases does worse than he that did the injury; in all cases as bad.—Jeremy Taylor.

IF there was no death, no decay in man before the fall, what need had Adam to eat of the fruits of the garden? We eat and sleep to replenish and recuperate, to renew what is lost, wasted, or dead; therefore Adam could not have been flesh and blood like ourselves, since there was no death in him, and consequently he could never have experienced hunger, want, or pain as these are but forerunners of decay and death.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

FRIEND—A Quaker.

TOO MUCH heed is loss.

"A WANT of the age"—Hair.

A LION'S skin is never cheap.

MINT'S meat—Gold and silver.

CLEAR wether—Mutton chops.

A KNEADY individual—A baker.

MATTERS of interest—Coupons.

HARD to beat—the spring carpet.

BEHIND time—the back of a clock.

FAMILY jars are often caused by jugs.

ONE frog is sufficient to make a spring.

THERE is a "Ring in the New" silver dollar.

THE fashionable new color in cats is yeller.

THE early bud catches the frost.—Norristown Herald.

WHEN is a prisoner like a gun? When he is discharged.

A MUFF—A thing that holds a lady's hand without squeezing it.

ALMOST anybody can send a boy on an errand, but only the wealthy have leisure to spare to wait for him to get back.

PASSENGER (in a hurry)—"Is this train punctual?" Porter—"Yes, sir; generally a quarter of an hour late to a minute."

SCHOOL mistress—"Now, what are the principal things we get out of the earth?" Youthful angler (confidently)—"Worms."

SCANDALOUS remark by the Cincinnati Breakfast Table—"The phonograph will probably be called 'she,' because it repeats everything."

JOHN LOVE, of Missouri, worked all summer for a farmer—well, the savings banks were setting a bad example, and Love's labor was lost.

EARLY to bed and early to rise makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise; but early to ryes and tardy to bed makes a man's nose turn cardinal red.

THE letter was to his mother: "DEAR MA: Send me a clean pair of socks and something to eat; also a clean handkerchief and something to eat."

"WHAT made you steal that waterproof cloak?" demanded the judge. The culprit whispered: "I was trying to lay up something for a rainy day."

A YOUNG lady was undecided whether to accept the addresses of James or John. James gave her a sealskin sacque, and she immediately gave the sack to John.

LITTLE Ned asked his father, the other evening, who made the moon. "God," answered the father. "Yes," said Ned, "I can see the marks of his dirty fingers.

BANKERS generally roll their hard money in papers, and make it look like so many spools. We rolled our hard money up the other day, and it looked like a button.

FOND FATHER—Well, my son, how do you like college? Alma Mater has turned out some great men." Young hopeful (just expelled)—"Yes, sir; she has turned me out."

"HOW DOES the new cow answer?" asked one man of another, who had recently purchased an animal. "I really can't say," he replied, for I've never asked her any questions."

AN enthusiastic Indiana editor wrote, "The battle is now opened;" but, alas! the intelligent compositor spelt battle with an "o," and his readers say they have suspected it all along.

SPRING THOUGHTS.—Mary (reading from Tennyson): "In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love." Carrie—"Yes, and he might have said a maiden's too."

"WHY didn't you put on a clean collar before you left home?" called out an impertinent young fop to an omnibus driver. "'Cause your mother hadn't sent home my washing," was the extinguishing reply.

NEW TO HIM.—The other day the professor of German asked an unregenerate junior what the gender of a certain noun was. The junior quickly replied, "I think it is neuter, sir; at any rate, it is neu-ter me."

"DOES your sister Annie ever say anything about me, sissy?" asked an anxious lover of a little girl. "Yes," was the reply; "she said if you had rockers on your shoes they would make a nice cradle for my doll."

SHE COULDN'T DO IT.—It must have been a Western school where the mistress told one of her big girls to "decline love." The big girl replied, "Decline love, Miss Jones? Not me; I'd as soon think of declining marriage."

IN San Francisco a Chinaman became the father of an American-born son, and as he danced about, swinging his pigtail, he said: "Me Melican man, all same old Glantee. Me heap Washington. Me lightning-lod agent. Go 'way. Whoopee."

"JOHN," said a poverty-stricken man to his son, "I've made my will to-day." "Ah," replied John, "you were liberal to me, no doubt." "Yes, John, I came down handsome. I've willed you the whole State of New York to make a living in, with the privilege of going elsewhere if you can do better."

ADVERTISING is a good thing, but when a prominent grocer recently carried to a funeral an umbrella on which was painted conspicuously the business of the house, and held it over the clergyman's head while he read the prayers, the bystanders thought he was running the thing into the ground.

Notes and Clippings.

MARTIN MORAN, of Covington, Ky., challenges any one to compete with him in fasting.

Brain, a journal of neurology, is to be published quarterly by MacMillan & Co. of London.

A THREE-YEAR old girl was almost fatally beaten in the Louisville Baptist Orphan's Home.

THERE is proof that Hathaway, the Fall River thief, commenced his defalcations on the day after he was elected Treasurer of the mills.

A TEXAS clergyman preached a severe sermon against horse-racing, and before he was through three of the four deacons had quit the house.

THE Socialistic press of Germany boasts no less than seventy-five publications, with 135,000 subscribers—an increase of eighteen in the number of the papers since last year.

A PRETTY schoolmistress in Malden, Mass., kept a boy fifteen minutes after school as a punishment, and when the time was up he asked her if she couldn't make it half an hour.

"ALL flesh is grass," remarked a dry preacher, in the midst of a wearisome discourse, "Then I guess you're hay," half-audibly observed a sleepy fellow in one of the wall pews.

THE Pope has asked the European governments to protect the rights of Roman Catholics in Turkey. Now is the time for the European governments to request the pope to protect the rights of Protestants in Spain.

THE sun-moving Jasper is laid completely in the shade by the Rev. Moses Boyles, of Evansville, Ind., who is lecturing on the records of the African race, whom he holds were the originators of all civilization, science, and art; and, of course, he proves it by the Bible.

BOSTON has a new religious idea. An immense non-denominational church is to be built. It is to be open to all and free from sectarianism. The cost will be $200,000, which amount is to be raised by $500 subscriptions.

IF a man is to be baptized it ought to be done thoroughly. The other day a convert was immersed, and when he went home he took with him the minister's pocketbook. If he had been held under water for half an hour this accident would never have occurred.

"BE a good boy and don't break your mother's heart, for then you will be an orphan in an asylum, where you would have to listen to a couple of sermons on Sunday, and two or three during the week," said his mother, and that boy has been good ever since.

IT seems to be settled that Bishop McCoskry, of Michigan, was guilty of the licentiousness with which he was charged. He has resigned his bishopric, and will seek obscurity in Europe. He belongs to a Church which does not sustain the doctrines of Beecher.

SAMUEL ANGIER CHACE and George T. Hathaway, the Fall River defaulters, have been indicted. It remains to be seen whether justice, once so sternly impartial in Massachusetts, is ready to mete out their deserts to thieves who have stolen their millions, and wrecked scores of industrious families.

MR. EDISON'S latest invention is "the Telescopophone," or Megaphone. It is an ear-trumphet, by the use of which ordinary conversation has been heard a mile off, and shouting at a distance of two miles. Deaf persons may likewise go to the theatre with the telescopophone and hear the slightest whispers on the stage.

IN a church festival in Newbury, Mo., meals were sold at a dollar apiece at two long tables. A fine repast was served at one table by negro waiters, while at the other exceedingly plain fare was dispensed by the prettiest girls in the village. The choice was a hard one to make, and the eaters were about evenly divided. The pastor ate plain food.

THE alarming rapidity with which shortsightedness is increasing among German students, formed the subject of a recent debate in the German Parliament. From extended observations made in the Gymnasia, it appears that the number of the shortsighted increases from twenty-three per cent in the first year to seventy-five per cent in the ninth or last year. The too frequent custom in Germany of forcing lads to study during the evenings with insufficient light, in ill-ventilated rooms, is undoubtedly the main cause of this widespread evil.

WHILE Joseph Cook was lecturing on marriage in Boston the other night, he quoted from a newly published work defending polygamy, and, closing it, he threw it upon a chair next to that occupied by Bronson Alcot. Mr. Alcot thrust the book upon the floor with a slam, and Mr. Cook added to the sensational episode by placing his foot upon the volume, and declaring it fit only to be thus degraded.

THE hoax of the Cardiff Giant, according to the Popular Science Monthly, was the outgrowth of a heated argument between George Hull, a Binghamton tobacconist, and Rev. Mr. Turle regarding the former existence of giants. The clergyman argued that the Bible gave affirmative proof. Hull retorted that people were gullible about anything in support of which Scripture could be quoted, and that idea suggested the fraud that subsequently became notorious.

IN a communication to the Academy of Sciences, St. Petersburg, Mr. Magnus Nyren, of the Observatory, Pulkowa, states that the great earthquake on the coast of South America, in May of last year, was perceptible at Pulkowa, by a tremor of the instrument with which he was observing the passage of a star; that the tremor continued sufficiently long to be satisfactorily verified, and that there was no disturbance in the neighborhood by which it could have been occasioned.

THE recent attempt of Prof. Hughes, in London, to establish his claim as the discoverer of the microphone, has drawn from Mr. Edison the exposure of the Professor's pretensions which appeared in the Sun. Mr. Edison says that the so-called wonderful microphone, that transmits a sound as light as the step of a fly, is nothing but a very delicate telephone; that the essential principle of the microphone was patented by him over six months ago in England, so that Prof. Hughes might have discovered the microphone in the Patent Office; Mr. Edison also shows that Prof. Preece, to whom Prof. Hughes expressed his acknowledgments for aid, has long been in possession of a telephone, and in June and July last was shown all the wonders of Menlo Park laboratory.

LORD ROSEBERY presided lately at the annual meeting of the Sunday Society, which advocates the opening of the national museums and picture galleries on Sunday. Two centuries ago, he said, the Puritans found a Sunday where, after church, innocent recreation was allowed. With the best intentions in the world, they took away everything but the church, to which modern civilization has added the tap-room. Lord Rosebery further said that the Puritans had left first the inheritance of the morals of the Restoration, and what has been far more permanent and abiding, the great inheritance of cant. This is what the members of the Sunday Society have to fight against. They would not close the public houses on Sunday, but they would open the national museums and art galleries, which are the people's own property.

A CURIOUS phenomenon, says a French scientific journal, has been observed at Vernon, in France. Five or six years ago lightning struck a garden planted with gooseberry bushes and cherry trees, making a deep hole, the orifice of which was not above a yard in diameter. Subsequently everything died round about. The death circle enlarged year by year, until it is now about eight yards in diameter, and has just reached a cherry tree planted twelve years ago, which has died like the rest. The gooseberry bushes which were replanted on the spot died in two years. The cause of the evil was evidently the lightning, but it is difficult to explain why its morbid action continues, and sterility gains ground. The lightning possibly generated in the soil chemical compounds injurious to vegetation, or burned the humus.

A CONGREGATIONAL church in Connecticut, not far east of New Haven, is suffering for the want of a pastor, but is exceedingly difficult to please. The salary was $1,000, but has been roduced to $800. For over a year this church has been engaged in the business of hearing candidates, and has had a great variety, principally of young men. One of these young men, not exactly pleasing nor yet displeasing the people, was invited to preach a second time, and then a third. After his third Sunday of service he asked the committee if it was probable that he would be asked again. They told him they could not tell. "Then," said he, "I guess I will have to keep on candidating somewhere else. This is the seventy-first time I have preached as a candidate, and I'm getting used to it."

THE Rev. Leonard Woolsey Bacon has been severely handling the managements of some of the so-called Benevolent Societies, especially of those which have recently been holding their anniversaries. He says that their plan of organization is such that the society is practically non-existent, as it never meets and never acts. The officers of the society are a close corporation, and irresponsible to public sentiment, except as they work on that sentiment by the preparation of a fulsome official report setting forth their good deeds. He says that there is so little voting done by the members of these societies that the boards of each really manage the whole thing, and thus perpetuate themselves in office, and that by skillful manipulation a handful of donors might come to an election, and possess themselves of the whole concern.

REMEMBER THE SABBATH DAY.—The Scotch are an exceedingly pious people, as every one knows; but I never properly understood the depth and practical character of their unco' guidness until a recent visit to the Land of Lorne. To oblige a bibulous friend, I overcame my scruples, and entered a public house one Saturday afternoon. On looking around I was much struck with the unusual spectacle of several illuminated cards hung from various coigns of vantage, each bearing the injunction, "Remember the Sabbath day." I admiringly contemplated the fat, jolly, and prosperous, yet evidently religious proprietor, until my friend drew my attention to the number of bottles that were being filled and taken away by serious-looking Scotch of both sexes; and then the true meaning of this Scriptural admonition flashed upon me—the pot-house was closed on Sundays.—Truth.

AT a recent socialistic meeting in Germany, a workingman's wife used the following plain and truthful language: "We are preached to about our beloved Fatherland. Where is it? Has a workingman a Fatherland that he can love? The workingman's Fatherland is where he can get bread; and there is many a workingman in Germany who can find no bread. This is true of other countries also; and the Fatherland of the workingman is the wide world. The working people of the whole world are a family of brothers and sisters; let us workingwomen take care, above all, that our children are not sent to make war and to kill the children of our sisters. We are preached to, also, about religion; but what has the workingman to do with religion? Has the good God in whom we have trusted so long ever done anything for us? The Christian religion has existed for nineteen centuries, and how much better off are we for it? Working women, let us turn our backs upon religion and insist that our children at school shall no longer learn it. Let us demand that they shall learn true science and morality."

ALL the New York papers (with one exception) think the Silver law was a very vicious thing, and that it ought to have done a great deal of harm before this time; and, although they cannot see that it has done any harm, they still regard it as a very uncanny spectre. The Tribune expresses its surprise to see that gold is coming into this country; that, whereas, in June of last year, the net exports of specie amounted to $5,371,262, and in May to $12,956,550, yet in the six weeks ending June 8th, this year, there has been exported from New York as much silver as gold and imported four times as much gold as there has been exported. From this net import of over a million a week in gold it argues prosperity, and thinks that the credit of the country is improving, and that gold will still further fall. This result is so different from its predictions, which were, that if the Silver bill passed gold would flee the country and rise to "abont 111," that the Tribune, which is generally able and candid, ought now publicly to confess its mistake, and declare what is perfectly well known, that the remonetization of silver was a national benefit and blessing.—Graphic.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"Are you sure, Myra, your friends would be willing for me to hear the letters?" said Edith.

"Of course they would, you conscientious, scrupulous old goose you. Rose isn't one of the prudish, mock-modest sentimentalists; she is plain, sensible, and practical. Refined, true, and ladylike, but not forever blushing, casting down her eyes, talking of her sensibility and all that. She is a real woman all over, and she has a heart overflowing with love, sympathy, and tenderness, and is not ashamed to let it be known either. She says the day has gone by when all letters wound up with the formula, 'Don't show this to anybody for the world,' though it was only a simple statement of the health and condition of the weather. But just go on with your sewing, Edith, and listen while I read the letter;' and so while her friend plied the busy needle, Myra read as follows:

"DEAR FRIEND NORMAN: I know you think it has been a long time since I wrote you any Tennessee news, but my eyes have been too weak to allow of my reading or writing. However, this morning I received such a nice letter from your Rose, that I drop you a line simply to inclose it, and I know it will please you to read the appreciative words she has written about you. 'Do as you would be done by' is sound advice, and in following it I send this to you. Rose will not care, for she is so soon intending to give you all of herself, she will not mind my forestalling her a bit by sending you one more peep into the secret chambers of her heart's record. It might be too much for you to get her all at once, so this will help divide the blessing! If I were a man and Rose were not an Infidel, I should be tempted to try and cut you out, for I never saw a girl I liked half so well.'

"The rest is of no importance," said Myra, "so I'll let it go, and read dear, darling Rose's," and she opened the inclosure and read:

"MY DEAR, DEAR FRIEND EMMA: You may think it strange that I have written so little to you about your old acquaintance, Mr. Norman Leonard, but I presume he has told you of our correspondence and mutual affection, and all that. I have been so busy that I have neglected all my far-off friends in the letter line, save him; but I am going to give you the whole story in a nut-shell, in answer to your question as to how my romance comes on. You remember our agreement, that last nice long talk we had under the great walnut-tree beyond the factory, when we agreed that the one who married first was to have the services of the other as bridesmaid on the important occasion, and you jokingly said you should expect to see me in Tennessee in about a year from that time, for you had got tired of single life, and were going to try and get the young preacher who was on the circuit, and who was such a charming singer; but you said there was little chance of my finding a congenial spirit, as Infidels were like hens' teeth—very few and very rare—but if you did not get Rev. Mr. Souls, you could easily find some good Christian among all the church members of the pious little town. I thought, too, at that time, that the chances were all in your favor, and have been looking for the expected invitation from you telling me to come on and fulfill my promise; but it seems I am to be the first to wear the honors of wifehood, after all; and so I wish to claim your presence here on the 12th of September to congratulate me on having a prize in the matrimonial lottery such as falls to very few who enter the lists. You cannot dream, dear Emma, how I have enjoyed corresponding with him. You know in all my Tennessee life I never met a single Infidel, nor have I seen one since I came here, save ourselves; and I began to think that if I waited for Fortune to send one along, I might be old and antiquated ere I saw that blessed day. I have always thought a single life but half a life, and an unnatural one at that, and, besides, I must own to an almost undue fondness for the society of the opposite sex. I have craved the company of men from a child; not that I think them better than women, but because they are more intelligent, taking them as a class; they have always had superior opportunities, been put first and allowed the general control and 'say so,' until women have grown to look up to them as almost gods. The day is not far distant when this will be all changed, and the two become, in every respect, equals; and after that I think woman will gradually improve her advantages until she progresses on beyond man, and leaves him to stand back as an inferior being, who will look up to womanhood and motherhood as the crown and summit of all cultured, refined, and elevated humanity.

"But I did not mean to mount my hobby, for you already know well my ideas upon this subject, and I have something of more interest to us personally to talk about now. Those letters of Norman have been a rare intellectual feast to me. It was such a joy to see my best thoughts echoed by another, and all my pet theories and likings acknowledged, talked about, and accepted as dear and precious truths. Then he wrote me such charming descriptions of his walks about the city, visits to places of interest, and dishing them with sharp, piquant hits at the mythologies of the age and their advocates. And I so much enjoyed his talks and criticisms on the books he read, many of which he forwarded to me, and I read them with a double pleasure because of the penciled passages marked especially for me. Love is intensely selfish, dear Emma, but it is a beautiful and exquisite selfishness, that we all value and prize. You will feel and realize this when you find that 'true Christian' and lose your very identity in him. Norman, as you know, is nearly thirty; but added years have given him added knowledge and wisdom. He has dived deeper, gone further, and experienced so much more than I have that he is a perfect mine of treasures, from which I can daily and hourly draw a wealth of precious information. I have seen other girls walking out with their lovers, talking lots of nonsense, flirting and laughing, and living mere common-place existences, and I hugged to myself the knowledge that I was having an intellectual feast with my love-drama that caused its pleasures to so much excel theirs that they seemed to stand only on the lowest round of the great ladder of the evolution of real love and harmonious sympathy, while I was mounting towards its very summit, and felt as if I could stand upon the apex and spring off into the great boundless ocean of love for all humanity, and of admiration and good will for all my kind. Never, dear Emma, will you realize how much the heart is capable of loving until you find your true ideal—one whom you can worship more, far more than any person ever could adore mythical saint, angel, or deity, because this living, loving, breathing, real he will be an actual identity, and all your own. You wondered if Norman and myself would be as mutually pleased with each other, when we met, as we had anticipated we should. Of course for a few hours we felt that natural reserve which people under such circumstances would be apt to experience, but I was not at all disappointed in his appearance. His grand, noble, and truly intellectual countenance was far superior to its pictured semblance. In a short time our embarassment wore off and we felt entirely at ease, and hardly realized that we had so lately met for the first time. As days passed by we cemented the written love by bonds that can never be broken while life lasts. I had fancied it impossible that I could feel a deeper affection for him than I did while we were only correspondents; but love is a plant that is continually growing by what it feeds upon. The capacity of the heart for this feeling is boundless and immeasurable. But doubtless I am wearying you with all this selfish description of my feelings, so I will close by hoping you will come and make good your promise, and thus give to me one more drop of joy to fill up my already overflowing cup of happiness. Truly and lovingly your friend, ROSE DARWIN."

"There!" said Myra, as she concluded the reading of the letter; "isn't that a good sample of love and philosophy well mixed together, and arn't you glad I brought it?"

"Yes, Myra, I am pleased to hear such beautiful sentiments as our Rose has here written, and to know there is such pure affection and true nobility in the world. It is always a gratification to know of what intimately concerns the happiness of those near and dear to us, and therefore I am glad to have heard the letters read. I do hope Rose will be as happy as she anticipates. Life has bright and sunny hours, many, very many of them, still storms and clouds must come to all."

"Yes, that is inevitable; but I know Norman so well that I am certain he will make one of the very best of husbands. He is not one to promise lightly. I mind a few lines he wrote at the close of a letter which he sent Rose, while I was at his mother's. In speaking of what he hoped for their future, he said:

"'I do not promise that our life,
Shall know no shade of thought on brow;
For human life and mortal strife
Would mock the falsehood of such a vow.
But when the clouds of pain and care
Shall teach us we are not divine,
My deepest sorrows thou shalt share,
And I will strive to lighten thine.
We love each other; but perchance,
The murmurs of dissent may rise,
Fierce words may chase the tender glance,
And angry passions light our eyes;
But we will learn to check the frown,
To reason, rather than to blame.
The wisest have their faults to own,
And you and I, Rose, have the same.'"

"That is good philosophy, Myra, if they will only keep to it, and we will hope and trust they may."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE following incident shows the dense ignorance and want of real principle in the masses enslaved by ignorance and priestcraft in Kansas: Recently a prominent Freethinker had a discussion with a member of the Methodist Church. After stating his disbelief in an endless hell, the Methodist took him by the hand, and, with tears in his eyes, said, "Brother, if I believed as you do I would cut a man's throat for fifty cents;" showing that fear, not principle, was the motive power of action backed up by the poor man's friend. With horns and hoofs, endless fire and brimstone, how much further are the ideas of such men advanced beyond the fourteenth century? Truly ignorance is the mother of blind devotion.

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

All other attempts which have been made to arrive at a definite and logical determination of the idea of organic "species" have, like the last, been utterly futile, and led to no results. Considering the nature of the case, it cannot be otherwise. The idea of species is just as truly a relative one and not absolute as is the idea of variety, genus, family, order, class, etc. I have proved this in detail in the criticism of the idea of species in my "General Morphology" (Gen. Morph, ii, 323–364). I will waste no more time on this unsatisfactory discussion, and now only add a few words about the relation of species to hybridism. Formerly it was regarded as a dogma that two good species could never produce hybrids which could reproduce themselves as such. Those who thus dogmatized almost always appealed to the hybrids of a horse and donkey, the mule and the hinny, which, truly enough, are seldom able to reproduce themselves. But the truth is that such unfruitful hybrids are rare examples, and in the majority of cases hybrids of two totally different species are fruitful and able to reproduce themselves. They can almost always fruitfully mix with one or other of the parent species, and sometimes also among themselves; and in this way completely new forms can originate according to the laws of "mixed transmission by inheritance."

HYBRIDISM PRODUCES SPECIES.

Thus, in fact, hybridism is a source of the origin of new species, distinct from the source we have hiterto considered —natural selection. I have already spoken occasionally of these hybrid species (species hybridæ), especially of the hare-rabbit (Lepus Darwinii), which has arisen from the crossing of a male hare and a female rabbit; the goat-sheep (Capra ovina), which has arisen from the pairing of a he-goat and a ewe; also the different species of thistles (Cirsium), brambles (Rubus), etc. It is possible that many wild species have originated in this way, as even Linnæus assumed. At all events, these hybrid species, which can maintain and propagate themselves as well as pure species, prove that hybridism cannot serve in any way to give an absolute definition to the idea of species.

I have already mentioned that the many vain attempts to define the idea of species theoretically have nothing whatever to do with the practical distinction of species. The extensive practical application of the idea of species, as it is carried out in systematic zoology and botany, is very instructive as furnishing an example of human folly. Hitherto, by far the majority of zoologists and botanists, in distinguishing and describing the different forms of animals and plants, have endeavored, above all things, to distinguish accurately kindred forms as so many "good species." However, it has been found scarcely possible, in any group, to make an accurate and consistent distinction of such "genuine or good species." There are no two zoologists, no two botanists, who agree in all cases as to which of the nearly related forms of a genus are good species, and which are not. All authors have different views about them. In the genus Hieracium, for example, one of the commonest genera of European plants, no less than three hundred species have been distinguished in Germany alone. The botanist Fries, however, only admits one hundred and six, Koch only fifty-two, as "good species," and others accept scarcely twenty. The differences in the species of brambles (Rubus) are equally great. Where one botanist makes more than a hundred species, a second admits only about one-half of that number, a third only five or six, or even fewer species. The birds of Germany have long been very accurately known. Bechstein, in his careful "Natural History of German Birds," has distinguished 367 species, L. Reichenbach 379, Meyer and Wolff 406, and Brehm, a clergyman learned in ornithology, distinguishes even more than 900 different species.

Thus we see that here, and, in fact in every other domain of systematic zoology and botany, the most arbitrary proceedings prevail, and, from the nature of the case, must prevail. For it is quite impossible accurately to distinguish varieties and races from so-called "good species." Varieties are commencing species. The variability or adaptability of species, under the influence of the struggle for life, necessitates the continual and progressive separation or differetiation of varieties, and the perpetual delimitation of new forms. Whenever these are maintained throughout a number of generations by inheritance, whilst the intermediate forms die out, they form independent "new species." The origin of new species by division of labor, or separation, divergence, or differentiation of varieties, is therefore a necessary consequence of natural selection.

THE LAW OF PROGRESS.

The same kind of interest attaches to a second great law which we deduce from natural selection, and which is, indeed, closely connected with the law of Divergence, but in no way identical with it; namely, the law of Progress (progressus), or Perfecting (telois) (Gen Morph. ii, 257). This great and important law, like the law of differentiation, had long been empirically established by palæontological experience, before Darwin's Theory of Selection gave us the key to the explanation of its cause. The most distinguished palæontologists have pointed out the law of progress as the most general result of their investigations of fossil organisms. This has been specially done by Bronn, whose investigations on the laws of construction and the laws of the development of organisms, although little heeded, are excellent, and deserve most careful consideration. The general results of the law of differentiation and the law of progress at which Bronn arrived by a purely mechanical hypothesis, and by exceedingly accurate, laborious, and careful investigations, are brilliant confirmations of the truth of these two great laws which we deduce as necessary inferences from the theory of selection.

The law of progress or of perfecting establishes the exceedingly important fact, on the ground of palæontological experience, that in successive periods of this earth's history a continual increase in the perfection of organic formations has taken place. Since that inconceivably remote period in which life on our planet began with the spontaneous generation of Monera, organisms of all groups, both collectively as well as individually, have continually become more perfectly and highly developed. The steadily increasing variety of living forms has always been accompanied by progress in organization. The lower the strata of the earth in which the remains of extinct animals and plants lie buried—that is, the older the strata are, the more simple and imperfect are the forms which they contain. This applies to organisms collectively, as well as to every single large or small group of them, setting aside, of course, those exceptions which are due to the process of degeneration, which we shall discuss hereafter.

As a confirmation of this law I shall mention only the most important of all animal groups, the tribe of vertebrate animals. The oldest fossil remains of vertebrate animals known to us belong to the lowest class, that of Fishes. Upon these there followed later more perfect Amphibious animals, then Reptiles, and lastly, at a much later period, the most highly organized classes of vertebrate animals, Birds and Mammals. Of the latter only the lowest and most imperfect forms, without placenta, appeared at first, such as are the pouched animals (Marsupials), and afterwards, at a much later period, the more perfect mammals, with placenta. Of these, also, at first only the lower kinds appeared, the higher forms later; and not until the late tertiary period did man gradually develop out of these last.

If we follow the historical development of the vegetable kingdom we shall find the same law operative there. Of plants there existed at first only the lowest and most imperfect classes, the Algæ or tangles. Later there followed the group of Ferns or Filicinæ (ferns, pole-reeds, scale-lants, etc.). But as yet there existed no flowering plants, or Phanerogama. These originated later with the Gymnosperms (firs and cycads), whose whole structure stands far below that of the other flowering plants (Angiosperms), and forms the transition from the group of fern-like plants to the Angiosperms. These latter developed at a still later date, and among them there were at first only flowering plants without corolla (Monocotyledons and Monochlamyds); only later were there flowering plants with a corolla (Dichlamyds). Finally, again, among these the lower polypetalous plants preceded the higher gamopetalous plants. The whole series thus constitutes an irrefutable proof of the great law of progressive development.

Now, if we ask what is the cause of this fact, we again, just as in the case of differentiation, come back to natural selection in the struggle for life. If once more we consider the whole process of natural selection, how it operates through the complicated interaction of the different laws of Inheritance and Adaptation, we shall recognize not only divergence of character, but also the perfecting of structure to be the direct and necessary result of it. We can trace the same thing in the history of the human race. Here, too, it is natural and necessary that the progressive division of labor constantly furthers mankind, and urges every individual branch of human activity into new discoveries and improvements. This progress itself universally depends on differentiation, and is consequently, like it, a direct result of natural selection in the struggle for life.

Christianity and Materialism.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Our observation teaches us, that nature acts in accordance with laws; or in other words, we observe certain modes of action, or sequences of motion, and having learned by experience that these are uniform, we call them "laws of nature." A body heavier than the atmosphere, unsupported, falls to the ground. This action is regular, invariable, uniform. We say it is the law of gravitation. It was not "made," "instituted," or "impressed" on matter, unless matter itself was made. We cannot imagine matter existing without modes of action or uniform sequences of motion. We say they are coeternal with matter, and "a stringent expression of necessity." All forms come into existence and undergo disintegration in accordance with them. The combustion of coal in the furnace of a locomotive and the eruption of a volcano, the zephyr that fans the cheek on a summer's day and the tornado that sends a fleet laden with humanity beneath the remorseless waves, the rounding of a pebble and the formation of a world, the motion of a feather in the air and the majestic march of a planet through space, the folding of a sensitive plant's leaf, the movements of a zoophyte, and the thoughts of man are all and equally subject to invariable laws. These laws are never changed nor suspended, either to promote the welfare or to increase the suffering of man. The thunderbolt strikes whatever is in its course, whether it be the cottage of an honest peasant, or a den of vice and crime. The terrible fire at Chicago devoured institutions of learning and charity, while it left unscathed many a haunt of infamy. During our late unhappy war, thousands of prayers went up from pulpit, fireside, and tented field, imploring God to stop the war and stay the effusion of blood. But the terrible contest continued, and for months and years battles followed in quick succession. Our eyes were dimmed with tears, our hearts were overwhelmed with grief at the sight of "States dissevered, belligerent, and drenched in fraternal blood;" and this frightful drama was brought to a close only when the South, exhausted in resources, was able no longer to continue resistance to the Federal arms. Is it possible that a being whose sleepless eye nothing escapes, and who bends his ear to the slightest wants of man, can exist and not be touched by such a spectacle as that? or, possessing the power, not stop such scenes of carnage by inclining the hearts of men to love and peace? Is it possible rational men can believe that a God infinite in wisdom and power, can assist his creatures to perform such pranks as we see during religious revivals, and never interposes to prevent men from butchering one another on the battle field, or to prevent tyrants of Church and State from involving whole nations in oppression, poverty, and misery.

We deem it more reasonable to regard the operations of nature the result of natural forces, undirected by any personality, and subject to eternal laws, than to view them as the doings of an intelligent being of infinite power, wisdom, and love.

If, as Materialists, we ever use the term God, it is only as a word to represent the unknown causes of phenomena that we behold; if we assent to the expression that "God makes the trees grow," we mean nothing more than that there are hidden causes for these visible effects, which we connot comprehend. The word God is like the letter x in algebra—it stands for the unknown quantity. We have a formula by which we can work out the algebraic problem and find what the unknown quantity is. We have no formula by which we can solve all the problems of nature. The discoveries of science are daily encroaching on the realm of the unknown and adding to the province of the known; but however much the boundaries of our knowledge are extended, there will ever be an unexplored ocean of mystery, on which no voyager's bark will ever sail. The unknown and the unknowable will always exist to excite the wonder and perplex the understanding of man. The external world, that which impresses us, we can know only as it is related to us, only as it is modified by our organisms, only as it is colored by our consciousness. All knowledge of the outer world is relative. What things are in themselves, independent of consciousness, we can never know. They will ever remain the "unknowable." If one chooses to use the word "God" to represent his ignorance, there is perhaps no great objection; but to clothe human ignorance with a word, give it human attributes, and then bow down and worship it, we think unphilosophical and unwise in the extreme. If we are to have houses erected to God, let them be dedicated to "the unknown God," and not to a personal, anthropomorphic Being, of whose existence science and philosophy afford no proof.

The Christian, even when he has outgrown the doctrine of special providence, so plainly taught in the Bible, thinks there must have been a direct agency of God at a certain time in the past, because the compiler of an old cosmogony says, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," and because he cannot understand how nature by its own inherent forces formed matter into suns and planets, and brought into existence organic forms. According to his view, existing species of plants and animals were immediate creations, and the facts of morphology, embryology, and the geographical distribution of organic forms in time and space, are without any special significance.

The Materialist says we have no proof that nature had a beginning, consequently we believe it has always existed. We admit that suns and worlds, as such, began to exist, and have an end. Every form on the globe with which we are acquainted bears evidence of a commencement and indications of ultimate destruction. Aggregation and segregation, organization and dissolution, seem to be the order of nature. The elements alone are eternal. This consideration leads to the conclusion that suns and planets, as well as rocks and trees, are formed and dissolved in the great laboratory of nature; yet the universe in its entirety was as beautiful, grand, and glorious in "the far backward and abyss of time," as it is now; and in the distant future, when the race of man shall have perished, and the stars which he now beholds shall have "paled their ineffectual fires" before the lustre of others now forming, nature will still exist in unfaded beauty and undimmed glory as it does to-day.

Since we see everything existing according to law now, we naturally infer that law has reigned in the past. We are not, it is true, able to demonstrate with particularity just how every form originated by the forces of nature, but our inability to comprehend the operations of nature in the past is no proof of the intervention of a personal God. Our feeble faculties are not the measure of nature's capacities and powers. Modern science, however, has done much to confirm the position of the Materialist by showing that even the most beautiful and complex forms of vegetable and animal life have, by a natural process, been gradually developed from living matter in its most simple condition, and the latter, probably, from matter in an inorganic state. "If it were given me to look beyond the abyss of geologically recorded time," says Huxley, "to the still more remote period when the earth was passing through physical and chemical conditions, which it can no more see again than a man can read his infancy, I should expect to be a witness of the evolution of living protoplasm from non-living matter" (Lay Sermons, p. 336.)

The Christian believes that God created the world and man perfect, and pronounced his work good, but that the devil out-witted and out-generaled his maker and made everything bad. Influenced by the serpent, Eve partook of forbidden fruit, when, as Milton says,

> "Earth felt the wound, and nature from her seat,
> Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
> That all was lost."

From a scene of beauty and bliss, such as our ancient parents of all human kind were alone permitted to behold and enjoy, the world was suddenly changed to a scene of deformity, decay, and death. Thorns and thistles, brambles and briars, appeared where before bloomed flowers of matchless beauty and sweetest perfume. The serpent, which before performed locomotion on its head or erect on its tail, was made suddenly to run on its belly, and to become the hated enemy of man. Woman was doomed to pain and degradation, and man, expelled with his partner from his beautiful home, was doomed to a life of toil, hardship, and despair.

The Materialist, appealing to that immense volume, the leaves of which are great strata of rock, and the hieroglyphics of which are fossil forms embedded therein, declares that the story of Genesis is a fable and a fancy; that instead of having been made originally perfect the world has advance to its present condition through countless ages, from a very imperfect state; that its present condition is the final term of an immense series of changes; that the changes have been from the simple to the complex, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, from the general to the special; that the matter of this globe was once a nebulous mass, from which during unimaginable periods, it has been condensed and differentiated under invariable and universal laws.

"This law of specialization," says the eminent geologist, Professor Dana, "the general being before the special, is the law of all development. The egg is at first a simple unit, and gradually, part after part of the new structure is evolved, that which is most fundamental appearing earliest, until the being is complete in all its outer and minor details. The principle is exhibited in the physical history of the globe, which was first a featureless globe of fire, then had its oceans and dry land, in course of time received mountains and rivers, and finally, all those diversities of surface which now characterize it. Again, the climates began with universal tropics, and at last the diversities of the present day."

The appearance of life on the earth conforms to the same plan. During the azoic age there was no life on all the globe, not even a zoophite, a fern, or a lichen. The first forms of vegetables and animals that appeared were of the most simple character, and every successive period, while it has found the earth more beautiful and its conditions more complex, has given rise to higher organic forms. One age has begun in the midst of a preceding age, and the appearance of every successive period has been foreshadowed in types of earlier periods. "Every species," says Wallace, "has come into existence coincident both in space and time with a pre-existing, closely-allied species." "That the great advancing movement of life," says Professor Youmans, "has been a divergence, an opening out, or an evolution, is in controvertible and is admitted by the highest biological authorities." "The more ancient animals," says Agassiz, "resemble the embryonic forms of existing species." "The beasts of the field; in the days before the chalk, were not our beasts of the field," says Huxley, "nor the fowls of the air such as those which the eye of man has seen flying, unless his antiquity dates infinitely further back than we at present surmise."

HISTORY OF TURKEY AND CAUSES OF THE WAR OF 1877, By J. D. O'Connor. In this little work of 250 pages, including maps, statistics, &c., can be found more real information than is usually comprised in ten volumes. It is a manual of ready reference, consisting of geography, chronology, religions, educational systems, manners, customs, &c. We have seen no more reasonable explanation of the real causes of, and objects to be attained by, the present war, than is here given. We think it should become a popular text book, and have a place in every well ordered library. Published by Moses Warren, Chicago.

CLASSIFICATION OF PLANTS.

MY DEAR READERS: The evolution which took place in the vegetable kingdom was not unlike what occurred in the animal kingdom. The first varieties of vegetation that came into existence were comparatively imperfect and crude, but as circumstances, temperature, and the various surrounding conditions changed, new germs and varieties were produced, and interminable changes and modifications resulted. You have all of you noticed or are familiar with what changes have been produced by cultivation in flowers and fruits. You are aware how all the almost endless beautiful varieties of roses have, by the arts of the florist, assisted by Dame Nature herself, been produced from the simple wild rose; how the long list of apples which add so materially to your comforts the year round, have by the arts of ingrafting and culture been the outgrowth of the despised sour crab-apple; how the numerous juicy, luscious pears have by the same arts been evolved from the diminutive, prickly wild-pear that is unfit for the use of man. Nature is equally skillful, and by her endless chain of circumstances, causes, and conditions she has produced equally as numerous varieties and modifications throughout the vegetable kingdom. She has not only brought forth all existing classes, genera, species, and varieties of plants that now exist, but thousands upon thousands of others that have long since passed out of existence; and all these from the comparatively limited number of varieties that first sprang into being at the introduction of the vegetable kingdom into the world. And all this has been effected very easily by the good old dame, all leisurely and moderately, and without any laborious exertion.

This letter will bring us into a limited consideration of the science of botany, a branch of natural history which is one of the most interesting studies that can be engaged in. It is the classification and history of the numerous varieties of vegetation which spring spontaneously, as I may say, from the torrid and temperate zones all over the earth. Botany has been divided into several departments which may be regarded in the light of separate sciences. It will be well for us to take a passing view of these sub-sciences.

Structural botany (organography) includes everything relating to the organization of plants. It describes the different kinds of tissue which enter into the composition of plants; it explains the structure of every organ, and it also teaches the relation that one organ bears to another.

That branch of structural botany which has reference to elementary tissues is sometimes distinguished as Vegetable Histology. The microscope has shown that the various tissues are composed of little membranous sacs or vesicles, varying in form and size, and united in different ways. The study of these elementary organs cannot be prosecuted without the aid of costly instruments and illustrations, which we have not now at hand. Some plants consist of simple cells only, which continue throughout life to produce new cells and to perform all the vital functions. A flowering plant, however, although originally cellular, produces organs composed of cells and vessels, variously modified and arranged, and covered by an epidermis.

These compound organs may be divided into nutritive, or those concerned in the nourishment of the plant, and reproductive, or those which are employed in the production of new individuals. The former are the stem, root, and leaf, the latter the flowers and fruit. Leaves occupy various positions on the stem and branches, and their arrangement forms a subject of special study. The arrangement of the flowers on the floral axis and its ramifications has also to be considered.

The term morphology has been applied to that portion of organography which treats of the abnormal modifications of the different organs. The researches that have been made in this department during the last forty years, have now confirmed the doctrine which has been advanced by some of your distinguished scientists, namely, that all those parts known as leaves, flowers, and fruit, are constructed on a simple uniform plan, out of one kind of organ in different stages of modification and combination, and that there is no other difference between the flower of a rose and that of a nettle than that arising from modifications and combinations of the typical organ, which is the leaf.

In elucidating this doctrine of the unity of type, which constitutes the basis of the theory of botany, it is so much the custom to talk of plants bearing leaves and flowers and fruit, and it is so evident to the senses that extremely different organs do exist under such names, that it seems inconceivable that parts so very dissimilar should be only leaves in different states; that the pure white petals of the lily, the rich red flowers of the rose, the sweet-smelling blossoms of the jasmine and orange, or the long trumpet-shaped corollas of the honeysuckle, should all be leaves, that the stamens in which the fertilizing power is locked up, the pistils which are destined to receive the influence of the pollen, the ovula that they contain, and finally, that the fruit which is the result of the action of the last two, are all so many parts formed out of one common organ, which in a particular and very frequent state is what is called a leaf.

Botanists do not mean to say that he who eats an apple or an orange or a peach is in a state of mental delusion, and that while he fancies he is enjoying himself with the pleasure of gratifying his palate by the most delicious flavors, he is really only chewing the leaves of these plants; but they assert that those appendages of a plant which are commonly called the leaves have a peculiar anatomical structure, and a certain relation to the stem on which they are borne, and, being developed according to certain fixed laws, are always arranged on a certain uniform plan with respect to each other; and that all the other organs, whether calyx, corolla, stamens, pistils, or fruit, have anatomical structures essentially the same, bear the same relation to the axis that they grow upon, and are developed according to the same laws, are arranged upon the same certain uniform plan with respect to each other, and finally, are constantly transformed into leaves of ordinary appearance, thus losing the condition in which they are usually found and reverting to their structural type.

Morphology is a most attractive subject for study, but less important, from a practical point of view, than that part of organography which has reference to the ordinary forms of organs and the manner in which they are arranged. No systematic arrangement can be understood without a knowledge of the laws upon which the symmetry of the plants depend, and a practical acquaintance with the structure of every kind of organ.

Physiological botany treats of plants in a living or active state, and of the manner in which their functions are performed; it explains how they are influenced by the several agencies of light, heat, air, and moisture, and it describes their various secretions and the nutriment afforded by the soil. It need scarcely be said that any attempt to investigate the laws of vegetable life would be abortive without acquaintance with the more important details of organization. Plants, not being endowed with voluntary motions, derive their food either from the soil in which they are fixed or from the atmosphere by which they are surrounded.

The circulation of the sap has been adduced as an example of the vital powers elucidated by physiology, because it is due to the combined action of all the organs of nutrition, and may therefore serve instead of several illustrations. The study of the special functions of the various organs necessarily precedes that of the general physiological phenomena, such as circulation, assimilation, respiration, fertilization, and germination.

The nutriment consisting of water, generally holding salts in solution, is absorbed by the aid of endosmose, by the extremities of the root. It then passes from cell to cell and ascends the stem, dissolving in its course some of the organic matter stored up in the vegetable tissue. Arrived at the green shoots and surfaces of the leaves, which are covered with minute openings, the sap is exposed to the influences of light, heat, and air. About two-thirds of the moisture taken up is now evaporated and exhaled; the remainder, which of course becomes thickened, undergoes certain chemical changes, and then begins to descend by the under surface of the leaf, and along the back. It takes a direct or circuitous course downward, communcating with the center of the stem by the medullary rays, depositing various secretions, more especially in the dark, and giving origin to substances which are destined to nourish and form new tissues. Finally it reaches the extremity of the root where absorption had commenced; a small portion is then excreted, while the remainder mixes with the newly absorbed fluids, and again circulates in the sap.

The object of systematic botany is to name, describe, and arrange plants in such a manner that the botanist may readily ascertain the name of any specimen, and at the same time get an insight into its true nature and general properties. When you remember that there are some 120,000 known species of plants on the globe, you will readily see the necessity of a definite nomenclature and classification, were it only to facilitate reference and communication. Before plants can be classified, their peculiarities of structure must be clearly defined, hence you will admit the necessity for technical language to be employed in descriptive botany.

This necessary nomenclature should not deter any of you, or any true lover of nature, from studying the principles of classification, for in acquiring a knowledge of the numerous technical terms you will at the same time fix in your minds the ideas which they represent, and thus in reality you will become acquainted with important elementary facts.

I presume you are familiar with the fact that botanists are blamed for the great number of dry, hard names with which the nomenclature of the science is so abundantly supplied, but you must remember that they are an absolute necessity—in designating and explained the almost endless variety of vegetable life by which you are surrounded. There are so many minute points, so many slight differences which require to be definitely described, that it could not be done without a great amount of accuracy and particularity of terms and names.

It will be readily admitted on all hands that this is one of the heaviest drawbacks that botany has to contend with. Were it not for this necessity, almost the whole world would study botany for the mere pleasure of the thing. Let me urge you to not let this objection deter you from giving the study a good share of attention. To the younger portion of my readers I particularly recommend this branch of natural history. It is a good system of training for the mind, and helps to give you a lively appreciation of the facinating beauties which abound so plentifully throughout the universe. The lovely month of June is now with you, and it affords you a very favorable time to prosecute this study. It will give me exquisite pleasure to aid you in the undertaking to the extent of my power.

I have not near finished all I have to say upon this subject, but, as I am rather dry in my style today, I will not inflict further pain upon you by prolonging my remarks. Next week, if nothing detains me more than I now know of, I will be with you, when we will recur to this theme again, and I shall try to impart a little more information upon the subject under discussion.

Hoping you will endeavor to keep comfortably cool while the sun shines so vertically upon you, and that health and happiness may abide with you for many long years to come, I subscribe myself, your obedient servant and faithful friend, LUCIFER,

Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Mr. Abbot and the Petition.

BY THERON C. LELAND.—ARTICLE III.

WHO BEGAN THE UNPLEASANTNESS?

Having disposed of the two attacks on the 70,000 who signed the anti-Comstock petition, in The Index of May 2d and 16th, I go back now to the origin of the difficulty. Let us glance a moment at the state of Liberal affairs as they stood in November last. All was peace and harmony and agreement at that time. The National Liberal League had just held its annual meeting at Rochester. Its deliberations went on smoothly, its platform was adopted unanimously, and its delegates returned home feeling that a good work had been accomplished. The prospects of Liberalism everywhere looked bright. Mr. Abbot was recognized as the capable leader, as he was the official head, of the League; and The Index was accepted as, in an appropriate sense, its organ. All the other Liberal papers were giving the League their support and were working in harmony with The Index, Mr. Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER with the rest. Mr. Bennett was a member of the League, had been a member for two years or more, was in attendance at the convention at Philadelphia, and then again at Rochester, where he gave his voice and vote heartily for the movement. His and the other Liberal papers did not, it is true, make the League a marked specialty in the great Liberal movement, and were not, perhaps, working for it with that zeal and urgency which Mr. Abbot was giving to the organization. Nobody, of course, expected they would do that; but they were friendly, and favored the movement whenever an occasion for putting in a good word came up. As time went on, moreover, this favor and friendliness would have been more and more manifest if nothing had occurred to change the current.

In this happy situation of affairs, and as leader of a great movement, which he desired to build up and to become a power in the land, it pre-eminently belonged to a wise line of conduct on the part of Mr. Abbot to do everything in his power to continue that era of coöperation and good feeling. There was no apprehension but that he would be capable of rising above the arts and motives of the local wire-puller. It was believed that he would be able to subordinate his personal whims and small notions—acquired, perhaps, in his early Sunday-school, or, at all events, under very narrow tutelage of some kind—and would let the Liberal side of him bear dominant sway in his editorial and official action.

But something did occur to test the capacity of the man, something which proved him to be as weak and as susceptible to a low order of motives as any common politician. Exactly that thing occurred which a wise leader would have turned to his account to strengthen his own movement and all the more attach other leaders and other editors to the League as the organization precisely adapted to meet such emergencies. It was a good time to show what the League could do.

In the latter part of November, last Mr. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, was arrested by Anthony Comstock on a charge of obscenity. Now, it was obvious to all the world that that was a most frivolous and entirely unfounded charge, and that it could not be sustained in the courts one moment. Every Liberal editor, except this Index one, sensed the situation at once. Every other Liberal editor knew, first by instinct and then by reason, that it was an attack set on foot by the ecclesiastical party, inspired by the same crowd that are putting God into the Constitution; and every other editor sprang promptly to Mr. Bennett's defense. His cause was the cause of every Liberal in the land; and the friends of Freethought everywhere—seventy thousand of them at least, as the event proved—saw it to be so. But at the roll-call of Mr. Bennett's defenders the editor of The Index came up missing. There Mr. Bennett was, a Liberal editor and member of the League, attacked, arrested, put under bonds, which if he could not have procured he must have gone to prison, and that attack upon him might be the fate of any Liberal in the land. Indeed, one other (Mr. Heywood), in Mr. Abbot's own vicinity, was under the same treatment at the same time. What did Abbot do in the matter? Make common cause in adversity as he had in prosperity, and come forward with cordial support and efficient assistance? Nothing of the kind—not he. He began to palter and apologize, to explain away, tuck up his skirts, and utter weak-kneed incoherences. He would come to the rescue if—he was a Liberal, but—. With his 8th Demandment, abrogating Christian morality, standing in his columns for years, he yet began exhorting all Liberals to be specially observant of the Christian moralities, so that Christians might have no cause to say anything against them. This was in The Index of December 6th, and here are some of the things he said:

There is no more fondness for "obscenity" in the majority of Liberals than there is in the majority of Christians; and whoever asserts that there is makes himself guilty of a foul and wicked slander. Yet it is a familiar artifice of the Christian party, with some honorable exceptions, to assert a necessary connection between so-called "infidelity" and "immorality," and by means of this villainous falsehood to excite widespread suspicion of all whose honest devotion to truth places them outside of the churches. Unjust as it is, this suspicion lays a double duty upon every Liberal to keep himself above all possibility of being charged with immorality, either of act or word; for if he suffers himself to be smirched, there are multitudes all ready to cry out, "See what a vile set these Liberals are!" and a part of this calumnious reproach falls even upon the best and purest.

For these reasons every writer for the Liberal press who has a keen sense of honor will feel himself peculiarly called upon to avoid any and every expression which violates the recognized laws of decency. If, however, he is insensible or callous to this obligation of honor, and allows himself to be tempted into indecencies, he has no just right to call upon his fellow-Liberals, whose cause he has publicly disgraced and upon whose heads, as above explained, he has drawn a most undeserved odium, to defend him in these indecencies. The principles of free thought, free speech, and a free press, precious as they are, give no right to violate the unwritten but well-established canons of public propriety; and it is nothing but effrontery to invoke them as a sufficient justification for offenses against it. There is no justification for such offenses; and any Liberal who is guilty of them is the worst enemy of the Liberal cause. Whether committed by Christians or Liberals, such offenses ought to excite disgust, and do excite it in every mind which has no natural or acquired love of dirt; and, for one, we repudiate emphatically all obligation of defending any person who betrays the noble cause of intellectual liberty by abusing his own liberty so far as to insult the purity of his readers.

Now as there are no Liberals on earth to whom all this, or any of it, can possibly apply; and as he would have no Liberals of the kind he describes to "defend," we can only conclude that he was on the fence getting ready to inflict further stabs and deeper wounds upon his brother Liberal editors, Bennett and Heywood, as he remorselessly proceeded to do two weeks later.

Mr. Bennett proceeded to defend himself as best he could, without the aid of Mr. Abbot, using all known means of warfare to meet his enemy effectually—the press, the courts, public meetings, and every possible method of influencing and enlightening public opinion. Among other remedies he thought he would try what force there might be in a petition to Congress to repeal or amend the laws under which he had been prosecuted, since it was discovered that those laws had been enacted on purpose to stretch so far as to include any expression of free thought as immoral or obscene. There is such a remedy as the right of petition yet left to the American people for wrongs that have no other remedy, and Mr. Bennett thought it a good time to exercise that right. Not trusting to his own unaided sense and judgment in the matter, he consulted friends, looked up precedents, investigated the origin of the law, at whose behest and in whose interest it was enacted, and employed counsel to draw up such a petition as would best meet the case. The result was the petition which was sent out. The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER have seen that petition; most of them signed it, and they can judge of its propriety and morality, and whether they were petitioners for the prevalence and protection of obscenity. They asked for repeal or modification of a United States law which had been found unjust and oppressive upon perfectly innocent parties, leaving Congress to do either, repeal or modify, as in their law-making wisdom they should deem best. But it didn't suit Mr. Abbot. After appealing to Liberals on Dec. 6th, to be uncommonly moral during such obscene times, he incubated over the matter until Dec. 20th, when he came out square and flat-footed against the petition and in favor of Comstock. It was like a thunderbolt from a clear sky. No bombshell bursting in a peaceful camp when no enemy was suspected to be near could have startled the Liberal world more. No motive could be conceived for the deed; on the contrary every inducement for supporting the petition seemed to control one in Mr. Abbott's position. The annual meeting of the League had been but two months adjourned—"nay, not so much; not two—or e'er those shoes were old with which we followed" our dear President to Rochester, "like Niobe, all tears" over the God that our enemies might, some day, if they got a good chance, put into the Constitution—our President, editor, and leader came out with a five-column fulmination against his friends and in favor of his enemies. Some of it is as follows and will well represent the whole:

What will be the effect of this petition, if numerously signed?

1. It must be to create the impression that the signers are totally indifferent to the real evils at which these statutes were aimed; and this impression will be most unfortunate.

2. The effect of the petition now circulating can only work disaster to the defense of Messrs. Bennett and Heywood; for it seems to proceed on the assumption that their cause is identical with that of the vile persons engaged in the moral destruction of the young, and that the former cannot be defended except by releasing the latter also from all penalty.

For these two reasons chiefly—that it tends to injury of the Liberal cause and to the injury of the two defendants now threatened with unjust penalties—we deeply regret the issuing of the above petition, should decline to sign it, and must dissuade others from signing it.

Now it is entirely safe to say that no other Liberal thinker in this country, or in Europe, or indeed in the world, would have taken such a slant as that. There is no other Liberal extant with the cast of mind; no other with the half-and-half mixture of orthodoxy ingrained, and free religion grafted on the feeble old stock; no other with an eye so vigilant for danger, and so blind to the advantages of driving right on over a victorious course in a brave, persistent, manly charge, regardless of what enemies, who are always liars, may say. It so happened by some inscrutable chance that this one sole Liberal, so called because he has written ably and well in just one phase of Liberalism, was, at this Comstock juncture, at the head of a Liberal journal, and hence had some show of authority to call a halt of the Liberal army. It didn't halt, however, worth a cent, but just went pouring forward, 70,000 of them, precisely as if the scared and impotent editor had not issued his command. The order to halt had no effect at all on the petition or on the petitioners; but it did react on the League; and that organization has been a stunned, hesitating, demoralized body ever since. Nothing but a capable, courageous leader, and a consistent course of action will ever recover it. The members of the League, as far as I have been able to confer or correspond with them, have generally felt that if the League was not organized to meet just such aggressions as Comstock and his backers have made upon Liberals, what in the wide realm of ecclesiastic invasion and tyranny was it intended to oppose? The Leaguers looked to Mr. Abbot for a quite different proclamation; and a competent leader would have issued an order that would have thundered along the lines, secured general obedience, closed up all ranks, and enlisted recruits by thousands and tens of thousands, just as the petition did. There was a tide in the affairs of Liberals leading on to fortune, but here was a seasick captain afraid to take it at the flood and now the ebbing outflow leaves him, at all events, stranded. There was a great stream running, started and supplied gratuitously by our opponents. A man of genius would have set a mill upon it and ground out abundant grists for the nourishment and support of our own forces. In short, there was a great opportunity squandered by an impractical dreamer "letting I dare not wait upon I would." Instead of leading, as the emergency required, and as all hands and hearts hoped and expected he would, he was attacked with a fit of panic as to what respectability and orthodoxy would say about him, flung down his arms and—well he lives "to fight another day" when God confronts him in the Constitution! Then he will call on us 70,000 to be brave, and generous, and forgiving, and come over to his assistance against the Almighty in the Constitution. Well, we shall see. We will think about it. As he failed us in an important juncture, we will consider and try to make up our minds which evil is the worst—God in the Constitution at some distant day which may never come; or the Devil in the Post office smashing our Liberal crockery right here and now.

Astronomy.

VII.

Thus we find that every substance in a state of ignition yields its special spectrum, and without seeing the body which is burning, we can, by a mere examination of its spectrum, tell to a certainty how it is composed.

Gold, when incandescent, emits a spectrum different from that of silver, and that of silver differs again from other metals, etc.

The main properties of some metals are so alike that it is almost impossible not to confound one with the other in the ordinary mode of investigation, and metallurgists have consequently resorted to an examination of their spectra when incandescent. By means of spectral comparison and analysis they have discovered differences not to be traced in the substances themselves, and by this procedure have already discovered three new metals: rubidium, cæsium, and thallium.

Spectrum analysis also leads us to an important chemical discovery, which M. Dumas laid before the French Academy of Sciences in 1871. M. Lecoq de Boisbaudran had, some years ago, demonstrated the affinity between spectra of alkaline metals and those of metals coming out of an alkaline soil. He had shown that the displacement of characteristic rays was effected in accordance with the same law as the modifications in the weight of the elementary substances. Messrs. Toost and Hautefeuille, on the one hand, and M. Ditte on the other, having followed up these researches, ascertained that the course of the rays towards the ultra-violet hue manifests itself exactly in the same way as the increase of the atomic weights does for carbon, silica, titanium, tin, and zirconium upon the one hand, and for sulphur, selenium, and tellurium on the other. M. Dumas pointed out that this is but another proof, amongst the many which science already possessed, as to the truth of the principle upon which, in 1827, he established his classification of simple bodies into natural categories.

Spectrum analysis may also be very useful in physiology and medicine. In some cases of poisoning, the toxical element can be ascertained by burning a part of the flesh or excrement, and by decomposing through the prism the light produced by the combustion. It was in this way that M. Lany discovered thallium in the organs of animals to which that substance had been administered.

But it is in astronomy that its results have been most remarkable. This science has made use of the spectrum analysis to extend its researches over milliards of millions of leagues, and by its means has ascertained the character and elements of the countless luminaries which pervade space.

Here is an instance: a brilliant star having suddenly made its appearance (May, 1866) in the constellation of the Corona Borealis, and almost as suddenly vanished, its light was at once submitted to spectrum analysis, and it was proved that this star was one already known as emitting a very dim light, which had momentarily brightened. Its spectrum had great analogy with that of our sun, and we are told by Messrs. Huggins and Miller that "the spectrum of this star, coupled with the sudden outburst of its light, and its almost equally rapid diminution in intensity, make it probable that owing to some vast internal convulsion, enormous quantities of gas were emitted from it, the hydrogen in which must have taken fire by its mixture with some other element, and caused the light represented by the brilliant rays, the flames raising the solid matter in the photosphere of the star to a white heat. The hydrogen burnt out, the light would then have gradually diminished in brilliancy, and the star would resume its normal appearance." It must be borne in mind that, owing to the immense distance of the star in which this fire (to use a word which designates the phenomenon with great accuracy) took place, the light must have taken a considerable period to reach us, and that it had been at an end ten, twenty, a hundred years or more, before we were made acquainted with it.*

VIII.

Spectrum analysis, by enabling us to read in a ray of light the nature of the body which produces it, the elements constituting that body, and the changes that take place in it, becomes as it were a messenger from the stars, the confidant of infinite space, the telegraph from incalculable distances, the revealer of the closest secrets, and even a relentless denunciator.

Mr. Huggins has published a work upon the spectrum analysis which contains many new and important facts, and to it we shall often have occasion to refer.

The various spectra differ from each other in many important respects, but they may all be divided into three categories.

The distinctive character of spectra of the first order consists in the continuity of those colored bands broken by no ray, brilliant or obscure. Whence we learn that the light in which this spectrum has its origin is emitted by an opaque body, which probably exists in a solid or liquid state. A spectrum of this order does not disclose to us the chemical nature of the incandescent body whence the light proceeds.

The spectra of the second order are formed from colored rays of light isolated from each other. They indicate to us that the brilliant matter emitted by the light is in a gaseous state; and as each element and each component body, which has become luminous without being decomposed, is distinguishable when in a gaseous state by certain rays peculiar to it, it follows that these rays are capable of revealing to us the nature of the bodies from which they are emitted.

The third order comprises the spectra of incandescent bodies, solid or liquid, in which the continuity of the colored bands is broken by sombre rays. These latter are not produced by the source of light, but by vapors through which the light has passed on its way. Spectra of this kind are yielded by the light of the Sun and of the stars. The group of sombre rays produced by each vapor is identical, as regards their number and their place in the spectrum, with the group of brilliant rays of which the light is composed when the vapor has become luminous.

The American Lady.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

I have spoken in past addresses about humanity, its essential constituent elements, and the type of manhood which best adorns it. I have this morning to say something about that crowning grace of all humanity, the lady. I choose as my subject this morning, therefore, the American Lady; not from any desire, certainly, to make a sensation, nor in a spirit of eccentricity, but in order thus to illustrate what seems to me to be the most exquisite and crowning attainment of humanity.

The peculiarity of American life is visible on its surface, and will strike any one who has ever visited a foreign country. Apparent to every eye is it that there is here an external uniformity among people; that there are no orders of nobility, no distinctions of ranks that all wear the same dress, speak the same language, cultivate the same manners, and revere the same customs and traditions, As we look over the surface of American life, there seems to be a monotony, a sameness that is even oppressive; as if all distinctions were obliterated, and all men and women were in some way reduced to one plane. A glance beneath the surface of American life reveals the fact that this comes of the nature of our institutions, and the cardinal principles of our government. We see that there is one law in the nation, at least in principle, for all who call themselves citizens; that there is but one code of justice, one rule, one standard of life, that all are held to the same responsibility, that all confess the same obligations, that all, therefore, place themselves before the law upon the same level of human beings. Look deeper than this, and it appears as if all cardinal distinctions were becoming neglected and obliterated; as if at bottom and at heart men and women were being reduced to the same material. As the removal of dikes and dams makes pieces of water flow together, as the removal of fences and barriers makes of separate properties a common ground, so the destruction of the social fences, the artificial barriers and nominal distinctions of mankind, effects what seems to be something like promiscuousness in American life. And where fences and barriers have been for generations in existence, they may be removed in areas and their removal not be felt. I have seen in England, in an old aristocratic family, the gentlemen and the peasantry mingling together in apparently complete unconsciousness of any distinction between them; no superciliousness on the one hand, and no obsequiousness on the other, all addressing each other simply and honestly, but all being conscious of the invisible distinctions that were made ages and ages ago, and that ages and ages had only served to confirm. Nobody for a moment thought of questioning the fact that some were more intelligent, cultivated, refined, beautiful, elegant in manners, noble in conduct, and excellent in disposition than the rest. This was never questioned, not even by the inward thought of those who were above or those who were beneath, because the distinction was so ingrained that the removal of the artificial signs was never felt. But in a democratic society like ours, where distinctions never have existed, where the badges have never been visible, it seems to be a simple fact that all men are of the same stuff, and all women are alike, that there is but one fortune and one character for all. And yet, dear friends, there is no abolishing of cardinal distinctions. Take away the fences if you will, remove the barriers and throw the signs and badges of distinction into the fire or the waste-basket, and still it remains everlastingly and fundamentally true, that difference in character, in training, in temperament, in culture, in nobleness, in magnanimity, in all the qualities that make human beings, is normal. The difference between the perfect gentleman and the boor, the difference between a man like Theodore Roosevelt, who laid all he had and all he was, at the disposition of society, and the man in the Tombs or Ludlow Street Jail, who has made it the business of his life to filch from society in order to enrich himself, never can be described in the English language. The plunge that the waters of Niagara make from the turning-point over the cliff down into the abyss below, feebly describes the moral difference between a Ralph Waldo Emerson on the one side and a Quimbo Appo on the other.

God himself cannot obliterate distinctions like these. They are intellectual, they are moral, they are spiritual, they are in the nature of things. And if it were not so, then alas for the future of humanity. Then farewell hope and aspiration, then farewell to the effort which glorifies and sublimates mankind. We all know, we all are conscious of the fact every day, that all men are not alike. Talk as much as we may about the equalities in which mankind are created, we know better. We know that that is true only in the region of sentiment, of the ideal, of hope, of vision. We know that it may be true in the millennium, and we know that in this world of experience and of effort it is not true,

I divide men into three classes: males, men, and gentlemen. So there are females, women, and ladies. And these three classes are absolutely and forever distinguished, the one from the other. The only distinction of a female is her sex, and even that may be reduced to so shadowy a line as can hardly be distinguished. There is a certain town in England where the women dress like men, and riding through that town I failed to distinguish the men from the women. There are females who in voice, manners, demeanor, habit, use of speech, and general behavior, are in no wise to be distinguished from the lowest, grossest, and most brutal of men. Without cultivation or a dream of what it means, without sympathy, without compassion or pity, without aspiration, without fellow-feeling for their own kind, without tenderness for the young, the forsaken, the suffering, the sorrowing, the bruised and crushed, they are women only in sex; in all other respects scarcely human. When we see them we know who they are. We meet them in the streets night and day. Let us say no more about them; it is too tragic a thought to entertain. And then we come to women. These are more human; here we rise to a plane above that of sex; there is intelligence and sympathy and compassion, interest in human affairs, tenderness towards innocence and suffering and sorrow, a desire to do something to alleviate the miseries of mankind. There may be no cultivation or aspiration or loftiness of purpose, no fineness of texture, but there is a broad feminine element, an element of sympathy running through them from top to bottom, directing their thoughts and interesting them in moral affairs, which marks them as a class of humanity by themselves.

Where shall I borrow language to describe the lady? She is hardly, perhaps, recognized by her sex; that lies so far beneath so many layers of elegance and refinement and cultivation. Instead of prettiness and handsomeness she has grace and beauty; for regularity of feature she has a loveliness of expression that irradiates the face, shines in the eyes, and charms equally with the language of the lips. A beautiful intelligence presides over all her conduct. By a delicate and penetrating intuition she feels her way through the mazes of casuistry until she rests in the serene calm of the beautiful truth. With a wonderful combination of tact and sympathy, wherever she is, she directs her affairs, small or large, important or unimportant, without the movement of a finger, without a lifting of the voice, without a frown upon her face. She never strives, or cries, or lifts up her voice clamorously in the street. The bruised reed she will not break, the smoking flax she will not extinguish, hoping that within may be some smouldering truth. Her very presence is a magnetic influence; she touches the tenderest sentiments of those she meets, sways people when they do not feel the authority, moves them without propelling, guides them and makes them glad to be guided. Her days pass serenely on, the hours counted by the very benedictions she sheds by her voice, her smile, and her presence. Care becomes blessed, and labor light, and burdens not wearisome when she bestows her loving smile, and life glides on so sweetly and harmoniously that it never leaves a trace.

There are two roots to the English word lady. According to one derivation it means a woman who is lifted up above the ordinary level of her kind; a woman who is selected by a person of rank and authority and title to be his companion and helpmeet, and the joy of his existence. She is distinguished from the rest by her wealth, her position, her dress and decorations, by the external style in which her lord allows her to live. In this sense the word lady has little significance for us, for we have no lords. No man is entitled to raise a woman to his name, for no man has any name except as his character makes one. But the external position may be counterfeited even in America. Wealth, ostentation, love of display, passion for dress, will imitate a position which cannot be attained; and many a woman will, by virtue of the mere paraphernalia and appendages that she can hang upon her person, strut before the world and ape a nobility which she has never deserved. Walk through the streets of any American city and you will see pompous efforts to play the lady on the part of women who never had the faintest conception of what ladyhood meant. A more exquisite semblance of the old dignity is presented by the delicate, sensitive, refined, cultivated women who withdraw from society to live in seclusion by themselves, and in an atmosphere of refinement and gracefulness which they create, and which is externally beautiful in itself, and yet which falls short in one essential respect, it seems to me, of the position which the American lady should hold. The other definition of the word lady is bread giver, a distributer of bread, that is, the mistress of her household, the head of the establishment, the source of beneficence and plenty and grace and health to all who depend on her. It is a very charming picture, that of the ladies of the olden time in their households, presiding over their establishments, sewing and spinning with their maids, healing dissensions, mitigating trouble, and exercising a gentle power and influence for morality and peace over all parts of the household; or standing at her gate distributing food to the hungry, or visiting her tenantry carrying the beauty of her presence and her gifts down to the lowest dwellings of the men and women who have nothing of their own, visiting the sick child, consoling the dying mother, bringing food and tender care and the ministrations of the physician to those who are sick and wretched. Many and many are the figures that we see in the course of history gliding through the bleak and barren world carrying these messages of good will. The American lady cannot do that, for she has no tenantry; she is not in position lifted up above her fellows. What she has to distribute is simply what she possesses herself—her thought, her sympathy, her gracious compassion. And she must do this, not in the external and technical way which is imposed upon the ladies of another and different social system, but in the vital, deep, intense way that belongs to a democratic society, for in a society like ours where all are placed on a level, and where all live the same life from day to day, we must help each other. Each must bestow his gift, whatever it is, whether it be wealth, strength, influence, a sentiment of justice and courage, truth, sympathy, compassion, whatever it is, it is due to the whole that the possessor of it shall bestow it. It is not permissible in a society like ours that any grain of force should be abstracted from the common treasury. To live alone and apart from the world is excellent and beautiful, but is it not more excellent and beautiful not to hide one's light under a bushel but to share one's talent with the community?

The Jewish Jesus Revived.

Gliding down the stream of time a thousand years we find no further trace of the story of the Jesus referred to by Celsus and outlined in the Talmud. But just as we pass the midnight of Christianity the legend comes to light in more detail. One Raymundus Martini, a Christian publisher, near the close of the 13th century unearths a Hebrew or Chaldean manuscript and makes a Latin translation of a part of the story. It is doubtless as true as any of the other Gospels, and probably as old if not older; for it fixes the date of Jesus the Nazarean about one hundred years B.C. We are not aware that an English translation of this remarkable story has ever been attempted until now.

In the days of Queen Elani (i. e., Helena) who reigned over the whole land of Israel,* Jesus the Nazarean came to Jerusalem and found in the Temple of the Lord a stone on which once rested the ark of God, and it had written thereon Schem Hamphoras (i. e., the interpreted name). For whoever should read and learn the letters of this name would be able to do whatever he wished. The wise men, therefore, fearing that the people of Israel might make out the name and by virtue thereof destroy the world, made two brazen dogs and placed them on the two columns at the door of the Sanctuary. Whenever, therefore, any one went there and learned the letters of the name aforesaid and came out, the brazen dogs barked at him so terribly that in his fright he forgot the name and the letters which he had learned.

Therefore came Jesus the Nazarean, and going into the Temple he learned the letters and wrote them on a piece of parchment. Then he cut the flesh of his leg and placed in the incision the said piece of parchment, and speaking the name, he felt no pain, and the skin presently closed up as it was before. And as he was going out of the Temple the aforesaid brazen bogs barked at him and at once he forgot the name. Then he looked at the parchment where the letters of the Schem Hamphoras were and again learned them.

Having done this he gathered together 310 young men of Israel and said to them: The wise men declare me a bastard because they seek to have domain over Israel; but ye know that all the prophets spoke concerning the Messiah, and verily I am he; and concerning me Esaias the prophet said (chap. vii), Behold a virgin shall conceive and shall bring forth a son and shall call his name Immanuel. David, my ancestor, also prophecied concerning me and said (Ps. ii), The Lord said to me, Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee. Therefore did my mother conceive me without knowing a man, by the power of God. They therefore are illegitimate and not I, as it is said (Hosea ii), And I will not have mercy on her children, for they are children of whoredoms.

The young men replied to him, If thou art the Messiah, show us a sign. What sign, said he, do you ask of me? They said to him, Make a cripple stand up like ourselves. He said to them, Bring one to me. Straightway, therefore, they brought to him a cripple who had never stood on his feet. He pronounced over him the Schem Hamphoras, and in that same hour the cripple arose and stood on his feet. Therefore all bowed down to Jesus and said, Without doubt this is the Messiah.

Then they brought to him a leper, and he spoke the Name and laid his hand upon him, and straightway he was cured. Therefore many of the low people of our nation joined him.

*The queen referred to is otherwise known as Alexandra, who reigned over Palestine from 78 to 69 B. C., as will hereafter more fully appear.

The wise men who trusted in Israel, seeing this, therefore took him and brought him to the Queen Helena, who governed all Israel, and said to her, O Sovereign, this man is a sorcerer and he leads the world into error. But Jesus said to her, O Sovereign, the ancient prophets spoke concerning me, one of whom said (Esai. xi, 1), There shall come forth a branch out of the stem of Jesse. I am that branch. Moreover, David truly said (Ps. i, 1), blessed is he who walketh not nor goeth into the council of the ungodly.

The Queen said, Is it not written in your law as he doth say? They said to her, It is thus written in our law, but it is not spoken concerning him. But as to this man it is written (Deut. xiii, 5), And that prophet who hath spoken wickedly against God shall be put to death. But concerning the Messiah it is said (Jer. xxiii, 6), In his days Judah shall be saved.

The bad fellow answered and said to the Queen, I am he because I raise the dead.

Therefore, the Queen sent away the more faithful of her attendants, and this ungodly fellow raised a dead person by the Schem Hamphoras. Then the Queen was astounded and said, Truly this is a great sign. And she bade the wise men adieu, and they departed abashed from her presence. Then there was great grief among them and in Israel.

Now Jesus went to upper Galilee. And the wise men went to the Queen and said to her, O Sovereign, this man is a sorcerer and he deceives the people. So she sent soldiers to take him. And the men of Galilee would not permit it, but were ready to resist them. Jesus said, Do not fight for me, for the strength of my Father in heaven and the signs which he hath given me will protect me. Therefore the men of Galilee made birds of mud in his presence and he spoke the Schem Hamphoras over them, and straightway the birds flew. Then all fell down on their faces and worshiped him.

And in the same hour he ordered a great millstone to be brought and cast into the sea, which being done the impious fellow pronounced the Schem Hamphoras and made the millstone float on the surface of the sea. And he sat upon it and said to the soldiers, Go to your Sovereign and tell her what ye have seen. Then he stood up before them and began to walk on the surface of the water.

The soldiers departed and told Queen Helena what they had seen. She, in great amazement, called the wise men and said to them, Ye say that this man is a sorcerer, but know ye that the wonders he hath wrought show him to be indeed the Son of God. They said, O Sovereign, make him come here and we will detect the fraud.

Meanwhile the elders of Israel went and got a certain man named Judah Scariot to enter the Holy of Holies and learn the letters of Schem Hamphoras just as Jesus had learned them; and he cut open the flesh of his leg and did whatever other things Jesus had done.

Then came the Nazarean with his associates, and the Queen commanded the wise men to come. And Jesus standing before the Queen said, Concerning me David prophecied (Ps. xxii), For the dogs have compassed me, the assemblies of the wicked have besieged me. But it is also written concerning me (Jer. i, 8), Be not afraid of their faces, for I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the Lord. But the wise men contradicted him.

Ho said to the Queen, I shall ascend to heaven, for thus saith David concerning me (Ps. cviii), Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens. And he lifted his hands as if they were wings, and by repeating the Schem Hamphoras he flew up between heaven and earth.

When the wise men of Israel saw this they called upon Judah Scariot to pronounce the Schem Hamphoras and go up after him.

So he went up and wrestled with him, and both fell down; and the wicked one broke his arm. And for this cause every year the Christians wail before the paschal feast.

In that hour Israel took him and covering him with sackcloths struck him with a whip of pomegranate, saying to Queen Helena, If he be the son of God let him say who struck him. And he was unable to tell. Therefore the Queen said to the wise men, Lo, he is in your hands; do with him what is pleasing in your eyes.

Therefore they took him and led him out to hang him. But every stick of wood or tree on which he was placed was forthwith broken, because he by the Schem Hamphoras had conjured all wood so that it should not bear him up.

Then they went and brought the stem of a plant which is not wood, but an herb, and on that they hanged him.

Nor is it wonderful, for one of these plants grows so large in a single year, in the house of the Sanctuary, that it yields a hundred measures of seed.

The foregoing is but a part of what is known as the Sepher Toldoth Jeschu. This ancient Hebrew manuscript, after coming to light in the 13th century, was carefully concealed by the Talmudists. But the above portion was transcribed by a monk named Porchetus Salraticus and translated into German by Luther. Then in 1681 Prof. Wagenseil having obtained a copy of the Hebrew published it with a very rough Latin translation which I shall now render into English. SCHOLASTICUS

FOOD AND THE HUMAN BODY.—The basis of the science of food is in some degree uncertain. "No complete chemical examination of the total constituents of a healthy human body has yet been made," Prof. Church tells us, and the reason of this is obvious. We believe that in the course of the Franco-German war a number of soldiers killed in action were sent by the German authorities to an Italian laboratory. Whether the analyses were ever completed we do not know, but no results have been published. Meanwhile, we must be content with such approximations as have hitherto been made. It is probable that they are practically sufficient. The constituents of the human body, taking elements the names of which will be familiar to the general reader, rather than compound, are 16 in number, seven of them being metals, nine non-metallic. The metals weigh altogether(11 stone, or 154 pounds, being taken as the standard weight of the whole body) something less than five pounds, nearly four of which are calcium, the basis of lime, supplying the chief part of the bones and teeth. Of iron there are 65 grains, a small amount, but very important, as giving color to the blood. Among non-metallic elements, oxygen is the most important, amounting to no less than 109 pounds; and next to this, carbon, weighing not quite 19 pounds. Of phosphorus, which, if some physiologists are to be believed, supplies the motive power of the whole, there is 1 pound 12 ounces 25 grains. The weight of water in the body, to speak of compounds, not elements, is almost exactly the same as that of oxygen in the other list. The practical science of food is, of course, to keep up the supply of these substances to their normal quantity; and here comes in the function of chemistry, which having informed us what there is in the body, tells us what there is in each of the substances we commonly use to supply its needs.—The Spectator.

Christian Activity.—Sunday Schools.

MR. BENNETT: Is it not surprising that so little attention is paid by Liberals to the operations of their arch-foes—the Christians? An enemy is always on the alert to detect the movements of an enemy, in order to be prepared for strategy and surprise! Thus are our enemies on the lookout for us, but we seem not to be in the same defensive or offensive position. My mind, for the hundredth time, perhaps, has been called to this fact by the report of the numerous Christian Associations, now holding their anniversaries all over the country, in alliance with Christians all over the globe.

And first, as most prominent, is the universal effort in behalf of Sunday-schools. The "fifty thousand turn-out" in Brooklyn, May 23d, has no particular significance in itself, as children will attend any fête where a good time is expected and many parents likewise, whether religious or not, will sanction it, except as it shows the interest, effort, and expense adults will force themselves into for the sake of rendering assistence to the Church and keeping up the Christian religion. "All denominations joined in, except the Roman Catholics and High Church Episcopalians. All the public buildings were gaily decorated with flags in honor of the occasion. All the public schools were dismissed, in order that their pupils might participate." Fifty thousand children each lost one day of their school term, besides those who did not participate, making fifty thousand days of schooling lost, for which the public is taxed, and all for the purpose of filling the Church from its "nursery"—the Sunday-school. Liberals! how do you like this waste of the public money for the upbuilding of Zion and the extension of Christ's kingdom?

The fifty-fourth anniversary of the American Sunday School Union, held in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, was celebrated last week, by an immense concourse of people. Ex-governors, the president of Girard College, presidents of various societies, institutions, and corporations; military generals, physicians, doctors of divinity, from all parts of the United States, lent their presence to the movement, occupied the platform, and participated in the occasion. The report states that during the fifty-four years 430,541 teachers had been employed, with a membership of 2,890,103 children. When we remember the catechism of half a century ago, and the Sankey hymns of modern times, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," "Precious Name," "Only a step to Jesus," "Pass me not," "I will go and be forgiven," "Jesus paid it all," etc., need we be surprised at past bigotry and martyrdoms, and present zeal, persecution, and ostracism? No, only surprised that with such facts, our Liberals will send their children to these Sunday-schools, patronize and affiliate with them, instead of following the example of their enemy, and keeping them out of their reach till they are old enough to select for themselves. Why ever teach a child what it must or should unlearn?

At the anniversary in the Moravia Church, Philadelphia, May 22d and 24th, the question "How to retain children of members in the Church," was considered of sufficient importance to call out a longer discussion than all other propositions combined, was participated in by some dozen leading clergymen, and resulted in the following report:

The committee to whom was referred the paper relating to the question, "How shall the children of members be retained?" offered the following points for the consideration of the Conference: That the retention of the children of members in the Church is a matter which plainly calls for the exercise of parental authority and influence. The choice of Church connections on the part of the young is mainly a result of habit and associations, and it is within easy reach of parents by direct and indirect influence, by taking their children with them to church, by teaching them our distinctively Moravian hymns, and fostering an interest in the history and present condition of the Church, and its work, especially in the field of foreign missions, to accustom their children to regard the Church of their parents as, of course, their own.

The relation to the Church which is sustained by its baptized child-memberships should be clearly apprehended by pastors, elders, parents, and teachers in the Sunday-school, and the children themselves should be frequently reminded of their privileges and obligations in view of that same relation. They should be told that whilst their choice is to be free and thoroughly sincere, and in no respect compulsory, or a mere form, yet the Lord and the Church are waiting for them to become full members of the covenant into which they have been brought by baptism, by which they were solemnly set aside for Christ's service, and that for them to hesitate is to grieve him and to push away from themselves the privileges and pledges which are resting upon them. That, recognizing the very important functions which in our day the Sunday-school fills, or ought to fill, the principle deserves to be again and again enunciated that the Sunday-school is an integral part of the Church, and should have a positive and practical recognition as such; that such teachers only should be chosen as are competent to really instruct the minds and win the hearts of their scholars: that the introduction of some form of catechetical instruction, or, at least, of more distinct doctrinal teaching, is very desirable; that special meetings for the children, not as members of the routine Sunday-school, but as a part of the membership of the Church, and at a different time from that in which the sessions of the school are held, will be found to answer a good purpose.

That this Conference very heartily indorses the call for a Sunday-school convention, representing the first and second districts, which is to meet in August at Nazareth.

Then, again, when, in addition to all this, we see inducements held out to secure attendance by making every child a present, is it not surprising that our friends will be so blind as not to take warning? Not long ago we read of a Sunday-school celebration in the country, at Fagg's Manor, Pa., embracing twelve schools, and with two thousand persons in attendance. The beautiful story of Elisha (2. Kings, ii, 23, 24) was the subject of the address by the Rev. Mr. Pomeroy, from which "he drew some instructive lessons in regard to the sin of swearing and lying, for the children." We see not how, except to reprobate the prophet. The children did not swear nor lie, only said, "Go up, thou bald head," and "Elisha cursed them in the name of the Lord;" and forty-two of them were eaten by two bears in consequence of his cursing! How could such a moral be drawn from the story? Plainly a perversion of the text, gotten up for food for the little lambs.

Still further, as an inducement for these little "vipers of God's vengeance" to attend the Sunday-school: "Our pastor, who is full of the Sabbath-school spirit [what kind of spirit is that; the familiar spirit of the Bible, or the demon spirit of crazy Spiritualists?] offered a Bible [with a big 'B'] to every pupil who would commit the Shorter Catechism to memory. Ninety-five, in all, completed this task, and, consequently, received their rewards." What a reward! a fifty-cent Bible in their hands and the Westminster Catechism in their heads, including "In Adams fall we sinned all," and "God, for the manifestation of his glory, elected certain angels and men to everlasting happiness and others to everlasting death"—in short, teaches original sin, total depravity, election, preordination, the Trinity, the divinity of Christ, vicarious atonement, infant damnation, and endless punishment! Liberal parents, do you desire your children taught such doctrines? If you do not you must not send them to Presbyterian Sunday-schools, nor permit them to attend their religious celebrations. The Christians are wiser than yourselves; they are devising means to prevent their children from straying from the fold, while many parents of Liberal and Spiritualistic views are sending theirs right into the jaws of the enemy to be educated in the myths that they themselves regret they were taught or believed. No, no; you must not do this, unless you are willing they should be converted, as would seem Protestants are when they send their children into convents to be educated in order that they should become good Catholics—devout nuns and holy priests of the Catholic faith.

Hear what this same report closes with:

The Sabbath-school is doing a great work for the Church. It is assuming proportions of a gigantic character. The harvest-gathering each year is increasing. New schools are being opened. A greater interest is being manifested in all denominations to have Sabbath school instruction for the children. And we can see already that it is accomplishing vastly more than all the other agences of the Church. It is the great lever by which the moral world is to be moved. It is the regular systematic working department of the Church, an inside auxiliary, and should therefore be fostered by the Church. It is the human nursery from which the scions of immortality are transplanted to the field of the Church militant, and from there to the paradise of the Church triumphant. There is just as much divine authority for the Sabbath Scoool as there is for the Church. The same holy lips that said "go preach" also said "go teach." His particular notice and care for little children, and the displeasure with which he rebuked his disciples when they would hinder the little ones from being brought to him manifests his love for the lambs of his flock, and the blessed influence of early religious instructions. Parents are the divinely appointed guardians and instructors of their children, and these obligations rest upon them; but alas! how often are they incapable, or indifferent to discharge this duty.

"Human nursery," is it? we should rather say inhuman slaughter-house. Nursing babies into Christian mythologies! "Assuming proportions of gigantic character." Indeed it is, without which in another fifty-four years there would not be as many members in the "Church militant" as in 1878. "A regular systematic working department." Just so; and the little lambs must not be left to be devoured by the wolves of reason, science, and progressive evolution! "The harvest-gathering each year is increasing." Yes, yes, and not content with slaughtering your own innocents you must needs gather all the first-born from all outsiders, with which to replenish your Church through its "agency," its "nursery."

What lesson does this or ought this to teach us? That we ought to be up and doing, that the Church and the Young Men's Christian Association receive their recruits from the Sunday-scoool. Let them recruit, then, from their own ranks, not from ours, slaughter their own Innocents, not ours. We cannot afford to have our offspring, our youth, taught such pernicious doctrines, hired to become religious fanatics, fools, and hypocrites! No, no; teach the innocents law, order, the gospel truths of nature, and when they come of age the gospel-net of the Vicarious Atonement will not drag in many whose heads have been thus stored in opposition to the fables of Christendom.

P. S. The case of Rev. E. R. Craven against Rev. Mr. Lee, in the Presbytery of Newark and the Synod of New Jersey, was taken up in the Presbyterian General Assembly, Pittsburg, Pa., May 23d: "For introducing a woman into his pulpit, Oct 29, 1876, whom he permitted and encouraged, then and there, publicly to preach and teach." The proceedings are very interesting; also two other case which I will briefly report next week, if desired. E. E. G.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 45.

Great Jehovah, we were last inquiring of thee in reference to the superior morality of the teachings of thy son, and with thy permission we will continue the same.

Should he not have guaranteed religious freedom to all, and the right of every man to live up to the dictates of his own conscience?

Should he not have advocated equal social and civil rights to men and women? and in providing for a change in the Jewish divorce laws should he not have accorded the same facilities to women as to men?

On the other hand, was he known at any time to advocate the equal rights of women? and did he ever denounce the oppression by which they were despoiled of their dearest rights?

Would it not have been proper for him to have encouraged the mental and moral progress of the human race? Should he not have advised the study of the sciences, philosophy, and the arts—the great promoters of human progress and civilization?

Was he known during his earthly career to show any partiality to science and learning? and did he give any evidence that he possessed much knowledge upon those subjects?

As a great friend to the human race, would it not have been proper for him to have imparted new facts, new discoveries, and new inventions? Would he not thereby have furnished new truths, new light, and new understanding to the sons and daughters of men? By his not doing so, is it not fair to conclude that he knew little or nothing about them?

Did not Jesus merely reiterate the sayings and maxims that had been taught in the world hundreds of years earlier, without imparting any truth or any vital discoveries that the world had not possessed before?

Did he not fail to present any proofs that he possessed learning or knowledge superior to what other sages, philosophers, and reformers had exhibited before him?

Is there any proof whatever that he knew anything about the sciences of astronomy, geology, chemistry, mathematics, mechanics, biology, philology, psychology, or any of the other kindred branches of knowledge?

Is it unreasonable to think that the son of the Creator of the universe, who had dwelt from the dawn of eternity with his father, should know something about those great sciences which men have found to be of such great value? and are they not of far more consequence than the doctrines of a devil, hell fire, eternal torment and the unappeasable wrath of a merciful, loving God?

If it is true that Jesus taught the beautiful doctrine called the Golden Rule, "Do unto others as you would have others to do unto you," and while he is to be commended for giving utterance to such grand and noble sentiments, is it not also true that the same beautiful doctrines were taught long, long before he uttered them? Were they not just as beautiful from the mouths of others as from his?

Was not that beautiful maxim inculcated nearly a thousand years earlier by Buddha, five hundred years earlier by Confucius, Pythagoras, and Socrates, as well as by Hillel, and many others of the ancient teachers and moralists?

Was it not just as divine, just as beautiful, from their mouths, and just as worthy of the observation and adoration of men as when it proceeded from his lips?

Is it not a fair conclusion for a reasonable person to arrive at that Jesus was merely a kindly, amiable, well-disposed personage, but that he did not possess a greater share of divinity than hundreds and thousands of others who have lived in the world, that he could not truthfully boast of superior knowledge or learning, and that with his commendable traits of character he also exhibited defects and imperfections common to mere men?

Was it a mark of courtesy and mild manners on the part of Jesus when he was invited by a Pharisee to go home and dine with him, as narrated by Luke, that he should sit down to meat without washing his hands, as was the universal custom of the country, and when the matter was alluded to, that Jesus, instead of apologizing for his carelessness or forgetfulness, should at once go into invectives against his host and those of his class, calling them "fools" and denouncing them as being full of "ravening and wickedness"? Would not such conduct now be pronounced rude and ill-mannerly?

Was such a style of address calculated to make a kind-hearted host feel at ease, or to make a proud man any better? Was such language designed to have any effect but to exasperate the feelings and excite anger.

Does the fact that Matthew puts this attack on Pharisees, scribes, and lawyers in another place and on another occasion make the matter any better, or increase the probability of the narration? If Luke gives the expletives and sweeping invectives as having been used on one occasion, and Matthew on another, does it increase the truthfulness of the two accounts, or of either of them?

Is it not more probable that such harsh utterances were not made by a perfect person, and that their being assigned to two different occasions are marks of decided inaccuracies in the story?

Was it mild and Godlike in him to say "Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees! hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him two fold more the child of hell than yourselves"? Was it a peculiarity of the Scribes and Pharisees to compass sea and land to make a proselyte?

Was it amiability and geniality that caused him to exclaim: "Fill ye up also the measure of your fathers, ye serpents, ye spawn of vipers; how can ye escape the damnation of hell"? Would not such harshness be well fitted to a maniac, or at least a fanatic?

Are the following any better: "Woe unto you, blind guides!" "Child of hell!" "Serpents," "Engenderment of vipers," etc; "Ye shall receive greater damnation," etc.? Is it especially a mark of divinity to rail and denounce without reason?

Is not this of a similar intemperate character: "If God were your father, ye would love me! Ye are of your father, the devil, and the lust of your father ye will do; he was a murderer from the beginning; a liar and the father of lying"? Does not such language flowing spontaneously from a full heart rather indicate intemperance of expression than of winning love? Rather than to denounce the devil in such general terms, would it not have been more fair to point out instances where that character had committed murder, and where he had told lies? Is there any reliable instance on record where the devil has either murdered or lied?

Was not the expectation of reward the principal incentive used by Jesus to induce his followers to perform good deeds like giving alms? Should the desire for a reward really be the leading motive to prompt one to kindness and sympathy for our fellow-creatures? Did not many of the old pagan philosophers teach a higher system of morality than this?

Is to respond to an incentive of love or sympathy, without the hope of being rewarded for it, an ignoble or immoral trait that recompense should ever be held up as an inducement? Does not the perpetual obtrusion of a reward vitiate precepts that would otherwise be good?

Was it the highest and most truthful of promises that Jesus made when he said, "Ask and it shall be given you," as though every blessing a man needed or wished for came by the simple asking? Would it not have been far better to have instructed his hearers to make personal exertions for what they most desired? Is it not better now that youth and children be taught to toil and labor for the things they most desire; that their success in life depends largely upon their own exertions, and that they cannot expect to get much for the mere asking? Dost thou make a practice of turning aside from thy prescribed work and varying thy plans and intentions because certain persons ask thee to do this, that, or the other, as may please their fancy? Does importuning and pleading on the part of those who must necessarily know far less than thou dost what should be brought about make the slightest difference with thee in the conduct of thy affairs or the affairs of the world?

Was it not an indication of a want of knoweldge on the part of Jesus to consider such diseases as epilepsy, catalepsy, mania, various nervous diseases, and even dumbness, or lack of speech, as instances of the possession of the devil? Is it not reprehensible, in the light of modern science, to attribute to demons, spirits, genii, or fairies the various diseases which arise solely from natural causes? Does the devil have any more to do with a case of epilepsy than with an ordinary headache which arises from an overloaded stomach?

In teaching the parable of Dives and Lazarus, did he not inculcate an untrue theory, that a man like Dives, who by industry or good management had acquired a competence of the good things of this world, which thou hast provided in sufficient quantities, for a part of thy children at least, should be consigned to the tortures of hell therefor?

Are the habits of dressing handsomely and eating good dinners such direful offenses that for indulging in them a man should be made to suffer burning flames forever?

On the other hand, should a man be carried to Abraham's bosom and allowed to remain there forever simply because he had been poor, miserable, and worthless—who had not possessed energy enough to provide himself with the ordinary comforts of life—without other merit being ascribed to him? Is it indeed true that thriftiness is a crime to be punished with endless suffering, and improvidence and mendicancy virtues to be rewarded with eternal bliss?

Was it kind in old Abraham to taunt the rich man with his misfortunes in the sulphurous world, and virtually tell him it was all right that he should suffer, because he had had a comfortable living in this world?

Was it not a mistaken theory which Jesus inculcated that great virtue consisted in prayer, fasting, alms, vigils, demons, exorcism, mendicancy, feet-washings, not omitting the harsh metaphor about eating his body and drinking his blood? Can it be true that these crudities really constitute the basis of the highest order of morality?

Are they not all parts of pagan systems of religion, and have not the virtues of those forms of penance and self-inflictions been enjoined upon religious devotees for thousands of years?

Is it probable that Jesus impressed upon his disciples the value and importance of bearing the cross before he himself had borne his cross or had been impaled upon it? Was that not rather an after-thought and added to the gospel long after the crucifixion?

Was it an instance of high morality in Jesus, when about to enter Jerusalem, that he sent his two disciples into a village to take without permission an ass and colt they would find tied there?

Was not it just as wrong in principle for him to forcibly take another's property as for any other person to do so? Would it not have been better for him to have asked permission of the owner of the ass to use the same for a while?

Is it not a little singular that Matthew states that it was an ass and its colt, while Mark and Luke have it that it was a colt on which a man had never sat, and no ass?

Could the prophecy which Matthew quoted about the king of Sion sitting on an ass and a colt, the foal of an ass, have been correctly fulfilled in the way stated by Mark and Luke?

According to the way Matthew tells the story, was not that ride of Jesus the first two-horse act, or rather two-ass act on record? Does not Matthew say that they placed Jesus on both the ass and the colt?

Was it not rather an assinine affair in Matthew to write it an ass and colt, when two other equally veracious witnesses leave the ass out and name only the colt?

As this event was upon the occasion of Jesus entering Jerusalem, which, according to the first three gospels was the only time after his baptism that thy son entered Jerusalem, while John has it that he visited the city on four different occasions? If John was correct in his statement were not Matthew, Mark, and Luke wrong?

Was it a strictly truthful statement that Jesus made to his disciples when he told them if they had faith like a grain of mustard seed they could remove mountains?

Has an instance ever been known where faith to the amount even of several pounds of mustard seed moved as much as one ton of earth or rock from a mountain?

Is there a single instance where faith alone has ever moved anything or performed any kind of work where natural force was necessary?

Would it not have been far more true had Jesus told his disciples that had they faith like a mountain, they could not with that alone move a mustard seed?

Did Jesus tell the exact truth when describing the signs that should follow those that believed in him; to wit: that they should speak with new tongues; that they should take up serpents; and if they drank any deadly thing it should not hurt them?

Has that saying proved true since that day? Has it been the rule with those who have believed on him that they have been able to speak new languages, that they could handle venomous serpents without danger, and that they could drink the most deadly poison with perfect impunity?

Are there any among the most zealous believers in him of the present day who have confidence enough in his sayings to handle copperhead snakes, moccasins, and rattlesnakes?

Would they dare to drink a solution of strychnine, corrosive sublimate, or prussic acid? If they are afraid to do this, does it not argue, most clearly, that they are not true believers in thy son, or that he gave assurances that never were and never can be verified? Would not a copperhead snake or a dose of prussic acid take the same deadly effect upon a Christian as upon an unbeliever or a heathen?

Does believing or not believing any doctrine known in the world make the slightest difference as to the action of animal, mineral, or vegetable poison?

Is it not mischievous, and even worse, to hold out such untruthful representations that if fully believed might cause almost instant death?

Was it not a very extravagant statement which John made when, in dismissing the subject of Jesus and wishing to leave the impression that the events in the life of the latter were numerous, he made use of this expression: "And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written?"

Could not the actions of any one individual who has lived more than thirty-two years easily be all written in one large volume?

Though many millions of volumes have been printed, could not all the books that have yet been published be easily piled up on a single acre of land? Is it not then the height of absurdity to say that the whole world could not contain the books in which the acts of one young man should be written?

And are there not many other statements in the same volume which in a similar manner must be taken with very many grains of allowance?

THE Editor of this paper will deliver a lecture before the Liberal League at Newark, N. J., on Sunday afternoon next, the 16th inst. He hopes to meet on that occasion a goodly number of his Newark friends and patrons.

D. W. HULL will answer calls to lecture on scientific, theological, spiritual, and political subjects. Address him at Montgomery, Mich.

A Cause of Regret.

We are sorry to learn that the telegram which came on from Washington to the effect that the House Committee, to which had been referred the petition with seventy thousand signers, asking for the repeal or modification of the Comstock laws, had reported favorably for its repeal was a mistake, and that no such report was made. The Committee seemed to be in favor of letting the law remain as it is, without either repeal or modification. Thus the hopes of many will become depressed to sadness.

Perhaps it should not be expected by Liberals that a Christian Congress will pass such laws as the Liberals wish. We are informed that the Chairman of the Committee is a bigoted Christian, and that most of the members are orthodox in faith. It must not be expected, then, that they would be in favor of abrogating that which had been passed at the instance and by the influence of the Young Men's Christian Association and Comstock's Society for the Suppression of Vice. That Committee would undoubtedly decide by a unanimous vote that the Christian religion is true in every particular, and that all forms of heresy ought to be suppressed; that none of the "Demands of Liberalism" should be granted, and that no man can be a moral, exemplary member of society who is not in full sympathy with the Church. Under such a state of things, justice need not be expected.

It is very certain now that Congress will do nothing with the Comstock laws this session; but this should not deter earnest and honest Liberals from doing their duty in the premises. Let them remember that all reforms are accomplished with difficulty, and must at first move slowly. The anti-slavery movement, for instance, made but little progress for a term of years. But the indefatigable and indomitable heroes who had the good cause at heart worked on faithfully, and in good time the great reform was effected, and four millions of enslaved human beings were set at liberty, and freedom was made the rule of the land. Let us, then, all who claim to be lovers of justice, resolve not to slacken our efforts until the foul blot known as the Comstock laws are wiped out from the statute books of our country.

It will be seen, also, that the Supreme Court rendered a decision on the 3d instant on a case of appeal from this city touching the postal laws:

"The full opinion in the original case of A. Orlando Jackson, on petition to the Supreme Court of the United States for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari, has been filed by Justice Field, the other justices concurring. The petitioner was indicted in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, for knowingly and unlawfully depositing, on the 23d of February, 1877, in that district, in the mail of the United States, to be conveyed in it, a circular concerning a lottery, offering prizes, enclosed in an envelope, addressed to one J. Ketcham, at Gloversville, N. Y. He was subsequently tried, convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of $100, with the costs of the prosecution, and to be committed to the county jail until the fine and costs were paid. Upon his commitment, which followed, he presented to this court a petition, alleging that he was imprisoned and restrained of his liberty by the Marshal of the Southern District of New York under the conviction; that such conviction was illegal, and that the illegality consisted in this: that the Court had no jurisdiction to punish him for the acts charged in the indictment; that the act under which the indictment was drawn was unconstitutional and void; and that the Court exceeded its jurisdiction in committing him until the fine was paid. He therefore prayed for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Marshal to bring him before the Court, and a writ of certiorari to be directed to the clerk of the Circuit Court to send up the record of his conviction, that this Court might inquire into the cause and legality of his imprisonment.

"The writs were denied by the Court, on the ground that his imprisonment is legal. The decision is very elaborate, and reviews at length the legislation in relation to the mails affecting the case. Following are the points decided:

"First: The power vested in Congress to establish "Post Roads and Post-Offices" embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country. Under it Congress may designate what shall be carried in the mails, and what shall be excluded.

"Second: In the enforcement of regulations excluding matter from the mails a distinction is to be made between different kinds of mail matter; between what is intended to be kept free from inspection, such as letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage, and what is open to inspection, such as newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, purposely left in a condition to be examined.

"Third: Letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage in the mails can only be opened and examined under like warrant, issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particulary describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household. The constitutional guarantee of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be.

"Fourth: Regulations against transportation in the mails of printed matter which is open to examination, cannot be enforced so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is essential to that freedom. When, therefore, printed matter is excluded from the mails, its transportationin any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress.

"Fifth: Regulations excluding matter from the mails may be enforced through the courts, upon competent evidence of their violation obtained in other ways than by the unlawful inspection of letters and sealed packages; and with respect to objectionable printed matter, open to examination, they may in some cases also be enforced by the direct action of the officers of the postal service upon their own inspection, as where the object is exposed and shows unmistakably that it is prohibited, as in the case of an obscene picture or print.

"Sixth: When a person is convicted of an offense, and sentenced to pay a fine, it is within the discretion of the court to order his imprisonment until the fine is paid,"

It will be seen that a part of the decision above is in opposition to the ground we have maintained, that Congress has not the constitutional right to exclude matter from the mail on moral grounds. We still adhere to our belief in this matter, though the judges are against us. A part of the decision, however. is in our favor, and must tend to place a check upon the high-handed operations of Anthony Comstock. The most that can be hoped for for the present is that the Comstock laws are fast becoming a dead letter so far as the liberty of the press and freedom of speech are concerned. It will be well to have these terms well defined, as well as what "immorality" and "obscenity" really are.

Just as we go to press we receive a card from Mr. E. H. Heywood as follows:

"PRINCETON, MASS., June 10, 1878.

"DEAR MR. BENNETT: Rumor says, with seeming truth, that the whole process of appeal is overruled, and that I am to be sentenced this week. Will send you particulars as soon as they reach me. Bate no jot of your just and timely demand for entire repeal of the 'obscenity law.'

"Truly yours as ever, E. H. HEYWOOD."

It is to be hoped that Mr. Heywood will escape lightly, and that the country will not be further disgraced by sending another innocent man to prison. But, friends of mental liberty, we are still, to a great extent, in the hands of our Christian enemies, and it is no time for us to be apathetic or lifeless. Let us put our trust in universal right, and "keep our powder dry."

THOSE who have ordered copies of "The Champions of the Church," and have not remitted the price, are respectfully requested to do so at an early day. The volume will soon be out, and we wish to mail them to all who have ordered without delay as fast as the funds are sent in. It is a volume of 1,100 pages, and will be richly worth the moderate price asked for it. Those are fortunate who secure a copy of it. We would be glad to receive one thousand more orders from those not yet heard from. It seems to us there are that number who have not ordered, but who ought to do so.

THE First Religio-Philosophical Society of Hillsdale county will hold their twelfth annual festival at Clear Lake, Steuben county, Ind., on Saturday and Sunday, June 22d and 23d, 1878. The Island House with its spacious hall and fine parlors with all the groves and grounds adjoining have been engaged for the purpose. Dr. D. W. Hull, late of Portland, Me., and Prof. Glasser, of Bryan, Ohio, and other speakers will address the meeting on the live issues of the day. Refreshments will be furnished by the society in the grove and at the hotels. Friends from a distance will be provided for. By order of the Executive Board.

NORA RAY, THE CHILD MEDIUM, is the title of an interesting Spiritualistic story of fourteen chapters and 170 pages, published by Proctor Brothers, Gloucester, Mass. The child Nora was abducted from her plantation home in South America, and left inside the porch doors of a New England home on a Christmas eve. It was thought by the instigators of this vile plot that they would succeed to her birthright and inheritance; but according to the story the child was watched over by invisible friends, and she was ultimately placed in possession of the inheritance to which she was entitled. It will suit Spiritualists who like an interesting story. Price 50 cents, by mail.

CHRIST THE CORNER STONE OF SPIRITUALISM is the title of a pamphlet by J. M. Peebles, M.D., published by James Burns, London, which has been forwarded to us by Messrs. Colby & Rich, Boston, who have it for sale. Its divisions are "The Talmudic proofs of Jesus' existence. Who was Jesus? The distinction between Jesus and Christ. The moral estimate that leading American Spiritualists put upon Jesus of Nazareth. The commands, marvels, and Spiritual gifts of Jesus Christ. The philosophy of salvation through Jesus Christ. The belief of Spiritualists and the Church of the future." It is largely composed of citations from the Bible referring to Jesus. Though not in our style or line of belief, it will doubtless prove interesting to our Spiritualistic friends.

IN calling attention to the advertisement of "Burns' Phonic Shorthand" on another page we have pleasure in saying that the lectures of Prof. Adler now appearing in this paper are taken down in this method of shorthand by D. W. Craig, assistant stenographer at police headquarters, and also that the addresses of Mrs. Hyzer before the Spiritualistic Society of Brooklyn, which are printed in various Spiritualistic papers, are reported stenographically by a lady who is an accomplished writer of Burns' Phonic Shorthand. Mrs. Hyzer is an inspirational and very rapid speaker. This statement is made in order that persons ordering the work may feel assured that in studying from its pages they are learning an approved, efficient, and standard system of phonography.

Babbitt's "Principles of Light and Color."

This superb volume which we have examined a little further than when we previously mentioned it, has made its appearance, and opens up a great field of original research, demonstrating as it does the very form and working of atoms, and the basic principles of Chemistry and Therapeutics. The examples of cure by means of light, color, and other fine natural forces which it gives are truly marvelous, and a new world generally unknown to our medical men is opened out. If followed up, such a work should save many doctor's bills by showing how to use these safe, powerful and refined elements. The work contains 576 pages, and a great number of beautiful plates and engravings, being equal on the whole to books which usually sell for $5 although it is put at $4. It is published by Babbitt & Co., Science Hall, N. Y., or will be furnished by ourselves at publishers' price. Postage free. We quote the following notice of the book from the American Bookseller:

"The Principles of Light and Color" is the most remarkable book we have seen in a long time, and one which, if we do not mistake, will cause a flutter among scientists, and lead to new and important developments. The new theories offered by the author will certainly not be accepted without close scrutiny, but they at least deserve that scrutiny, and of our best scholars. They are the result of years of study and experimentation, and if they can be overthrown at all, it will take no little scientific as well as logical skill. The introductory chapter is devoted to the harmonic laws of the universe, the author pointing out this unity or parallelism of all of nature's laws, illustrating by numerous examples in music, architecture, painting, physiology—in fact, gleaning from the whole field of nature and art. We cannot do justice in a brief notice to the author's charming illustrations of the principle that perfection in art, as well as nature, consists of a proper combination of gradation and contrast. The division of colors, and the whole discussion of them will delight the heart of the artist, and he must be a dull reader who cannot derive pleasure from a perusal of this chapter. Some of the author's new theories are here stated, as, for instance, that as in music the scale is duplicated, indefinitely, so the septave scale of colors is duplicated by a scale of invisible colors. The most of the chapter, however is given up to showing that nature's great and universal law of harmony is the equilibrium of the principles of Unity and Diversity. In the second chapter the writer shows the insufficiency of the present theories of light and force. Scientists have confined themselves too much to results or external specialties, as Agassiz once admitted; they have failed to find general laws for the causes of things. It is easy to say that the particles of zinc, for instance, are held together by cohesion, and that they are torn apart by chemical affinity when the metal is immersed in sulphuric acid, but no one has yet defined either cohesion or chemical affinity. So it is with electricity, gravitation, and all the forces of nature; we know what they do, but not what they are. The accepted theories relating to them, and also to light and color and heat, our author holds to be wrong, and gives some very striking reasons. He holds, also, that the cause of all the false reasoning of scientists is found in their failure to ascertain the atomic constitution of things, and in their ignoring the dual nature of the universe in their efforts to divorce matter from force. It will be seen that Dr. Babbitt discusses many other things beside light and color. In his investigation of these he was led to the discovery of the uniform laws here set forth, and these affect all science. In seeking the sources of light and color, and the laws which govern them, he discovered the Etherio-Atomic Laws of Force, which are here set forth with much detail and plausible argument, and are shown to harmonize with all the known facts of science. Briefly, the theory is that there are many different kinds of ethers in space, through which the various forces are propagated, by a peculiar motion of the atoms about atoms. This motion is uniform, and he makes it account for all the phenomena of the forces. No description short of an essay can do justice to this theory; indeed, it can hardly be criticized at all offhand. It is ingenious and able, the result of much study and research, plausible, and, after the first principles are mastered, easy to accept and difficult to combat. Withal, it is made very interesting, even to the unscientific reader. He applies his theory not only to the phenomena of the earth, but also to the formation, movements, and conditions of the heavenly bodies, and in this portion of the work there is much to interest astronomers. In succeeding chapters, he discusses at length Chromo-Chemistry, Chromo-Therapeutics or Chromopathy, Chromo-Culture of Vegetable Life, Chromo-Philosophy, Chromo-Dynancies or higher grade lights and forces, and Chromo-Mentalism, and a whole chapter is given to Vision. The portion on Chromo-Chemistry is ably written, and that on Chromo-Theraputics, showing the influence of light and color on mind and body, is full of interest. Some of the statements made under the head of Chromo-Mentalism are startling, but there is very little speculation without logical reasoning. As we have said, it is impossible to do the book justice in a short notice. The field covered is so vast, and the theories propounded so important, that an adequate idea of the whole can only be given in an extended review. It is illustrated by no less than two hundred photo-engravings, and a number of magnificent colored plates. The author's views as to the effect of color upon the eyes are carried out in printing the book on a dark pearl or diluted sky-blue paper."

I TELL YOU there is no God; that creation is a chimera that the eternity of a universe would be as inconvenient as the eternity of a spirit; that, because I cannot conceive how motion can have engendered a world, which it has doubtless the power of sustaining (or maintaining), it is absurd to raise the difficulty by the supposed existence of a being that I understand no better; that, if the members of the physical order betray a certain intelligence, the disorders that reign in the moral order annihilate all Providence. I tell you that, if all be the work of a God, all should be as perfect as possible; for, if all be not as perfect as possible, then that God must be powerless to make it so or unwilling that it should be so. It is then for the best that I am not more enlightened with regard to his existence: this admitted, what need have I of your knowledge? Even were it as clearly, as it is imperfectly, demonstrated; that all evil is the source of some good; that it was well that a Britannicus, that best of princes, thould perish; that a Nero, the most evil among men, should reign, how would you prove to me that it would have been impossible to attain the same ends without making use of the same means? To permit vice to add by contrast to the beauty of virtue is but a weak gain for so real a loss. "Theos," says the Atheist, "is what I object to; what have you to answer?—that I am a wretch, and that if I had nothing to fear from God, I would not deny his existence." Leave that phrase to mouthing orators, it might shame the truth; urbanity forbids it, and it shows but scant charity. Because a man is wrong in not believing in God, are we right in abusing him? Men have recourse to invectives when they fail in proofs. Between two controvertists, a hundred to one may be staked that he in the wrong will loose his temper. "Thus there was then something other than the appearance of bread and wine, else the poison must have incorporated itself into the body and blood of Jesus Christ.

Mrs. Besant's Plea for her Child.

HER CRITICISM OF THE MOTIVES OF THE JUDGE WHO SEPARATED HER FROM HER CHILD.—SOMETHING ABOUT PUBLIC IDEAS OF MORALITY.

[Letter to the National Reformer.]

During the long struggle which began in March, 1877, no word has escaped me against the respective judges before whom I have had to plead. Some have been harsh, but, at least, they have been fairly just, and even if a sign of prejudice appeared, it was yet not sufficient to be a scandal to the bench. Of Sir George Jessel, however, I cannot speak in terms even of respect, for in his conduct towards myself he has been rough, coarse, and unfair to an extent that I never expected to see in any English Judge. Sir George Jessel is subtle and acute, but he is rude, overbearing, and coarse. He has the sneer of a Mephistopheles mingled with a curious monkeyish pleasure in inflicting pain. Sir George Jessel prides himself on being "a man of the world," and he expresses the low morality common to that class when the phrase is taken in its worst sense; he holds, like the "men of the world" who "see life" in Leicester Square and the Haymarket, that women are kept chaste only through fear and from lack of opportunity; that men may be loose in morals if they will, and that women are divided into two classes for their use—one to be the victims and the toys of the moment, the other to be kept ignorant and strictly guarded, so as to be worthy of being selected as wives. Sir George Jessel considers that a woman becomes an outcast from society because she thinks that women would be happier, healthier, safer, if they had some slight acquaintance with physiology, and were not condemned, through ignorance, to give birth to human lives fore-doomed to misery, to disease, and to starvation. Sir George Jessel might have been surprised, had he been in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, on the following day, and had seen it filled with men and women, quiet looking, well dressed, and respectable, and had heard the cries of "Shame on him!" which rang round the hall when his brutal remark was quoted. Such language only causes a reaction towards the insulted person even among those who would otherwise be antagonistic, and Sir George Jessel has ranged on my side many a woman who, but for him, would have held aloof.

Sir George Jessel is a Jew; he thinks that a parent should be deprived of a child if he or she withhold from it religious training. Two hundred years ago, Sir George Jessel's children might have been taken from him because he did not bring them up as Christians; Sir George Jessel and his race have been relieved from disabilities, and he now joins the persecuting majority, and deals out to the Atheist the same measure dealt to his forefathers by the Christians. The Master of the Rolls pretended that by depriving me of my child he was inflicting no punishment on me. If the Master of the Rolls have any children, he must be as hard-hearted in the home as he is on the bench if he would not feel that any penalty was inflicted on him if his little ones were torn from him and handed over to a Christian priest, who would teach them to despise him as a Jew and hate him as a denier of Christ. Even now Jews are under many social disabilities, and even when richly gilt, Christian society looks upon them with thinly-concealed dislike. The old wicked prejudice still survives against them, and it is with shame and with disgust that Liberals see a Jew trying to curry favor with Christian society by reviving the obsolete penalties once inflicted on his own people.

Of one thing Sir George Jessel and his Christian friends may be sure, that neither prosecution nor penalty will prevent me from teaching both Atheism and Malthusianism to all who will listen to me; and since Christianity is still so bigoted as to take the child from the mother because of a difference of creed, I will strain every nerve to convert the men and women around me, and more especially the young, to a creed more worthy of humanity.

Sir George Jessel pretended to have the child's interests at heart; in reality he utterly ignored them. I offered to settle £110 a year on the child if she was placed in the charge of some trustworthy and respectable person, but the Master did not even notice the offer. He takes away the child from plenty and comfort, and throws her into comparative poverty; he takes her away from most tender and watchful care, and places her under the guardianship of a man so reckless of her health that he chose the moment of her serious illness to ask for her removal; he takes her away from cultured and thoughtful society to place her among half-educated farmers. Nay, he goes further: Dr. Drysdale's affidavit stated that it was absolutely necessary at present that she should have her mother's care; and Sir George Jessel disregards this, and, in her still weak state, drags her from her home and from all she cares for and throws her into the hands of strangers. If any serious results follow, Sir George Jessel will be morally, though not legally, responsible for them. In her new home she can have no gentle womanly attendance. No Christian lady of high character will risk the misconstruction to which she would be exposed by living alone at Sibsey Vicarage with a young clergyman who is neither a bachelor nor a widower; the child will be condemned either to solitary neglect at home or to the cold strictness of a boarding-school. She is bright, gay, intelligent, merry now. What will she be at a year's end? My worst wish for Sir George Jessel is that the measure he has meted out to me may, before he dies, be measured out to him or his.

ANNIE BESANT.

RECENTLY in Ottawa, Kansas, a citizen of Olatha was fined, under a license law, seven dollars, including costs, for selling the work "Fruits of Philosophy," and would have been prosecuted, under a State law, for selling obscene literature, but for the Liberals of the place advising him to leave, being poor and unable to stand law expenses. The prosecution was no doubt instigated by priestly bigots and their dupes, whose spirit is of the sixteenth century, instead of the nineteenth. This is one of the beauties of a place ruled by sectarian bigots and their tools. Verily, where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise!

Letters from Friends.

T. C. LELAND AND "THE INDEX" ONCE MORE.

MR. EDITOR: I might also add now to the foregoing caption, "and THE TRUTH SEEKER," for my article in this week's TRUTH SEEKER (May 25th) seems to have stirred up your own sensibilities as well as those of Mr. Leland; nevertheless it is not my intention to enter into a long controversy, deeming it entirely superfluous. For your own animadversion I may very well leave unanswered, since I referred to the Paine Memorial matter, that agitated you so much, merely as an instance of the folly of Liberal papers' quarrels, and stated nothing but what everybody will accept as irrefutable truth. The subject of your past quarrels with The Investigator I did not touch at all, nor did I say whether you were right or wrong in them. I spoke simply of these unwise quarrels of Liberals papers with each other, and of the pernicious folly of such pickerings; that was all. If you, nevertheless, find yourself stung by my quite impersonal and general remarks, and think it necessary to defend your course in that affair, it was neither my intention to praise or censure it (otherwise than in the foregoing relation), nor is it my fault. It indicates merely a weak spot, if not a bad conscience, on your part.

In regard to Mr. L's "comments" on my letter, as far as they refer to my charges against him, I need likewise not to say much. My letter is now before the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as well as his of the 11th inst.; I may, then, confidently leave it to their judgment whether his said letter was friendly and just to The Index and Mr. Abbot, or otherwise; whether it deserves my rebuke or not; and whether what I said was correct or erroneous. And though it is true that, as he in his attempted self-justification says, my article concerning Mr. H. C. Neville's appeared three or four months ago (The Index, Jan. 10), and, consequently, did not refer to his (N's) fanatical article, "Purification of Liberalism," yet it was, at least, on a very similar subject, to wit, "Perverted Liberalism." That, Mr. Editor, is, however, not the real point by no means. I censured Mr. L. for intimating in his letter and by his language that Mr. Abbot was too prejudiced and biased to allow a rejoinder to Mr. N.'s attack on Liberalism and Liberals, and that "even if any one should write one and send it to him he would refuse to publish it." Mr. Leland states then, further, in his "comments" on my letter, "I knew of at least one article sent to The Index on the subject [and refused], and presumed that there were others. I now know there were several, and among them, 'a bird in the air' tells me, was one from Mr. Einstein which was not published." Now, sir, this last is true. But either Mr. Leland did not listen long and patiently enough to his "bird in the air," or his "bird" was not well enough informed itself, else he might also have learned from it that I, myself, told Mr. Abbot, when I sent him this unpublished article, that I did not care much if he chose not to publish it. The subject was so similar to my first (and published) article that I hesitated to write again at all on it. But it seems rather mysterious to me how that "bird in the air" could be so familiar with what was going on in The Index office, and yet not know, and also tell Mr. L. that I wrote thus to Mr. Abbot.

In regard to my "glass house of brittle grammar," I will say that, as Mr. Leland is a well-educated native American, and, hence, ought to know English grammar better than I do, I will readily yield him the palm in English grammar, as he, no doubt, even if he knew any German at all, probably will, for the same reason, yield it to me in German grammar. Yet, I think I know enough of English grammar to write that language understandingly—I think no one will find any difficulty to understand this letter—and to know that "Nobody has 'discussed' [it—N.'s article] or at least nobody that The Index would print" is bad English as well as bad German grammar, Mr. L. to the contrary notwithstanding. So I, too, "will stand by my grammar" as well as he by his.

But, Mr. Editor, I can and will not stand by my orthography as it appears in THE TRUTH SEEKER, though very well as I wrote it in my letter. In that respect you made several blunders. In line three of my (printed) letter you had "jealousness" where I wrote "jealousies; in line nine you print "growls" where I wrote "quarrels;" and in the third paragraph, line nine, you print "The Index and his editor" where I wrote, "and its editor." This is all I will say on the subject.

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

MR. LELAND'S REPLY.

Mr. Einstein's criticisms are too trivial to be worth much attention. My language, I am sure, conveyed no such impression to anybody but Mr. Einstein. If I were writing now, with his keen eye for unintended meanings before me, I should say: "At least nobody that The Index has as yet printed." That is what I meant; and I did not mean "would print" in the sense of arbitrarily or unjustly excluding any communication. Mr. Abbot, I know, maintains a free platform. Illiberality in that regard is not one of his faults, and is not the complaint I have to make of him.

As to grammar, mine, in the sentence crititicized, is correct according to English usage; and I recommend Mr. Einstein not to take the risk of criticizing an English writer where the chances are that the writer knows what he is about. On the other hand, both his grammar and his orthography in his last letter are incorrect. For instance, what can be made of such a sentence as this: "As an instance of this I will now only refer to the Paine Memorial Building matter, which ought to and might have all been settled satisfactorially more than two years ago; but instead of it, and owing mainly to these foolish jealousies and quarrels, the building is this day yet burdened with a heavy debt and mortgage—as large as is the burning shame for Liberals not to have wiped it out long ago."

Then, as to spelling, there is no such word as "pickerings," which occurs with the "p" plainly written in his previous letter and in the one above. I suppose he means "bickerings." Probably that is a spelling he will conclude, after some study, that he won't stand by. He does, indeed, write well enough to be understood; but my point is that he is not quite that thoroughly trained expert in grammar as to be in all points qualified to set up as a critic.

T. C. L.

A WORD BY THE EDITOR.

The three errors which Mr. Einstein thinks our printers made in his former letter were as much his as theirs. He doubtless meant "quarrels," but his manuscript looks more like "growls." In the word "jealousies" the printers did make a mistake. But in the third paragraph his manuscript reads "The Index and his editor," if it reads anything. We will return the manuscript to its author for his own satisfaction. If he can make its of h-i-s, he surpasses us in construction. As regards our finding ourselves "stung" by his remarks about quarrels, etc., we are happy to assure the gentleman that we are not badly stung. No swelling nor inflammation has taken place, and not even much itching. It was hardly a flea-bite. His insinuations about a "weak spot" and a "bad conscience" were hardly called for.

SNOWVILLE, VA., May 26, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I am so much pleased with the "Mother of Harlots," which thee was so kind as to send me, that I wish to say a word to others in commendation of it as a book containing more facts damaging to the Roman Catholic Church and its priests and rulers than any other I have ever read. It is far the best of the "Holy Cross" series. Mr. Hogan, having been a confessing priest for twenty-five years, knows whereof he writes. His revealments cost him peace, security, and even life itself; and after sacrificing his all to warn the world of the deeds, plans, and aims of popery, we cannot do less than to read and heed his unmasking of the wily schemes of the most dishonest and treacherous class of men that has ever cursed the world—the Catholic priesthood. It is easy to call names, but when these epithets are backed by hundreds of facts such as Hogan tells us, we feel that language is utterly inadequate to express our detestation and abhorrence of deeds so black and vile. A few quotations may not be amiss as a specimen of what cannot be too widely or too universally known:

"Catholicism says, 'The pope can do all things which he wishes, and is empowered by God to do many things which he himself cannot do'! This makes the pope greater and more powerful than any other being can possibly be! Gods and devils are nothing when placed in comparison with Mr. Popey!

"'A pope cannot commit even sin without praise.'

"'The Roman Church is never wrong and will never fall into error.'

"Every priest in the Roman Church invokes the curse of heaven on every non-Catholic in the world on the Thursday before Good Friday of every year.

"An oath of allegiance to any power save the pope himself is always taken by every Catholic with a mental reservation.

"If a Catholic confesses his resolve to commit murder, his confessor has no power to hinder him, or to make known the contemplated crime."

As this Church was in its infancy, such she still remains, for as its head is infallible, it can never improve, progress, or change. This one volume "Popery Dissected, or the Mother of Harlots," is enough to make every truth-loving person forever abhor and despise every Catholic priest in the world! Other men may be innocent of willful deception and voluntary crime, but no Catholic priest can be so, for his oaths compel him to daily and continual sin. There is no escape, no way out of it, save by renouncing the whole thing, and breaking loose from them entirely; and few dare do this, especially if they possess damaging information. Their life is at stake, and there is no rest for the sole of their foot. Such is Catholicism; and Protestantism has only evoluted on a little way ahead of it.

Every blow struck at the root of the old tree helps to destroy its branches. Read, reflect, and be wise in time, and let us each and all bless and thank our industrious, hard-working, and good champion, D. M. Bennett, for his noble effort towards enlightening the world by publishing so many eye-openers. Remember too, that each book we buy helps to open a way for the publishing of more.

Respectfully, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

MOOSIC, PA., May 29, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am afraid Mr. Abbot is suffering from the same disease as that which attacked S. W. Payne with such direful results. I sincerely hope that he may recover before worse symptoms set in. It is unfortunate for him that he has cast such a reflection on Col. Ingersoll. Lawyers are not in the habit of signing documents without a knowledge of their contents.

ED. H. HOUSE.

CENTRAL, S. C., May 13, 1878.

DEAR BENNETT: I have just sold one copy each of the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," "Exeter Hall," and "Outcast." I am sorry I can't send you more, but money is so scarce, and superstition so plenty, that a Freethinker has a "rough road to Jordan." There are a great many people in this section who love to borrow and read Freethought literature. They like THE TRUTH SEEKER, speak in high terms of its editor, acknowledge his defense of Liberalism unanswerable, but just ask one of them to subscribe or buy a book and they show the "white feather" in an instant and step back into the ranks of respectable cowards. I am sorry to see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that "Scar Face Tony" is still on your track, not that I fear he can do you any serious injury, but then no gentleman likes to have a skunk in his parlor. I am well pleased with your handling of that double-refined, high-toned Liberal, H. Clay Neville the First. I guess he is about twenty-four carets fine in his own estimation or weighed in the Comstock balance. And since he is so spotless in purity I presume he will be entitled to a friend in the Comstock court, and a membership in the Payne, Peterson, and Index ring.

Well, Brother Bennett, do you know that I have become thoroughly disgusted with pseudo-Liberals? I despise a coward, for "he who conceals a truth betrays a trust," and when a man takes me to one side or behind the door and says, "Loan me your TRUTH SEEKER, or the 'Age of Reason'" (Thomas Paine's), or any other Liberal work, I at once conclude that I am in the company of a hypocrite, and would gladly swap him off for a gospel chicken-eater. I did not know until recently that we had so many in the Liberal ranks who are willing to "hold with the hare and run with the hounds," and I hope you will continue to handle and expose all such in the same manner you have Mr. Neville, notwithstanding they may be backed and bolstered up by all the Paynes, Petersons, Abbots, and Comstocks in the land. Don't be discouraged; your labors in the cause of truth have been honorable and untiring; your name is a household word in thousands of families; you have more friends to-day than you had yesterday; you will have more to-morrow than you have to-day. True it is an occasional Sturm may say, "Stop my paper," an occasional Index may pick flaws, and Payneful falsehoods may sometimes assail you, but you have already proved yourself more than a match for all your enemies. Every time (as a friend of mine remarked yesterday) that they attack you they find the contract too large.

I now close with my best wishes for your peace and prosperity. I shall continue to do all I can for you by selling your publications or obtaining subscribers. True I can do but little, but that little I do cheerfully.

Please send me the "Infidels Text Book" by Cooper.

Fraternally thine, R. M. Casey.

Long Lake, Minn., June 6, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: As a Liberal I am very sorry for the misunderstanding (if misunderstanding it is) between yourself and Mr. Abbot. I have taken The Index since its first issue, and The Truth Seeker since January last, so that I claim to be posted on all that pertains to the dispute between you and Mr. Abbot concerning that petition. I further claim the ability to take a common sense view of the controversy between you, and here I put myself on record as being unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly on your side of the question. I sincerely regret that our two most prominent Liberal editors should differ so seriously, giving cause to the enemy "to speak reproachfully," and still I believe that but for the misrepresentations of The Index, outsiders would have viewed it as my friends here do, that the petition was got up in the interest of liberty, morality, and justice. Then the question arises as to how came Mr. Abbot to take so perverted a view of it? I have studied mankind a little, and I think I know: Mr. Bennett, you are too popular as a Liberal publisher; your petition secured more than five times as many names in three months as the petition emanating from The Index office obtained in three years: and I must say here that I was very much interested in the success of both petitions, and spent several days in getting signatures to them, still that would only account for a feeling of jealous opposition, and not for the vindictiveness exhibited in some of the late editorials of The Index. Alas, for poor human nature! I have looked upon the efforts of our leading Liberal editors, writers, and lecturers to enlighten our people as a promise of good things to come; a promise of a just and permanent government, untainted or unmixed by Christianity or any other religion, and of a virtuous and happy people, still I have hope in that promise, but storm-clouds sometimes obscure our horizon. Again, about that petition: I tell you, sir, that no amount of sophistry and special pleading on the part of Mr. Abbot or anybody else, will change the common sense views of people who have read or heard both sides. Mr. Abbot knows in his soul that you and the majority of those who signed that petition are as virtuous and as much opposed to the spread of obscene literature or obscenity in any form as he is. Then why such a perversion of truth and fact? Echo answers, why? But let that suffice. I know you are abundantly able to vindicate your position and keep your readers posted. You seldom hear from your friends in the big woods of Minnesota, although some of us hear from you every week. There are five in my immediate neighborhood besides myself, all Spiritualists, who take The Truth Seeker. We like you all the better for investigating our philosophy as you sometimes do, because we know it is true; but were you indifferent as to its truth or falsity, as some editors appear to be, we would take your truth-seeking, truth-finding paper all the same. I very seldom write for a paper, am sixty-six, about old enough to die, but I am in no hurry about it. There is much industry required here to make comfortable homes, and I am able to work some yet. As to Comstock and Payne, you would not probably print what I might say of those miscreants. Ever yours in the love of truth, William Archibald.

Dear Friend Bennett: The defense of that petition—which has so irritated the "cultured" cuticle of Mr. Abbot—and its "70,000" signers, may be safely left to you and Mr. Leland, but I think it is the duty of every one, that can possibly do so, to defend their own deliberate acts. From his long silence I had most sincerely hoped that Mr. Abbot had seen the pernicious error that he had committed, and though too self-sufficient to acknowledge it openly, was doing the best he could—keeping quiet. But I was hugging a fond delusion, for according to your statement, on the 16th ult., he breaks out and is more violent, insulting, and unjust than ever, charging all who signed and defended the petition, as being in favor of obscenity. This is so grossly mean and unjust that I feel justified in hurling it into the teeth of Mr. Abbot, and tell him that he lies, and that most cruelly. Does the gentleman (?) in question, think for one moment that all those signers lack discrimination, purity, and honesty? Hardly possible, and yet he is trying to persuade his readers that such is the case, which places him in a position which the most contemptible politician in the country would scarcely envy. How low have the mighty fallen! But this comes of "culture" and refinement lacking sufficient backbone to enable it to stand up for a cause, however just it may be, so long as it is unpopular, and not sanctioned by the Church and Mrs. Grundy. I have long believed in a higher culture for the masses, but if, as it would seem, should they get it, it is going to rob them of their sturdy independence and hatred of all shams and injustice, and fill them with a spirit of pusillanimity, why I shall rather advocate that they be taught to love liberty, and to hate tyranny, injustice, and hypocrisy, wherever found. In conclusion, I would say to Mr. Abbot and the readers of his paper, and those of The Truth Seeker, too, that I am more proud to day that my name is on that petition than I was three months ago, because I have seen to what lengths Comstock and his supporters can go in pursuit of money and revenge—two things very dear to their pious souls. I hope and trust that Congress will pay that respect and attention to the petition that its signatures demand. Yours for right and justice, Jno. Warr.

Dufferin College,
London, Ont., June 6, 1878.

Dear Sir: In one or two numbers of The Truth Seeker, which I came across by chance a few months since, there appeared to be running through a series of articles entitled (if I remember rightly) "Things I do not Believe." They seemed to me to be of considerable practical value, and, as a contributor to the Toronto Freethought Journal, they would be of great service to me for reference in dealing—as I have proposed to myself to deal—with a succession of biblical episodes. They seem to contain many valuable hints. Are they published by you in book or pamphlet form? and, if so, would you kindly forward them to me, and I will immediately remit the amount?

Permit me to express to you my admiration of the calm and dignified firmness with which you meet the sometimes crude and vulgar attacks on your liberty of thought in regard to Spiritualism. I cannot call myself a Spiritualist, though I have seen something of its manifestations and claims. My state of mind in that connection is, in fact, very nearly your own, but I do not find that a suspended judgment damages logical power. But I am indignan when any section of Freethinkers falsifies its claim to its title by degenerating into the violence and intolerance of orthodoxy.

This is the tendency. I notice that Materialists, and Spiritualists alike, are falling into this snare and forgetting the common ground on which we all meet, that of the destruction of the orthodox insolence, which they are imitating, to their infinite discredit. There is, as Edward Maitland says, or should be, no limit to personal freedom but the line which marks interference with the personal freedom of others. I forget the exact words, but that is the sense.

I met a very estimable Freethinker a few months ago whose natural abilities were probably far superior to my own. But his opportunities for reading had been so limited that, by mere force of superior information, I felt myself, so to speak, round him on every side, not, however, without being able to improve myself by his views in every particular.

Alluding to my personal preference for, and intuition of the idea of some future state of being, inasmuch as I feel difficulty in realizing that the spirit which so earnestly longs for an increase of the power of knowledge here—a longing of which the infirmities and trammels of the flesh debar us from fruition, is doomed to utter disappointment—my friend, who is a Materialist, told me he did not think I was entitled to call myself a Freethinker. Well, I said, the proof of my claim is simple. I am king, lord, priest, and master in the domain of my own thoughts and intuitions, and, while interfering with no man, or dictating to him, I am so free in mind that I decline to receive dictation as to what I may choose to call myself from you, or from any man even infinitely more clever than either of us, unless that man appeals to my inner conviction of right or wrong. I then (I think) proceeded further to take the conceit out of my friend's fast developing orthodoxy of so-called Materialism.

The fact is, I find my mind so many-sided that I can go long distances in company with wrong creeds and opinions, but the moment any one of them develops dogmatism, I set up my back and show my teeth. I can't help it. Orthodoxy, dogmatism, heresy, authority in matters of opinion and conscience, these are the four terms for which I have a burning and inextinguishable hatred and defiance, and I honor the stand you take for your own liberty of thought.

Very respectfully yours, G. W. Griffith.

THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

Friend Bennett: If the Freethinker's Convention, to be held at Watkins, N. Y., August 22d, 23d, 24th. and 25th, is to be such a convention as the times demand, every earnest Liberal in the United States should commence at once to work for its success. And now allow me to make a few suggestions. There are some thirty counties in this State where there are Freethought and Liberal league county committees, and some five counties where there are Liberal league county committees. Each of these committees should see to it that the meeting is well advertised in their county papers, and should make arrangements to send large delegations from their respective counties. Then it would be well for each county committee to procure a tent for the people who may attend from their county; that would save expense. And in the counties where there are no county committees I wish the Liberal friends would send me the name of some one who would act as the chairman of such a committee. Then I desire to ask each county committee to immediately see what reduction of fare they can get on railroads from their county, and notify me. And Liberals residing in the various cities of the United States will confer a great favor by making arrangements with railroads for reduced fares. There will probably be some fifty or more of the ablest Liberal speakers of the Union present, and as soon as possible the names of those who will attend will be published in the Liberal papers, and our Liberal friends everywhere should see that these notices are copied into the secular papers. And, as a final request, may I ask every Liberal who intends to be present at the meeting to send me his or her name, inclosing at least a three-cent postage stamp to assist in paying for advertising the meeting. H. L. Green, Sec.

P. S.—I learn that Mr. Charles Ellis, of Boston, proposes to lecture for the Liberal public in central and western New York. I hope he may have many invitations, as he is able and worthy. I was much pleased with his lecture at the Waterloo meeting. H. L. G.

Buchanan, Mich., May 19. 1878.

Mr. D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find money order for one dollar, for which please send me one dollar's worth of Paine's "Age of Reason." Send by mail.

Our Liberal Society, although it is in the country, seven miles from any town, is progressing finely. The tracts we ordered some time ago have been carefully circulated, and have been the means of opening the eyes of several people. We hold meetings on the first and third Sundays of each month, and each meeting brings in new listeners. Our Sunday meetings are opposed by the bigoted church members of this vicinity, but, as the enemies of freedom are actively at work trying to get laws passed that shall curtail our liberties, we propose to fight for our rights and do what we can to forever perpetuate free speech, free press, and free religion.

Geo. W. Reese, Pres. B. I. Liberal League.

Florence, Iowa, June 5, 1878.

Friend Bennett: I cannot resist the temptation to thank Mr. C. L. James for his excellent discourse upon the "Relation of the Sexes," and you for giving your many thousand readers an opportunity to read it. Mr. James is right; the demand for woman's rights cannot logically stop short of absolute personal freedom as a political, industrial, and social being. Love must be left free to seek its own. We must get rid of the idea that the family is the unit in the commonwealth. I am sorry to see that even Col. Ingersoll has apparently fallen into this mistake. The individual is the unit, the commonwealth is but an aggregation of such units. Why does the husband shoot down the so-called "paramour" of his wife, as did Wm. Pitts, and Dean S. Tyler the other day at Hastings, Mich.? Simply because society regards the wife as a piece of property with no volition of her own; no voice to say to whom she shall submit the temple of her person. Such killings, though excused and applauded by society, are simply murders, and murders without excuse. And such men pretend to love their wives. Ah, their love is the love of the brute in man—a love that seeks only its own selfish gratification. When one person truly loves another, he will desire that that loved one shall seek and find happiness wherever she can. Any man who will resort to murder to protect his usurped "marital rights," is unworthy of a place in society. One Albert D. Richardson was worth a world of McFarlands. I hope that you will often give your readers such sound articles upon this subject as you have manifested a desire to do in printing Mr. James' article, and the recent letter of Mrs. Wheelock. Also am very glad to see so much upon the labor and currency questions in The Truth Seeker. I hope in the future to see many brave friends speak fully the principles of the Socialistic Labor Party. Both The Truth Seeker and the Positive Thinker evince a desire to lead in all reform work; they are not fossils, but live papers.

Brookfield, Mo., May 15, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: We have had a treat in our county rarely given to us by the Liberals. A lady, Mrs. M. H. Parry, from Wisconsin, came in here very suddenly without any previous notice having been given, and desired to make arrangements for a course of three or four lectures, but everybody spoke very discouraging, and the anxious were afraid the arrangements could not be made; but Mrs. Parry said she "proposed to make the attempt if she was compelled to sink fifty dollars;" so the hall was engaged, she agreeing to be responsible personally for the expenses, and advertised a free lecture. The first evening the house contained about three or four hundred people, who listened to the most eloquent and able lecture on "Evolution of Thought and Progress of Ideas" that was ever delivered here on any subject. The next evening she spoke on "The Coming Religion and the Coming Church" which she portrayed vividly, and the cheers that interspersed the most radical parts was evidence that the audience were in sympathy with the speaker, and recognized the demand for a church founded upon humanity and practical morality. The third evening the subject of "Religion vs. Theology" was ably treated, and the distinction between them very plainly drawn. She plainly showed that Christ taught his religion very different from the manner and doctrines taught by the theologians of to-day, that what she desired was religion, and not theology. The lectures were a success, and money enough voluntarily contributed to more than pay all of her expenses. She went from here to St. Catherine, four miles from this place, but the M. E. minister of this place had sent a postal card to his brother minister at that place notifying him to keep away from the lectures, and keep his godly congregation from going, which he did. Sending a postal card was prima facie evidence of stinginess and illiberality, and the fact that he had never heard the lady speak a word shows dishonesty, for he never knew a word about her sentiments from his own knowledge, but a good crowd was present and she threw some shells into their camp both here and there that will open the eyes of the drowsy inmates. These lectures have done a vast amount of good. The people here will not henceforth accept every theory as being the truth because it claims to be inspiration, nor reject them because they are spoken by an Infidel, but weigh them, accept the truth, and preach and practice it for truth's sake. Mrs. Parry is entitled to the support of the Liberals all over this country, as she is an able and eloquent speaker, possessing the natural advantages of voice, etc., and capable of holding an audience spellbound by her eloquent and beautiful language as she makes her points and illustrations. Let all Liberal clubs hear her, and know the power she is exerting in the lecture field. Success to The Truth Seeker, and Mrs. P. Yours fraternally, Mont. M. Crandall.

Shelby Depot, Tenn., May 30, 1878.

Mr. Editor: The good cause progresses in this neighborhood right rapidly I think. None of us have ever heard a Freethought lecture; all we know of Liberalism is from reading The Truth Seeker and the cheap tracts and pamphlets published by you. All of the money in this order is supplied by persons that six months ago would have hung their heads in shame at being called Infidels. They had no idea how frail the foundation of their faith was until they began to read Liberal literature.

I hope that we will be able ere long to organize ourselves here into a club and invite some good lecturer to address us. Money is so scarce in our community that our orders are all necessarily small. A gentleman friend of the cause, although a member of the Presbyterian church, gave some of the tracts to his pastor to read, who remarked that the only remedy against that evil, Infidelity, was education. I thought that would be the greatest enemy to dogmatic creeds that could be used against them. Respectfully,

Jno. M. Griffin.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: A few days since I received, as trial subscriber, four copies of The Truth Seeker. I read them with cumulating interest and admiration to the end. I consider The Truth Seeker intellectually in the van, of more importance than all else against it—a paper to admire. Verily it is justly named The Truth Seeker. Never was nobler title given or more worthily borne. Alas that there are hands so weak as could consign it to the flames, lips so mad as could not speak its praise, and which kiss the Bible rather than its pages of diviner truth. But patience, truth-seekers, Freethinkers, for though the number of your opponents is great, they daily diminish beneath your gentle, beneficent influence, the light of truth omnipotent as the sun's beams which with gentleness kiss the iceberg into murmuring rills, unlock the frozen earth, and awaketh where was death the flowers and the birds. Enclosed find P. O. order for $3, for which grant me the honor of augmenting the number of regular subscribers to The Truth Seeker. W. H. Brashear.

Mark Antony's Oration Over Cæsar.

The Text from which Shakspere wrote his Version.

Friends, Romans, countrymen! Lend me your ears;
I will return them next Saturday. I come
To bury Cæsar, because the times are hard
And his folks can't afford to hire an undertaker.
The evil that men do lives after them,
In the shape of progeny that reap the Benefit of their life insurance.
So let it be with the deceased.
Brutus hath told you Cæsar was ambitious:
What does Brutus know about it?
It is none of his funeral. Would that it were!
Here, under leave of you, I come to Make a speech at Cæsar's funeral.
He was my friend, faithful and just to me;
He loaned me five dollars once when I was in a pinch,
And signed my petition for a post-office.
But Brutus says he was ambitious.
Brutus should wipe off his chin.
Cæsar hath brought many captives home to Rome
Who broke rock on the streets until their ransoms
Did the general coffers fill.
When that the poor hath cried, Cæsar hath wept,
Because it didn't cost anything, and
Made him solid with the masses. [Cheers.]
Ambition should be made of sterner stuff,
Yet Brutus says he was ambitious.
Brutus is a liar, and I can prove it.
You all did see that on the Lupercal
I thrice presented him a kingly crown
Which thrice he did refuse because it did not fit him quite.
Was this ambitious? Yet Brutus says he was ambitious.
Brutus is not only the biggest liar in the country,
But he is a horse-thief of the deepest dye.. [Applause.]
If you have tears, prepare to shed them now. [Laughter.]
You all do know this ulster.
I remember the first time ever Cæsar put it on.
It was on a summer's evening in his tent,
With the thermometer registering ninety degrees in the shade;
But it was an ulster to be proud of,
And cost him seven dollars at Marcus Swartzmeyer's,
Corner of Fulton and Ferry streets, sign of the red flag.
Old Swartz wanted forty dollars for it,
But finally came down to seven dollars because it was Cæsar!
Was this ambitious? If Brutus says it was,
He is a greater liar than Tony Comstock is!
Look! in this place ran Cassius's dagger through;
Through this the son-of-a-gun of Brutus stabbed.
And, when he plucked his cursed steel away,
Mark Antony how the blood of Cæsar followed it! [Cheers and cries of "Give us something on the Silver bill!" "Hit him again!" &c.]
I come not, friends, to steal away your hearts,
I am no thief, as Brutus is;
Brutus has a monopoly in all that business,
And if he had his deserts he would be
In the penitentiary, and don't you forget it?
Kind friends, sweet friends, I do not wish to stir you up
To such a sudden flood of mutiny,
And as it looks like rain,
The pall-bearers will proceed to place the coffin in the hearse,
And we will proceed to bury Cæsar,
Not to praise him.

Civilization Without Clothes.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: While we may not fully comprehend Mrs. Wheelock's statement in relation to the "true education concerning sex," wherein she affirms, in an article which appeared in your paper on May 18th, that "the naked charmingness of a child's body is a source of beauty to human eyes, and the higher development of a woman's body is more beautiful to the eyes of men, who would never look upon it but with reverent and worshiping gaze," we must infer that nudity of sex is essential to the true education of the relations assigned mankind in the great drama of life. This inference being correct, we shall negate it with the assertion that notwithstanding the admiration of the French for the nude in art, and Mrs. Swisshelms' apotheosis to "the human form divine," as delineated by Powers in that master-piece of sculpture, the Greek Slave, they can never pursuade cultured men and women into an acceptance of customs so debasing—customs which even barbaric races disapprove by the concealment of the sexual organs with leaves or the skins of animals. The French to-day, as a class, are a nation of prostitutes, made so by depraved and lacivious tastes in high art for the exposure of those distinctive features of sex which constitute the very essence of purity in women when undefiled. Mardi Gras and the Can-can have done much to dethrone the female virtue and demoralize society. Then, why these endeavors of Mr. Leland and Mrs. Wheelock to educate us into the belief that the laying aside our clothing will eventually improve our morals and raise us to that dignified eminence of intellectual culture from whose summit we can "appreciate the exceeding beauty and holiness of sex." No! no! If amorous dalliance and its concomitants, with its next to nude exposure of the human form, as practiced at bacchnalian rout, will so corrupt the moral tone of society, what must we expect the result to be if we expose our nakedness to the public gaze?

I will assert without fear of successful contradiction, that if the laws of society were such that men and women could publicly commingle in a state of nudity, in less then ten years they would relapse from the most exalted condition of civilization into barbarism. Livingston, and the hundreds of others who have devoted the best portions of their lives in the exploration of uncivilized continents in the interests of humanity, could never become reconciled to the nudity of those by whom they were surrounded; nor could they perceive anything pertaining thereto that was calculated to educate the sexes into nobleness of character or that tended to inspire chastity, a greater reverence for woman, or a firmer attachment to home and its domestic endearments; albeit the conditions were present to cause them "to be natural and true to the finer instincts of their beings." On the contrary, woman occupied the lowest menial positions, receiving the kicks and anathemas of "lords to the manor born," while cohabitation was practiced indiscriminately and performed in the most beastly manner.

"Love between the sexes is the most exalted passion of the human soul, and its fountain-spring is found in the sex-life of men and women." If this sentiment is to take precedence of that love for mind development which virtuous men so much admire in women, and without which she is incapacitated to educate her offspring, then marriage becomes a base prostitution to animal desires. The moment that passion uncontrolled by reason becomes the mainspring to marriage, that moment seals the moral standing of such individuals in the estimation of honorable men and women.

Give me a man with noble attributes and I will show you a man whose love for woman—fair woman! clothed in the regal panoply of virtue and intelligence, with person chastely adorned—will endure as long as the eternal hills. But let such sentiments as those above quoted prevail, and we will have lustful desires for our teachers and animal passions for our masters—fit advocates for the nudity of woman's body to excite the vilest passions of men, transforming them into brutes and from brutes into monsters.

We instinctively shrink from an indecent exposure of our persons, to remedy which we adorn and beautify as well as protect our bodies by raiment. It is natural and just, and governs other animated beings as well as man. We see it in the hairy covering of animals; it is evidenced in the brilliant plumage of birds; we perceive it in the delicate covering of the rosebud preserving the beautiful tints until the rose blushes into maturity; we notice it on the hillsides and in the dales, when spring covers with carpets of green and gold the hoary footprints of winter. And shall man, the microcosm, become subject to such visionary and lascivious schemes as those advocated by Elvira Wheelock—schemes practiced only in part by equatorial nomads? By all means no! Better by far give us the follies of fashion with all their baneful influences than such absurdities as sign-posts to guide us along the journey of life.

"The Resurrection of Jesus."

This pamphlet, "The Resurrection of Jesus," by W. S. Bell, all ministers and Christians should read. It is no caricature. The New Testament account of the resurrection is truthfully, fairly, and candidly stated, which cannot always be affirmed of Christian writings on this subject. And, surely, all inclined to the Christian theory owe it to themselves to read this book, and learn what is said by well informed and scientific writers on this fundamental idea of the Christian faith. And I but give the opinion of one who was himself a minister of the gospel for twenty years, and who is as familiar with the text of the Bible as any Christian ever can be, when I say that Mr. Bell's argument is exhaustive and irrefutable. And the Liberal friends of humanity might imitate Christians enough to form "Tract Societies" for the purpose of putting this tract into the hands of every Christian throughout the world! Why not?

The Home for "Fallen" Women.

While we are giving observation to Christian institutions, and seeing if they effect all they claim to do, the "Home for Fallen Women" needs a passing glance. The one in Philadelphia I can speak particularly of, and this is said to be the model one in this country. I visited it in 1876, and obtained a very full history of it from the matron, who had presided over the institution forty-six years. She is what is usually termed a pious, good old woman, which always seems a doubtful sort of compliment, rather implying an imbecile ignorance, incapable of striking any very heavy blows in any direction for either good or bad.

This Home was established in 1801 by Bishop White. The ground was donated, and the institution is supported by all the different churches in the city. The building is a large four-story brick, capable of containing two hundred inmates. The high brick wall reaching up to the second story encloses the grounds, containing a full half square. The tout ensemble impresses one as a prison, even the entrance having a chained and bolted door, and guarded with the strictest vigilance.

Instead of feeling the delighful sympathy of a home, it occurred to me that an appropriate motto over the door would be, "Who enter here leaves hope behind." I felt the penitentiary atmosphere around every step I made, even the reception room did not dispel this illusion, with its wall covered with pious mottoes and pictures of ministers—a kind of "rogues gallery." I inquired of the matron how many of these unfortunate women there were in the house then. She said "twenty," and this, too, in a city of over two hundred thousand inhabitants, with its hundreds of prostitutes. I then asked if this was about the average number they ever had there in her long experience. She said it was, and the highest number at any time had been thirty-eight. "Can you tell me," I then said, "about how many you have ever reformed, and have settled into useful lives?" "Oh!" she said with clasped hands, and her eyes raised to some far-away angel on a cloud, "'tis the fewest number, but you know to save even one soul and bring it to the fold of Jesus, is a good life's work in the sight of God." It struck me, however, that there must be something radically wrong in a reformatory system which yielded so little good results for such an amount of labor and expenditure. I next asked this bombazine saint what was the manner of treatment for these poor women. She replied that "they first came of their own free will, but from the moment of their entrance, they had not the slightest communication with the outside world—the wall even shut out all outward view; they are kept steadily at work, either washing, ironing or sewing, from six in the morning until six at night, the only relaxation being for meals and prayers." This, she insisted, kept their minds from their past lives, and the contemplation of future sins. They are given no remuneration for their work, beyond what they eat and wear. The rules of the institution will not permit them to sing songs or ballads for the reason, she said, "that this liberty might lead to vulgarity, and perhaps obscenity, but if they chose they might sing hymns or church music, as that was all right."

They had nice rooms, comfortable clothing, and good food. If they chose to read after working hours, religious books were furnished them, but it was plainly to be seen that as far as possible, every effort was made to hold their minds in a dogmatic groove. I asked if they were permitted to leave the Home at any time they were so disposed. "Oh, certainly," she replied, "but they can never return again." "A thorough reformation, then, implies a strict imprisonment, I ventured." "Oh no," she said; "to serve the Lord and be a true disciple of Jesus with sufficient to eat and wear is the highest privilege of the soul," but she did not make it clear to my understanding that it was not the worst of slavery to cramp the intellect into the narrow hum-drum of bigoted, senseless dogmas, without the contact of one outside thought to feed on—the worst starvation, the most unendurable bondage. I failed to observe where the reformation came in. To chain and cage a tiger is not to tame him, neither can evil doers be convinced of the errors of their ways by prison bars.

Here were women whose lives and actions had been more than free; whose minds had been called into reflection on their miserable condition, and sincerely wished to change a bad life for a good one. And the only door which seemed practically open for them was the Home for Fallen Women. The change was sudden and extreme—like coming from a fire of hell to a hell of frost. Little wonder, then, that so few ever remain to seek Jesus. A hard hunting-ground for anything outside of old fossil prayers. When will theology learn that sin must have something more substantial than prayers to cure it?

Positivists' Funerals.

At the burial in this city a few days ago of a young girl who was the daughter of a Positivist, a few Christians who were present expressed their surprise that so much could be said in the hour of bereavement without reference to God or the Church.

There is no occasion for this surprise. When the laws of nature form the substratum of an argument, quite as much that is logical is to be said as though the idea of God or the Church were introduced. At the funeral in question many of the remarks made by the principal speaker were sensible in the extreme. The tenor was that it is best to submit with grace to the inevitable laws of nature. The Positivist does not concern himself with such ideas as gratitude to God for all that happens, whether it be beneficial or harmful to the recipient. Positivism believes that this idea too often begets a false and morbid condition of the soul. The pietist forces himself into unconscious hypocrisy. The resignation he professes will not bear examination. Acceptance of and acquiescence in natural laws are not precisely the same thing as what is called resignation to the will of God. The latter is supposed to comprise a certain joy, a willingness to be sacrificed for the general good—nay, a thankfulness to the Almighty that this should be the case. Acceptance of the decrees of nature, on the other hand, demands neither gratitude or joy. It may be sad yet brave, pensive yet unrepining. He who thus endures or dies does not profess so to have trained himself as to experience spiritual joy. All he claims to do is to recognize that there are certain laws of nature which must and will work themselves out. He does not love and idolize and worship nature for this. He looks upon her simply as infinite, inexorable, irresponsible, and he bows his head and awaits her blows, not murmuring, simply because it would be unmanly and useless, and not affecting a joy he is far from feeling, because to do so would be highflown, puerile, and hypocritical. A great deal of sound logic belongs to the side of the consistent Positivist, and those who die in that belief are frequently as dignified and worthy of emulation and esteem as the most consistent so-called Christians.—Telegram.

Mrs. Besant's New Book,

THE

Law of Population,

ITS CONSEQUENCES

AND

Its Bearing upon Human Conduct and Morals.

BY ANNIE BESANT.

A Scientific and Medical Work every way superior to any similar. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. Adapted to the wants of the married, and to the consideration of all mature persons, as it points out the only feasible escape from the evils of celibacy or overburdened parentage. This is the work for which the eloquent author is now suffering persecution in England. It is not the "Fruits of Philosophy," but is more modern and and every way better.

BURNS' PHONIC SHORTHAND,

FOR

Schools, Business Writing, and Reporting, arranged on the basis of Isaac Pitman's Phonography;

BY ELIZA BOARDMAN BURNS,

Teacher of Phonography and Phonetics at Cooper Union, and N. Y. School of Phonography.

To facilitate the general introduction of Phonography into all businesses and professions, the author has, after twenty-five years' experience in teaching all the various "systems" in vogue, arranged a text-book which, though full and complete, is concise, free from superfluous verbiage, and of moderate size. The simplicity of arrangement in this work enables the student to pursue the study of Phonography with much more ease and certainty than any other text-book; while the writing which results from its use is as rapid as any, and far more legible than that derived from the instructions given in other phonographic works. Price, $1.00. Sold at this office.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented succes in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

Gems of Thought.

THREE may keep a secret—if two of them are dead.—Franklin.

OUR remedies oft in ourselves do lie, which we ascribe to heaven.—Shakspere.

WHEN you have absolute knowledge, you have no further use for belief.—N. H. Dillingham.

BE noble-minded! Our own heart, and not other men's opinions of us, forms our true onor.—Schiller.

ALL other love is extinguished by self-love; beneficence, humanity, justice, philosophy, sink under it.—Epicurus.

THE essence of true nobility is neglect of self. Let the thought of self pass in, and the beauty of a great action is gone, like the bloom from a soiled flower.—Froude.

DEPART from the highway, and transplant thyself in some enclosed ground, for it is hard for a tree that stands by the wayside to keep her fruit till it be ripe.—Chrysostom.

NO MIGHT nor greatness in mortality can censure escape; back-wounding calumny the whitest virtue strikes; what king, so strong, can tie the gall up in the slanderous tongue!—Shakspere.

TRUE silence is the rest of the mind, and is to the spirit what sleep is to the body, nourishment and refreshment. It is a great virtue; it covers folly, keeps secrets, avoids disputes, and prevents sin.—William Penn.

SOCIETY is like the echoing hills. It gives back to the speaker his words; groan for groan, song for song. Wouldst thou have thy social scenes to resound with music? then speak ever in the melodious strains of truth and love.—Dr. Thomas.

SELF-RESPECT is the noblest garment with which a man may clothe himself—the most elevating feeling with which the mind can be inspired. One of Pythagoras' wisest maxims, in his Golden Verses, is that in which he enjoins the pupil to "reverence himself."—Smiles.

MALICE may empty her quiver, but cannot wound; the dirt will not stick, the jests will not take. Without the consent of the world, a scandal doth not go deep; it is only a slight stroke upon the injured party, and returneth with the greater force upon those that gave it.—Saville.

THE most notorious swindler has not assumed so many names as self-love, nor is so much ashamed of his own. She calls herself patriotism, when at the same time she is rejoicing at just as much calamity to her native country as will introduce herself into power and expel her rivals.—Colton.

HAD a myth not put a curse upon labor, the capitalist would have disappeared centuries ago, common sense spurning his presence as it did other dead weights. Not until the curse-upon-labor idea was generally scouted were the claims of the capitalist even questioned.—National Socialist.

SCIENCE is, I believe, nothing but trained and organized common-sense, differing from the latter only as a veteran may differ from a raw recruit; and its methods differ from those of common sense only so far as the guardsman's cut and thrust differ from the manner in which a savage wields his club.—Professor Huxley.

RELIGION is universal; theology is exclusive. Religion is humanitarian; theology is sectarian. Religion unites mankind; theology divides it. Religion is love, broad and all-comprising as God's love; theology preaches love and practices bigotry. Religion looks to the moral worth of man; theology to his creed and denomination. Religion is light, and love, and virtue, and peace, unadulterated and immaculate; but theology is the apple of discord, which disunites and estranges one from another.—Lilienthal.

MAN'S nature is very much like that of animals or vegetables. Each individual of each species has its allotted time to live and mature, and to decay and die, if no untoward circumstance cuts it off before its legitimate end is reached by Nature's slow, sure, and unvarying process. The avalanche that slides down the mountain declivity and crushes the lion in his lair, would equally crush man in his cottage. The flood that overwhelms all vegetable and animal life stops not in its headlong course to turn aside for man himself, no matter how pure or sinless he may be, nor could it even in any age or place have done so. If man survives when lower developments succumb to the adverse forces of nature, it is only because he is better fitted by a long process of evolution, to cope with destroying agencies.—Elmina D. Slenker.

"If I'm traduced by tongues which neither know
My faculties nor person, yet will be
The chroniclers of my doings, let me say
'Tis but the fate of place and the rough brake
That virtue must go through. We must not stint
Our necessary actions, in the fear
To cope malicious censurers; which ever,
As ravenous fishes, do a vessel follow
That is new trimmed; but benefit no further
Than vainly longing. What benefit we oft do best
By sick interpreters, once weak ones, is
Not ours, or not allowed; what worst, as oft
Hitting a grosser quality, is cried up
For our best act. If we shall stand still
In fear our motion will be mocked or carped at,
We should take root here where we sit, or sit Sate statues only.

A RESULT OF MODERN PROGRESS.

On cream that once in farmer's halls
Was diligently churned,
No more the stout churn-dasher falls;
For some smart man has learned
That boiled beef suet doth excel
The butter made of cream,

Are slaughtered for their fat.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Vol. 5. No. 25. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, June 22, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

SEVENTY Presbyterian ministers died last year.

IN August the Widow Van Cott is to labor along the Pacific coast.

A PASTOR of a church in North Troy, Vt., has got into serious trouble through falling in love with the young wife of a deacon.

A DINNER was recently given to Herbert Spencer in Paris at which he said the exhibition had surpassed his expectations, and that Frenchmen seemed to have less difficulty in apprehending his theories than Englishmen.

THE 279th anniversary of the death of Giordano Bruno will be commemorated on the 17th of February, 1879, by the erection of a statue at Rome, in which city he was burned at the stake by order of the Catholic Church in the year 1600.

A BARGE with two thousand bee-hives aboard is afloat in the Mississippi, and is to be moved up and down the river during the season, so as to be all the time in the midst of flowers. The bees will thus be kept continually within reach of the best material for honey.

AT the picnic of the Sunday-school experienced,
Brother Kimball
Deals forty-cents-a-gallon cream with fingers
deft and nimble,
To Edwin and Angelica at thirty cents per thimble.

THE SHOEMAKER.

He is happy on his backless chair,
Hammering away without a care;
And all his life
He can watch his wife,
And see that no minister cometh there.

THE fact having been positively established that souls do not need saving in summer time, most of the ministers of this city have left for Europe. There is a rumor that one clergyman in a far up-town district is detained by want of funds, but a subscription is being circulated among the married men of his parish, and he will be enabled to start in a very short time.

THE English Congregational Union has resolved that a clergyman may be recognized as entirely evangelical and yet deny both the everlasting punishment of the wicked and the immortality of the soul. It may rationably be presumed that in a short time a man may retain his connection with an orthodox church and believe neither in the Son nor the Father.

THE Seventh Day Adventists have just closed their annual camp-meeting and State Conference at Madison, Wis. The meetings were largely attended, and by some people who took so great an interest as to drive 150 miles from their homes. These Adventists are looking for the second coming of Jesus Christ, and think it may be expected without a moment's notice.

PRESIDENT Blanchard of Wheaton College, Illinois, is such a muscular Christian that some of his brethren say he has more muscle than Christianity. At the recent meeting of the Congregational Association of Illinois he became so angry that he planted his fist in a brother's face. A suit for assault and battery was one of the results of this departure from the paths of pleasantness, and the doughty president was fined $3.

THE latest unsuccessful seeker for damages in a libel suit is the Rev. J. V. Roy of Canada. The Toronto Telegram called Roy an "unmitigated scoundrel," and Roy, thought that his feelings and reputation were injured to the value of $5,000. The defendants proved Roy to be an unmitigated scoundrel to the satisfaction of the jury. Roy had committed bigamy and written a number of scandalous letters.

KATE SOUTHERN is not to be hanged; she is to stay in the Georgia State prison for ten years. She killed the woman who was her husband's paramour; she did just what General Cole did, just what General Sickles did, but they were acquitted, while she was sentenced to be hanged, and is finally sent to the State prison. It is a fact that the deed for which Kate Southern is made to suffer infamous and degrading punishment is the same deed which makes heroes of men. Is this because men are jurors? And if this is the reason, is it not a disgrace to the sex?

VOLTAIRE IN ITALY.—The centenary of Voltaire was celebrated in Rome, Milan, Bologna, and other Italian cities. At Bologna, Prof. Panzacchi discoursed; and Bovio, the deputy, did likewise at Milan, where twenty workingmen's societies assembled under their respective banners. At Rome there were several manifestations, and in the evening the Apollo theatre gave a representation of "Zaire," with the actors Salvini and Marmo. Before the representation took place, the bust of Voltaire was crowned, amid the loud and unanimous applause of the audience.

NEXT I—An intelligent farmer of Des Moines county has invented a henophone, modeled on the principle of the telephone, by which one old reliable hen occupying a central office in the hennery sits on all the nests about the establishment, leaving other fowls free to lay eggs, scratch, and cackle. As soon as a new nest contains the full complement of eggs, it is connected with the central office by a copper wire, and the business is settled. The only trouble with the machine is that it sits so hard it hatches out the porcelain nest eggs, so that one chick in every nest is born with glass eyes, and the farmer has to buy and train a dog to lead it around. This makes it expensive.—Burlington Hawkeye.

HIS Presbytery, the Synod, and the General Assembly having successively branded him as a heretic, the Rev. John Miller very sensibly comes to the conclusion that the Presbyterian Church is no place for him. Accordingly he has written to the Presbytery announcing his withdrawal from its communion. He still rejects the dogma of the Trinity because he thinks it a superstition; he intends to keep on preaching, though he has not as yet picked out his new denomination; and he hopes to meet his ex-brethren in heaven. The Presbytery has not yet made up its mind whether to drop Brother Miller's name or to go ahead and depose him from the ministry with the Presbyterian equivalents for bell, book, and candle.

THE Fourth Avenue Baptist Church of Pittsburgh clings to its pastor, the Rev. R. W. Pearson, although sundry naughty deeds were some time ago proved against him and confessed by him. The Pittsburgh Baptist Association considers this all wrong, and thinks the church ought to turn Mr. Pearson out. As every Baptist church is independent, however, the association has no power to command the church to send in its pastor's resignation. The most it can do is to withdraw the hand of fellowship from the erring church. This it has just done, after prolonged and thorough discussion, the vote being 51 to 10. Pearson says he has repeated of his sins, and his people say they are edified by his preaching. If they like him, there is no outside power in the Baptist Church that can make him step down and out.

THE Rev. Dr. Duryea will spend the summer at Long Lake. Lord and Lady Dufferin have gone to Tadousac for the season. The Rev. Dr. Talmage has gone off on a two months' vacation. The Shah of Persia will soon go to a villa in the suburbs of Vienna for the summer. Boucicault will go yachting. Mrs. Scott Siddons will return to America in August. John B. Gough has sailed for the Old World, to be gone two years. Caleb Cushing will stay during the hot months in Newburyport. Joaquin Miller is on a visit to England. Wade Hampton has bought a cottage at Salem, Va. The obituary poet Childs beams at his Long Branch residence. The Widow Van Cott will preach in Omaha during the summer. Senator Bruce, the only negro in the Senate, will marry in July, and go to Europe with his bride.

KEELY MOTOR STOCK DEPRECIATION.—Inquiry into the financial condition of the company elicits the fact that its liabilities are less than $500, but if the amounts advanced by the directory are included, they are at least $10,000. As an offset to these are the machinery that cost $120,000, and the boundless possibilities the concern holds out to those who believe in it. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars has been expended in the construction of machinery. Over a million and a half has changed hands in the rise and fall of its stocks. There were twenty thousand shares issued at a face value of $100. These shares sold first at $60, and then slid upward until they reached their maximum figure of $800 a share. Now they are down to nothing, and no demand for them at that figure. This depreciation is largely due to the adverse reports of Profs. Knight, Barker, and Marks, who, having examined the scheme, pronounced it a fraud, a snare, and a delusion.—Philadelphia Times.

A TALE OF THE CONFESSIONAL.—My Catholic friends tell good stories about the Protestant confessional, which they not unintelligibly refuse to regard as a serious institution. The following, for instance, is on the best authority, but I withhold the name of the very big Angican dignitary to whom it refers: A fair devotee chanced, on a certain occasion, to confess to him a peccadillo which caused her much reproach of conscience. "Alas," groaned the Doctor, "and that is the third time, too." The lady assured him that she had never before been guilty of that particular omission. "My daughter," persisted her spiritual guide "it is the third time you have come to me with this same sin; do not add to your fault by concealing the former occasions." The lady still demurred, and a flood of memory seemed to rush on the father. "I beg you a thousand pardons," he said; "it was your sister."—London World.

THE degree of success obtained by Mr. Richtel's air ship at Hartford may give a fresh impetus to invention. To sail or fly in the air has for ages been the unsatisfied ambition of mankind. Roger Bacon thought that an instrument might be so made that a man, sitting in the middle, could "put in motion artificial wings which shall beat the air like a bird flying;" but six centuries have elapsed without producing the required instrument. For a dozen years the Aeronautical Society of Great Britain have toiled in vain to navigate the air. About ten years ago a member of this society Charles Spencer, claimed to have taken "short flights of a hundred feet from level ground" with a pair of wings worked by manual power. One Kaufman began an aerial machine in London, some years ago, designed to weigh 8,000 pounds and to have 120-horse power; it was to draw three cars and a tender containing ten hours' supply of fuel and three of water, at the rate of 56 miles an hour. But it did not draw anything 56 feet. The Hartford machine is more modest in its aspirations, and the propeller by which it was worked seems to have actually steered the machine in various directions, and in the wind's despite. And it is the first step that costs, in the air as on the earth.

THE latest instance of Comstock's Christian morality and purity is as follows: On the night of June 14, 1878, Anthony Comstock, attended by five other men, supposed to be brother members of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, went to a house of prostitution, 224 Greene street, and those six godly men induced three frail women, who make their bread by the prostitution of their bodies, for the consideration of fourteen dollars, to lay off all their wearing apparel, and, in a closed room, to expose their persons like so many original Eves to the six men aforesaid. After these young Christian associates had feasted their eyes to the full, and even Comstock had become satisfied, he then assumed his dignity of office and said they were his prisoners, and that he was Anthony Comstock. He drew a revolver, and pointing it at the woman who kept the house, declared, in the most imperious manner, that if she stirred he would blow her brains out. He ordered them to wrap blankets around them and to march off to prison just as they were, but he finally relented enough to let them put their garments on, and they, with the landlady, were marched to the fourteenth ward station and kept in prison several days, when they succeeded in obtaining bail. In the excitement of the occasion the landlady lost a seventy-five dollar diamond ring from her finger, but she was hurried out of the room before she could have time to find her ring. It is thought that one of the six good men was enriched by finding that valuable piece of jewelry, as the landlady has not seen it since. Is it to be supposed that the Young Men's Christian Association and the Society for the Suppression of Vice will be proud of the last moral act of their agent and representative? Was ever a baser, lower, and more contemptible act ever committed by a man? Can any state of things justify such a dirty, indecent piece of business? Were not the poor prostitutes, who are reduced to the pitiful expedients they are to earn their daily bread, quite as honorable as Comstock?

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER X.

"Here we are, all together once more, Myra, Sue, Jennie, Rose, Minnie, and myself," said Edith, as she glanced around the little circle, which was sitting in the pleasant grassy garden of Rose Hill mansion on a warm sunny day in early March, more than a year after the commencement of our story. "It really seems like old times to have you all here, and to feel as if we were girls together again, though two are now matrons instead of maids."

"But we do not feel a day older for that, do we, Rose?" said Sue, looking up at her companion with a cheerful, happy smile. "I am sure I have been growing younger every day since I was married, and happier too; and Rose has heretofore seemed the very impersonation of bliss, though I must own she looks a bit sad and thoughtful to-day; perhaps like the generality of people she has a skeleton in her closet, but if so, I trust it is a 'weenty teenty' one, that will not shadow her life much. Now, you all know mine is the thought of my father, and all he has done, and the wondering as to where he is; whether he is ill or suffering, or, perhaps, what is worse still, doing something wrong or ignoble. I've never heard a word from him since the news you told me when I came home from my bridal trip. I heard from Sam and Bill though, last week, and was able to write to them for the first time since they left home. They had not even heard of the death of mother and sisters till about a month ago, when they met one of our old neighbors, Mr. Carney, in Ohio, and he told them all the sad tale, which so shocked them that it was days before they had any heart to go to work again. They had heretofore worked so cheerfully, hoping to do so much for dear mother; and to find that all were dead but me, and I married, and so they had only themselves left to do for, was a great damper on them; but youth is naturally cheerful and hopeful, and knowing it was useless to mourn over the inevitable, they finally resumed their labors, resolving to make the best of what was still left them, and to grow up into good, industrious, intelligent men, and be a credit to the world and to themselves. They never got to Pike's Peak at all. They met so many tramps returning from there, and they all told such dismal tales of suffering and destitution, that they gave up the idea and settled in Cincinnati, Ohio, where they were each lucky enough to get a clerkship in a merchant store near, and board at a private house with a Mrs. Dean and her two daughters, who are lively, cheerful, intelligent girls, and, strange to say, twins, and nearly their own age. They had been there several months when they last wrote, and began to feel almost as if they were members of the family. Mrs. Dean teaches a select school evenings, and my brothers attend steadily, and they are improving fast. Mathematics is Bill's specialty, while Sam is an enthusiast in botany. Now, if I could only hear from father."

"Suppose it was not good news, Sue, wouldn't you rather not know it then?" said Edith.

"Well, I don't know but I am better off in my ignorance; still if you do know aught of him, and I think from your looks you do, I hope you will tell me, let it be what it may."

"My news is not good, that is true, but it will be pleasanter for you to hear it just as it is, and while you are among friends, than to have a garbled account of it from idle gossips," said Edith; "and hear it you will sooner or later, for he is, or was lately, in the same town where the Flat family moved to when they went from here last Fall, and the Flats are inveterate gossips and write to their relatives here all that happens; so it's no use to try to keep anything back out of consideration for your feelings, Sue. We are all friends together, and so I'll begin at the beginning, and tell you the whole story."

Then Edith told how her mother and the deacon had been old acquaintances; and she told of his early life, and how he had won the affections of Lena Brown, the only daughter of Widow Brown, and had left her to mourn over a wrecked life and blasted hopes, with his child to rear and educate, while he had moved away to this place, and had all these long years passed for a good, honorable, and pious deacon—a man among men—who carried his head as high as if no dark stains smirched his life-record. "My mother, too," continued Edith, "also moved here soon after the deacon did, but she always kept up a regular correspondence with Mrs. Brown, who was her dearest friend, and yesterday she received a letter from her, which I will now read to you as the sequel to my little story," and she opened the missive and read as follows:

"MY OLD, WELL-BELOVED, AND TRUE FRIEND, DORA: For nearly a whole year I have not written to you, for during that time my life has passed so quietly and peacefully that I have felt too happy to think of aught but present pleasures and the sweet, sunny now. Ten months ago I wrote to you of the marriage of my daughter, Lena, and since that happy event I have been so tenderly cared for by her and her noble and estimable husband, and have been looked up to as the beloved and honored head of the family—as one whom they both seem to think nothing can be too good for—that I have neglected even you, my oldest and best friend. It seemed so pleasant to be respected and cared for—looked up to and deferred to, after all the years of shame and disgrace, humiliation and scorn I have borne, and the trials, sufferings, and struggles with bitter poverty and even utter want and destitution I have endured,—that when the change came, I gave myself up to the exquisite luxury of enjoying all my numerous joys and blisses; and so the days sped by as on angels' wings. But a strange event has occurred of late that has so vividly brought back all the old times, that I must tell you about it. Some two months ago word was given out here in the church that Rev. Henry Frost Conrad would hold a revival meeting for a few weeks. Well he came, and people flocked in crowds from far and near to hear him. His sermons were pronounced to be not only perfectly sound and doctrinal, but also full of pure, noble, and lofty sentiments, of beautiful imagery, passionate appeal, and wonderful word-picturing. Nothing like them had ever been heard here before. They were filled with classical allusions, scientific, ethical, poetical, esthetic, and all other subjects of information and interest. He seemed to draw from an inexhaustible fountain of knowledge, as well as of spiritual power and wisdom. They were reported for the local press, and even read better than they sounded from the speaker's lips. But somehow in private conversation he failed to carry out the favorable impression made by his public preaching. He was reserved and quiet, quoted Scripture, and talked only pious nothings when he could be drawn into conversation at all. Not a single sentence of the pulpit eloquence that all so admired could be drawn from him. He made great numbers of converts for the church, and was feasted and feted among the brethren and sisters, and wore golden honors as well as greenbacks, as he was an adept at begging for the "cause of Christ" as he called it. There were many thrilling appeals in his sermons that would draw money from even a constitutional miser. All this time I had never been to church, though Lena and Lester had attended almost constantly. One evening I concluded to go and hear the man whose name was in all mouths. We got there early, and when preliminary services were over, a tall, slim, scraggy-looking man got up and commenced his discourse. The words were well chosen, and the subject-matter of the whole sermon was intensely interesting as well as highly instructive. He seemed to understand perfectly ancient as well as modern history, and the men and manners of all nations, and their literature, arts, and sciences, and embodied more substance in fewer and better chosen words than any man I ever heard, and wove a magic chain of sentiment, beauty, reasoning, and earnest appeal, that was perfectly charming—or would have been had the man and his manner been more appropriate to what he uttered. Somehow it impressed me as not coming from the heart. It seemed like a lesson repeated by one who does not appreciate or understand it. There was a look about the man that was false and hollow, and now and then a tone of his voice would fall upon my ear that caused some chord of memory to thrill and vibrate, as it were, to a touch of the past. I felt some one gently pull my sleeve as I passed down the aisle of the church, after service, and looking around, saw the preacher with his finger upon his lip as a token of silence. He slipped a note into my hand, and hurriedly turned away. Wondering what it could mean I put it in my pocket, and as soon as I got home, went to my own room, turned the key in the door, opened the letter and read these lines: 'MY DEAR, DARLING CARRIE: After all these cruel years we meet once more, and the old-time love for you, my darling, burns fiercely in my veins. My heart has been calling for you continually, daily and hourly, ever since our miserable parting. I own all my folly and wrong-doing towards you, dearest, but oh! remember, my own, what a wild and reckless boy I then was. I loved you all the time to distraction, though I ran off in that fit of jealous pique and married Miss Simms whom I had met frequently at her uncle's here. I never loved her, but only married her to spite you, and found out when too late that I had wrecked the happiness of all three of us. But, darling, I know your loving woman's heart will forget and forgive all this when I tell you that though I had placed an insuperable bar between us I never once forgot you, and now that a merciful God has once more given me my freedom, by taking to himself the woman I called wife, my heart again seeks its one single true mate. Since I've been here I've watched and hoped each night for your coming; and as I poured out the words of holy inspiration in the ears of the great crowd before me, my eyes sought in vain the one form that I longed for, the one beloved face I have so long worshiped. At last you came, and I saw you looking so young, so happy, so fair, and so like your old self, that the long twenty years since we parted seemed to fade away like mist before the morning sun, and I rejoiced that a bright future was opening before me. I had brought each night my best and choicest sermon, but waited till you should come ere I preached it; and at last when you came and I watched you with a proud joy drink in the words of heavenly wisdom that fell from my lips, I said to myself, She is mine! I feel that in preaching I have found my vocation. I have cleared two hundred dollars since I've been here, and my property at home is worth $10,000, so you see we can travel till we are tired, and I shall win for us glory, honor, and money, and when we wish for home joys we can go to some sunny clime where we will build up a new home, and none can trouble us concerning our past. I might win younger and fairer maidens, but to me there is no one so dear as the Carrie of my boyhood. Write me one word, darling, and I will fly on the wings of love to your side and we will never part again. Your own devoted, HENRY CONWAY. P. S.—You may wonder why I am here under a different name. It was all a mistake of the gentleman who wrote for me a letter of introduction, and I was glad of it, as it gave me a better opportunity to speak with effect, for had my hearers known me as the wild lad who once dwelt amongst them they might have been prejudiced against me. CHAPTER XI.

LAWS OF DEVELOPMENT OF ORGANIC TRIBES AND OF INDIVIDUALS. PHYLOGENY AND ONTOGENY.

If man wishes to understand his position in nature, and to comprehend as natural facts his relations to the phenomena of the world cognizable by him, it is absolutely necessary that he should compare human with extra-human phenomena, and, above all, with animal phenomena. We have already seen that the exceedingly important physiological laws of Inheritance and Adaptation apply to the human organism in the same manner as to the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and in both cases interact with one another. Consequently, natural selection in the struggle for life acts so as to transform human society, just as it modifies animals and plants, and in both cases constantly produces new forms. The comparison of the phenomena of human and animal transformation is especially interesting in connection with the laws of divergence and progress, the two fundamental laws which, at the end of the last chapter, we proved to be direct and necessary consequences of natural selection in the struggle for life.

A comparative survey of the history of nations, or what is called "universal history," will readily yield to us, as the first and most general result, evidence of a continually increasing variety of human activities, both in the life of individuals and in that of families and states. The differentiation or separation, this constantly increasing divergence of human character and the form of human life, is caused by the ever advancing and more complete division of labor among individuals. While the most ancient and lowest stages of human civilization show us throughout the same rude and simple conditions, we see in every succeeding period of history, among different nations, a greater variety of customs, practices, and institutions. The increasing division of labor necessitates an increasing variety of forms corresponding to it. This is expressed even in the formation of the human face. Among the lowest tribes of nations, most of the individuals resemble one another so much that European travelers often cannot distinguish them at all. With increasing civilization the physiognomy of individuals becomes differentiated, and finally, among the most highly civilized nations, the English and Germans, the divergence in the characters of the face is so great that we very rarely mistake one face for another.

The second great fundamental law which is obvious in the history of nations is the great law of progress or perfecting. Taken as a whole, the history of man is the history of his progressive development. It is true that everywhere and at all times we may notice individual retrogressions, or observe that crooked roads towards progress have been taken, which lead only towards one-sided and external perfecting, and thus deviate more and more from the higher goal of internal and enduring perfecting. However, on the whole, the movement of development of all mankind is and remains a progressive one, inasmuch as man continually removes himself further from his ape-like ancestors, and continually approaches nearer to his own ideal.

Now, if we wish to know what causes actually determine these two great laws of development in man, namely, the law of divergence and the law of progress, we must compare them with the corresponding laws of development in animals, and on a close examination we shall inevitably come to the conclusion that the phenomena, as well as their causes, are exactly the same in the two cases. The course of development in man, just as in that of animals, being directed by the two fundamental laws of differentiation and perfecting, is determined solely by purely mechanical causes, and is solely the necessary consequence of natural selection in the struggle for life.

Perhaps in the preceding discussion the question has presented itself to some, "Are not these two laws identical? Is not progress in all cases necessarily connected with divergence?" This question has often been answered in the affirmative, and Carl Ernst Bar, for example, one of the greatest investigators in the domain of the history of development, has set forth the following proposition as one of the principal laws in the ontogenesis of the animal body: "The degree of development (or perfecting) depends on the stage of separation (or differentiation) of the parts." Correct as this proposition may be on the whole, yet it is not universally true. In many individual cases it can be proved that divergence and progress by no means always coincide. Every progress is not a differentiation, and every differentiation is not a progress.

Naturalists, guided by purely anatomical considerations, had already set forth the law relating to progress in organization, that the perfecting of an organism certainly depends, for the most part, upon the division of labor among the individual organs and parts of the body, but that there are also other organic transformations which determine a progress in organization. One, in particular, which has been generally recognized, is the numerical diminution of identical parts. If, for example, we compare the lower articulated animals of the crustacean group, which possess numerous pairs of legs, with spiders which never have more than four pairs of legs, and with insects which always possess only three pairs of legs, we find this law, for which a great number of examples could be adduced, confirmed. The numerical diminution of pairs of legs is a progress in the organization of articulated animals. In like manner the numerical diminution of corresponding vertebral joints in the trunk of vertebrate animals is a progress in their organization. Fishes and amphibious animals with a very large number of identical verbetral joints are, for this very reason, less perfect and lower than birds and mammals, in which the vertebral joints, as a whole, are not only very much more differentiated, but in which the number of corresponding vertebræ is also much smaller. Further, according to the same law of numerical diminution, flowers with numerous stamens are more imperfect than the flowers of kindred plants with a smaller number of stamens, etc. If therefore originally a great number of homogeneous parts exist in an organic body, and if, in the course of very many generations, this number be gradually decreased, this transformation will be an example of perfecting.

Another law of progress, which is quite independent of differentiation, nay, even appears to a certain extent opposed to it, is the law of centralization. In general the whole organism is the more perfect the more it is organized as a unit, the more the parts are subordinate to the whole, and the more the functions and their organs are centralized. Thus, for example, the system of blood-vessels is most perfect where a centralized heart exists. In like manner, the dense mass of marrow which forms the spinal cord of vertebrate animals, and the ventral cord of the higher articulated animals, is more perfect than the decentralized chain of ganglia of the lower articulated animals, and the scattered system of ganglia in the molluscs. Considering the difficulty of explaining these complicated laws of progress in detail, I cannot here enter upon a closer discussion of them, and must refer to Bronn's excellent "Morphologischen Studien," and to my "General Morphology" (Gen. Morph. i. 379, 550; ii. 257–266).

Just as we have become acquainted with phenomena of progress, quite independent of divergence, so we shall, on the other hand, very often meet with divergencies which are not perfecting, but which are rather the contrary, that is, retrogressions or degenerations. It is easy to see that the changes which every species of animal and plant experiences cannot always be improvements. But rather many phenomena of differentiation which are of direct advantage to the organism itself are yet, in a wider sense, detrimental, inasmuch as they lessen its general capabilities. Frequently a relapse to simpler conditions of life takes place, and by adaptation to them a divergence in a retrograde direction. If, for instance, organisms which have hitherto lived independently accustom themselves to a parasitical life, they thereby degenerate or retrograde. Such animals, which hitherto had possessed a well-developed nervous system and quick organs of sense, as well as the power of moving freely, lose these when they accustom themselves to a parasitical mode of life; they consequently retrograde more or less. There the differentiation viewed by itself is a degeneration, although it is advantageous to the parasitical organism. In the struggle for life such an animal, which has accustomed itself to live at the expense of others, by retaining its eyes and apparatus of motion, which are of no more use to it, would only expend so much material uselessly; and when it loses these organs, then a great quantity of nourishment which was employed for the maintenance of these parts, benefits other parts. In the struggle for life between the different parasites, therefore, those which make least pretensions will have advantage over the others, and this favors their degeneration.

Just as this is found to be the case with the whole organism, so it is also with the parts of the body of an individual organism. A differentiation of parts, which leads to a partial degeneration, and finally even to the loss of individual organs, is, when looked at by itself, a degeneration, but yet may be advantageous to the organism in the struggle for life. It is easier to fight when useless baggage is thrown aside. Hence we meet everywhere, in the more highly-developed animal and vegetable bodies, processes of divergence, the essence of which is that they cause the degeneration, and finally the loss, of particular parts. And at this point the most important and instructive of all the series of phenomena bearing upon the history of organisms presents itself to us, namely, that of rudimentary or degenerate organs.

It will be remembered that even in my first chapter I considered this exceedingly remarkable series of phenomena, from a theoretical point of view, as one of the most important and most striking proofs of the truth of the doctrine of descent. We designated as rudimentary organs those parts of the body which are arranged for a definite purpose and yet are without function. Let me remind the reader of the eyes of those animals which live in the dark in caves and underground, and which consequently never can use them. In these animals we find real eyes hidden under the skin, frequently developed exactly as are the eyes of animals which really see; and yet these eyes never perform any function, indeed cannot, simply for the reason that they are covered by an opaque membrane, and consequently no ray of light falls upon them. In the ancestors of these animals, which lived in open daylight, the eyes were well developed, covered by a transparent horny capsule (cornea), and actually served the purpose of seeing. But as the animals gradually accustomed themselves to an underground mode of life, and withdrew from the daylight and no longer used their eyes, these became degenerated.

Very clear examples of rudimentary organs, moreover, are the wings of animals which cannot fly; for example, the wings of the running birds, like the ostrich, emeu, cassowary, etc., the legs of which have become exceedingly developed. These birds having lost the habit of flying, have consequently lost the use of their wings; however, the wings are still there, although in a crippled form. We very frequently find such crippled wings in the class of insects, most members of which can fly.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

"There has been no grand catastrophe — no destroyer has swept away the forms of life of one period, and replaced them by a totally new creation, but one species has vanished and another has taken its place; creatures of one type of structure have diminished, those of another have increased, as time has passed on. And thus, while the difference between the living creatures of the time before the chalk and those of the present day appear startling, if placed side by side, we are led from one to another by the most gradual process if we follow the course of nature through the whole series of those relics of her operations which she has left behind. . . . The groups which are dying out flourish side by side with the groups which are now the dominant forms of life" (Lecture on a Piece of Chalk).

In ages past, we hold, man was not what he now is. He was once a savage with small brain and feeble intellect, in whom the instincts predominated over the moral and reflecting faculties, who lived more like the brute, from which he had advanced but a few steps, than like the civilized man of to-day. The facts of pre-historic archæology and anthropology have thoroughly exploded the old notion that a few thousand years ago the progenitors of the human race, a perfect and accomplished pair, lived peacefully and blissfully in a delightful paradise, fitted up for them by a heavenly parent. We are acquainted with the very instruments and weapons that man used ages before the alleged date of Adam, with the habits and customs that then prevailed, and the general condition of man in those early times. They all demonstrate that society was rude, homogeneous, and undeveloped and from that simple, barbarous state there has been an evolution of civilization, as from the simplest organic structures there has been an evolution of more complex and beautiful forms of life.

And is not the reflection that man has for ages been slowly advancing from lower to higher condition, and that there is a probability that the human race will one day be as much elevated, intellectually, above its present state, as it is now superior to that of man as he existed before the historic period, more pleasing and encouraging than the thought that we are the descendants of a degenerate Adam, and that it is impossible, by reason of the depravity we have inherited, to advance by our own efforts to a better condition? Surely one is the doctrine of hope and cheer; the other of despondency and despair.

The Christian holds that God is the author of everything save himself, yet believes that sin is the work of the devil. He claims that God made man and the angels with all their powers, active and latent, with certain constitutions, dispositions, and proclivities, yet is not the cause of evil. Evil was introduced into this world, it is said, by the devil in reptilian form. The devil was an angel who kept not his first estate, who rebelled against his maker, and who in punishment therefor was hurled from his high position and expelled from his heavenly home. Although the disobedience and rebellion of this creature were owing to the disposition and tendency of his mind, and although he came direct from the hand of his maker, yet God is not the cause of evil. Although the devil could have had no desire to rebel, had there not been something in his nature to prompt thereto, although the very notion that he sinned implies that he was an imperfect being—for if he were not an imperfect being he must have been a perfect being, on which supposition God, as a perfect being, may not only be the cause of evil, but may himself fall and become a devil—although imperfection implies evil positive or negative, yet it is heterodox to hold that God is the cause of evil.

The Materialist maintains that good and evil are relative terms, that the former designates actions and events that, on the whole, are advantageous to man, while the latter designates those which are injurious in their results. Man has learned in the school of experience what promotes his happiness and what diminishes his enjoyment. The one he calls good, the other evil; the one right, the other wrong. He has learned that certain actions, although they may give him temporary pleasure, are followed by lasting injury to himself or his friends. These the thoughtful man avoids, equally with those which are attended or followed by unmixed suffering. He has learned that other actions, although they cause him pain, or conflict with his immediate interest, result in greater happiness to himself and others than would be possible if they were shunned. These the man of moral courage performs equally with those good deeds which require no nerve nor moral courage to perform. Temperance, honesty, fidelity, and other virtues, are not right because God has said so, or because he sanctions them, but because they promote the health and happiness of men. Intemperance, fraud, and faithlessness are not wrong because God has condemned them, but because they are foes to human happiness. The true foundation of morality is utility. There is, there can be, no other. And our code of ethics is the result of the accumulated experience of man through the ages of his existence. It has been evolved from a few simple rules of action such as govern the life of the savage, by the same principle that a complex organism is developed from the simplest form of life. And the few general principles of morality, far from having been received by a revelation, or impressed on the mind of man by a God, are clearly the result of man's experience, his relation to the world, and his fellow-men.

Christianity say man can be saved only through the blood and merits of Jesus Christ. It teaches us that we are in a fallen, lost condition, owing to the transgression of Adam, who involved the whole human race in the criminality of his disobedience. The strategy of the devil, when he had been hurled from heaven, having blasted the fair prospects of man and defeated the plans of his creator, bringing under his dominion the whole human race, causing even the earth itself to be cursed, God saw fit to provide a scheme by which, consistently with his justice, his creatures could be saved from the terrible fate that they all deserved. In accordance with this wonderful scheme, God, although all-powerful and everywhere present, came upon earth, begat himself, was born of woman, in whose arms he nestled and at whose breast he nursed while a babe, grew to manhood, was persecuted and reviled, and at length arrested, tried, convicted of crime, and finally nailed to a cross, where in agony the most excruciating, he died, exclaiming, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me." Coming to life afterwards, he appeared to his disciples, a few obscure, ignorant men, and leaving the whole world in ignorance as to this great event, and posterity without any means of verifying it, he subsequently ascended to the right hand of himself as Father, to mediate between himself as Son and himself as Father, co-equal and co-eternal, (and including the Holy Ghost), one in three and three in one, and as some theologian has said, "the more one because three, and the more three because one." This great sacrifice was rendered necessary by the agency of the devil, the effects of whose strategy, to add to the absurdity of the story, were foreseen by God from "the beginning;" its object was to redeem man from sin, and to save him from endless damnation. Yet men continue to be sinful, and only a comparatively small number will escape damnation.

Materialists hold that man's condition, although imperfect, is not a "fallen" one, but one which by his own unassisted efforts can be, as in the past it has been, improved. We look for improvement to ourselves, and not to an individual who lived and died eighteen hundred years ago. We believe neither in imputed guilt nor substitutionary righteousness. We certainly cannot be morally criminal for what an ancestor did, although we inherit tendencies or aptitudes the result of ancestral experiences. Nor can our crimes and follies be made less by the blood or merits of Jesus; yet, in so far as Jesus taught correct views, inculcated noble sentiments, and presented to the world an example in life worthy of imitation, he was a savior to his fellow-men; but in no sense in which Socrates, Epictetus, Thomas Paine, Theodore Parker, and all other sages and reformers of ancient and modern times, have not been saviors of man. The death of our nearest and dearest friend, were we guilty of crime, and should he suffer in our stead, would neither diminish our guilt nor satisfy the demands of justice. How can the death of Jesus atone for the sins of the world? We turn not our gaze to a spectacle of suffering and death of eighteen centuries ago for the improvement and elevation of man. It may excite our pity, but it cannot enlighten our understandings, increase our knowledge, or ameliorate our condition. We deem it more important to study our relations, acquaint ourselves with our real needs, increase the facilities for education, encourage habits of self-reliance and independence, promote temperance, and better the material and intellectual condition of the millions whose poverty and hard condition make life almost an intolerable burden.

MY DEAR READERS: During the week that has passed since last we communed together, I am well aware many of you have had before you living illustrations of the varied vegetation of your zone—those of you who reside in the country, beautiful as it is at this season of the year, budding and blooming in the fulness of life and beauty. Nothing interests me more than walking out into the country at this lovely season, and strolling through the groves, the forests and woodlands the pastures and meadows, the fields of waving wheat and corn, and to notice how every individual plant, from the monarch of the forest to the tiniest plant that grows in the garden, is trying to do its utmost to perfect itself, and in absorbing all in its power from the soil and the atmosphere around it, until it has arrived at its matured growth. The study of nature is the grandest of all studies, and the vegetable life that exists upon your globe is about the most interesting part of nature. If you take my advice you will give it a considerable portion of your attention. Let us then, now resume the study of botany where we left off in my last.

There have been two great plans proposed for the classification of plants, one denominated artificial and the other natural. The first is founded on characters taken from certain parts of plants only without reference to others; while the second takes into account all the facts of plants, and involves the idea of affinity in essential organs. In both artificial and natural systems, the lower divisions, namely the genera and species are the same, the great difference between them consisting in the manner in which the genera are grouped into orders, and the orders into classes.

The largest general groups, called CLASSES are allied to each other in important structural characteristics. The vegetable kingdom is divided into seven classes, beginning with the thallogens, which are the simplest plants existing without the distinction of leaf and stem, and also destitute of flowers; and ascending, with the acrogens, rhizogens, endogens, dictyogens, and gymnogens, up to the exogens, or perfect plants.

ORDERS are divisions of alliances, synonymous with family, and comprising those genera which, though varying in some respects from each other, have the essential characteristics alike. Thus mustards, turnips, radishes, and cabbages all belong to different genera, but they all agree in their general structure and hence are included in the order brassicaceæ. The orders are the most important of all associations in botany, and on their accuracy and distinctness botanists have bestowed the highest degree of attention. The number of orders in the approved systems is over three hundred, which number is more than ten times the number of classes.

GENERA, or GENUS, is a subdivision of orders, and is a term applied to a collection of species of plants which resemble one another in general structure and appearance more than they resemble any other species. Thus the various kinds of bramble or blackberries constitute one genus, the roses another, the heaths, willows, clovers, oaks, etc., form also, in like manner, so many different genera. The characters of a genus are taken exclusively from the organs of reproduction, while those of a species are derived generally from all parts of the plants. Hence a genus may be defined as an assemblage of species which resemble one another in the structure and general characteristics of their organs of reproduction. It does not necessarily happen that a genus should contain a number of species, for if a single one presents peculiarities of a marked kind, it may of itself constitute a genus.

SPECIES are the subdivisions of the genera, and are a group of such individual plants as have an essential identity in all qualities proceeding from their alternate constitution or nature. The term is employed to designate a collection of indviduals which resemble each other, being, inferior to genus and superior to variety. Species under certain circumstances are liable to variations, but all varieties have a tendency to revert to their original specific type. Species were formerly considered a permanent production of nature, capable of variation within certain limits, but in no case capable of being so altered as to assume the character of another species. But your modern scientists, who have discovered that species are not immutable, but are liable to change to an almost unlimited extent, are far nearer the truth. The species of both plants and animals by the operation of causes acting over a long period of time may become so altered that they preserve scarcely any apparent resemblance to those from which they sprung.

VARIETY is a term applied to individuals of the same species, which, from the operation of different causes, as age, climate, locality, and other conditions, present deviations from the specific type in size, color, form, and proportions; but have the capacity of reverting to the original specific form in successive generations, on the cessation of the influences under which the variety originated.

Plants in the higher artificial divisions, or classes, have no necessary affinity and are connected only by certain characters, more or less superficial, which have been selected as the signs of that division. Such a system may therefore be compared to a dictionary in which words are arranged for convenience of reference, in alphabetical order, adjacent words not necessarily agreeing with each other, further than in commencing with the same letter. In a natural order, on the contrary, all the general will be found to have a true family likeness; for their association is the result of a careful consideration of the structure of every organ. The classes in the natural system have been formed upon the same principle, by uniting orders which possess many important characters in common. What is called the Linnæan system leads to little more than a knowledge of names, and can only be looked upon as an index to the genera. Though superior to every artificial scheme previously promulgated, its day has gone by, and the more philosophical system has taken its place. Linnæus himself never intended it to be anything more than a provisional arrangement; and distinctly stated that a natural method was the great object of scientific inquiry.

The general principles of the Linnæan, or sexual system, may be explained in a few words. Twenty-four classes are founded on the number, position, relative lengths, and connection of the stamens, while the orders in their classes depend upon the number of the styles, the nature of the fruit, the number of the stamens, in the classes where this character is not used for distinguishing them in the perfection of the flowers.

The twenty-fourth class includes plants having inconspicuous flowers, and in it the orders are found according to their natural affinities. Under these classes and orders all the known genera and species are arranged. Even as an artificial method of discovering the names of the plants the Linnæan system has many imperfections. Being based upon the more obvious characters of the reproductive organs, it cannot be of the least use when the plants are not in full flower, with all the stamens and styles perfect. The different flowers on the same plant often vary as regards the number of the stamens. Again, if the classification was carried out rigidly, it would separate, in many instances, the species of the same genus; but so sensible was Linnæus of the importance of maintaining the natural character of his genera that he sacrificed the symmetry of the scheme for the sake of keeping all the species together.

The natural system of classification is based upon the real affinities of plants, and necessarily takes into account all the organs. Though it can never be perfect until all the plants on the globe have been examined, it has already reached a very high point of development, and a great number of the orders which have been determined are quite as natural as the orders in the animal kingdom. For example: those groups of plants designated as ranunculaceæ, gentianaceæ, and atropaceæ are as distinct in their character as those animal groups named cetacea, cheiroptera, and rodentia. Such being the case, it follows that a knowledge may be gained of the most important characters of all the other plants in the same natural group. Thus, by studying the common radish (raphanus), or the mustard (sinapis), the botanist may obtain a general knowledge of about sixteen hundred species, which constitute the order of brassicaceæ, and which are all formed, as it were, on the same type.

The properties of plants accord in a very remarkable manner with their structure; and, as a general rule, the position of a plant in the natural arrangement indicates its properties. For example: if a botanist, on examining a plant, finds all the structural peculiarities of the order just mentioned, he may feel confident that it is not poisonous, but most likely antiscorbutic or pungent. If, however, he should meet with one of the atropaceæ, he might safely set it down as a plant possessing poisonous, narcotic properties.

Enough has been said to prove that the natural system is much more than a mere index to the names of plants. It reveals to a certain extent, the order of creation, if so it may be called, and is at once an aid to research and a record of discovery. Several schemes based upon the natural affinities of plants have been devised. They may be regarded as so many versions of the one true system, for though they have been worked out by different methods, they agree in nearly all their grand divisions. The characters by which the primary groups have been determined are furnished by the elementary tissues and the more important organs of vegetation and reproduction. Regarding only the elementary structure, plants may be arranged under the heads of cellular and vascular, according to the absence or presence of regular vessels.

A more satisfactory arrangement results from a consideration of the different modes by which plants are propagated. Some spring from true seeds, containing the rudimentary organs called cotyledons, while others are developed from spores, in which no distinct organs can be traced. The former are said to be cotyledonous, and the latter acotyledonous (that is, without cotyledons).

As the number of cotyledons forms a natural, distinctive character, the first group of plants is subdivided into monocotyledonous, having one cotyledon, and dicotyledonous, having two cotyledons. The mode in which the root is produced affords characters which confirm this arrangement. The young root of an acotyledon is heterorhizal; that of a monocotyledon is endorhizal, and that of a dicotyledon exorhizal.

But, my friends, I will not weary nor puzzle you longer with these hard, unpronounceable, and non-understandable names on this occasion. You know when we professors get warmed up on one of our favorite themes that we make no more of rattling off a lot of hard scientific terms than a citizen of Paris does of talking French. Next week I will be with you again, if nothing more than I know of now prevents, when I will again take up my favorite topic of botany, or talk to you on some other subject, as the humor may take me. In the mean time, good-bye.

Your steadfast friend, LUCIFER.

Abbot and the Petition.

BY THERON C. LELAND. ARTICLE IV.

We come down now to the 17th of January, when Mr. Abbot returned to the defense of Comstock, and a still farther and most false and malignant attack on Mr. Bennett, in an article in The Index under the head of "Inviolability of the Mails." He opens with a statement that there has been a general impression that Comstock was "legally empowered to open 'sealed letters' in order to detect dealers in obscene literature." He then goes on to show the contrary, and quotes an article from the N. Y. Sun of last year, including a letter from Comstock (ever ready to publish any defense of Comstock.) wherein that obscene agent explains himself, and says he has no power to open sealed letters and has not done so, and that "no law allows even the Postmaster-General to tamper with a letter sent through the mail to the humblest or wickedest individual in the land." After thus vindicating Comstock from opening sealed letters, which neither the 70 000, nor the petition, nor THE TRUTH SEEKER ever said he did, Mr. Abbot jumps to the conclusion, like the man of illogic he chooses to be when he thinks he can escape under a seeming plausibility, and proclaims, in all the potency of capitals, "let it be well understood now that ANTHONY COMSTOCK HAS NO LEGAL RIGHT WHATEVER TO TAMPER WITH THE MAILS!" Now, readers will observe that all that had gone before, including Comstock's explanation, referred only and wholly to "sealed letters," but Abbot concludes from his premises—not that Comstock has no legal right to tamper with "sealed letters," as any logician would do who cared for correct conclusions, or who gave credit to his readers for intelligence, or whose object was not to throw dust, but he concludes, therefore "Comstock has no legal right to tamper with the mails;" just as if "the mails" were one and the same thing with "sealed letters;" just as if there was nothing in the mails but sealed letters; just as if our petition said anything about or had any reference to sealed letters; and totally suppressing the fact that we were petitioning for the repeal or modification of the law regulating the transportation not of sealed letters, but printed matter in the U. S Mails. And yet this is the man who charged others with getting up "side issues," complains bitterly that he is quoted as saying what he did not say, and weeps "saut, saut, tears" if anybody "vilified" him.

Then the article goes on to say, "Another false impression is that Congress has no Constitutional right to exclude anything from the mails. On this point the following article from the New York Tribune of June 12, 1877, also cut out at the time, is pertinent and conclusive:

"'LOTTERIES AND THE MAILS.—A decision of Judge Blatchford in the District Court sustains the constitutionality of the act of Congress excluding from the United States mails letters or circulars concerning lotteries, gift-concerts, and similar enterprises. One Jackson, who is an agent for the Havana, Kentucky, and other lotteries, was arrested for the violation of this law. As he was held to answer, his counsel, Judge Dittenhoefer, took out a writ of habeas corpus, and brought him before Judge Blatchford. The ground taken for his release was that constitutionally Congress had no right to exclude any sealed letter from the mails, whatever might be its contents. Judge Blatchford, however, in his decision, took an entirely opposite view of the question, holding that as Congress had the power to establish post-offices and post-roads it had also a right to determine what it will and what it will not carry. So the prisoner took nothing by his habeas corpus, and was remanded to custody.'"

The quotation from the Tribune goes on farther, giving the views of the writer, which being neither law nor judicial opinion need not be quoted here.

Then Mr. Abbot again concludes, and once more in capital letters, jumping quite as wildly as he did before, "Let it be well understood then, that the constitutional right of Congress to exclude from the mails lottery matter, and, by the same reasoning, obscene matter, HAS ALREADY BEEN JUDICIALLY ESTABLISHED."

Now when a man ventures on capital letters in that imposing cock-sure way, he ought to be reasonably certain that he is right; but with his usual vigilance for the future and neglect of the present he drifted a trifle out of his reckoning when he said, "Has already been judicially established." The fact is, this lottery case was, at the time of Mr. Abbot's writing, still in court, on appeal from the above ruling in a lower court, and had not been argued nor tried in the Supreme Court to which it was appealed. It was not til this very month of June that the right to exclude lottery matter from the mails "had already been judicially established." Nothing ever is established while an appeal is pending in a higher court. Then the great logician says, "By the same reasoning" the right of Congress to exclude obscene matter from the mails "has already been judicially established." But since dealing in lotteries is gambling, getting something for nothing, and consequently a crime, and dealing in obscene, and as the law says "immoral," matter is only a vice, it would seem that courts and legislators ought to establish the right by a somewhat different course of reasoning. Comstock's own crowd is a "Society for the Suppression of Vice," not of crime. We leave it to all readers to judge whether it could be quite as judicially, legislatively, or in any way established "by the same reasoning" that Congress should pass laws to prevent citizens from being vicious or immoral as from being criminal. And now the decision just rendered in the U. S. Supreme Court, though dead against the lottery people, is more in favor of Liberal publishers than the law stood as Comstock and his courts had been interpreting it, and Comstock will find it still harder, if not impossible, to get decision in his favor since this decision. We are obliged to the court for such a recognition of the old, old doctrine that freedom of the press must be maintained, and especially for the distinct statement that "liberty of circulating is essential to that of freedom." Nothing of the kind was said about the liberty of circulating lottery tickets; so you see "the same reasoning" which rattles around in the Abbot logic box didn't influence the Supreme Court.

We now go forward to a very serious matter. The article under criticism continues:

"The attacks made upon us in THE TRUTH SEEKER because we at the same time spoke kind words in defense of Mr. D. M. Bennett and yet opposed a petition asking for the total repeal of the 'obscene literature' laws, have filled us with astonishment. The ground we took was in favor of Mr. Bennett's acquittal, and of such radical changes in the existing laws as should render it impossible to prosecute any but the vile wretches who make it their sole business to pollute and destroy. To misunderstand was impossible; it was only possible to misrepresent. But we have too little respect for the spirit which flies to insinuations and malicious accusations whenever arguments fail, to spend any time on them here. The Liberals of America ought to be above such littleness; if they are not, we do not choose to keep them company in it. The advice we gave about that petition was wise and good, as time will show; and we reiterate it with increased emphasis, when such an advertisement as this published in the New York Tribune of January 3, is thrust upon public notice:

"'The public are respectfully informed that the use of our name in connection with a circular petition, issued by one D. M. Bennett, is wholly unauthorized.

"'It is a matter of regret that our laws provide no suitable penalty for off-nses of this kind. MCKESSON & R BBINS,

"'Wholesale Druggists, 91 Fulton St, New York City.'

"The same paper states that McKesson & Robbins have brought suit against Mr. Bennett for 'having refused to strike their names from his circular.' We submit that, no matter what its objects, a petition pressed in such ways as these—putting on it the names of some parties against their protest, and slandering others because they decline to sign it—is just such a petition as should be left severely alone. It is rather late in the nineteenth century to imagine that such tactics as these can succeed with intelligent or high-spirited Liberals. The cause of Liberalism is the cause of purity, of truthfulness, of justice, of common kindness, of a noble morality in the very best sense of that word; and it can only be served by methods as high and noble as its objects."

The "kind words" in defense of Mr. D. M. Bennett are perfectly well understood in THE TRUTH SEEKER office. The presiding genius there isn't exactly green, if he is "uncultured." He knows that "kind words" are part of the machinery of the assassin in diligent search for the fifth rib, whereunder to plant a deadly blow. But granting that the kind words and defense are sincere, it will still remain true that no dairyman deems an Alderney of much value who gives a good pail of milk and then kicks it over; and Mr. Bennett will be pardoned for not going into raptures over a defense with the kind of kind words which Mr. Abbot gives himself so much credit for putting in it.

The terrible charge contained in the McKesson & Robbin's advertisement has been explained to the satisfaction of every one, and the details of it need not be gone over now. There was plenty of time and opportunity for Mr. Abbot to find out the circumstances and the truth of that matter if he had not been over-anxious to seize or make every possible opportunity for striking. One little postal card, costing a cent, and asking Mr. Bennett if such a statement, improbable in every line and letter of it, could possibly be true, would have procured a card in return assuring the inquirer that there was not a word of truth in it. But with his determinatian to credit not only every statement Comstock himself makes, but every accusation that the obscene Agent can browbeat and bulldoze others into making, and his determination, on the other hand, to discredit any and every statement a Liberal may make, he posted with dextrous haste, without inquiring into the facts, to publish that advertisement with the comments above quoted.

That, however, is not the worst aspect of the case. Mr. Bennett wrote Mr. Abbot a personal letter of explanation after the above appeared in The Index. I also wrote a similar letter stating the facts. Mr. Abbot published both letters in The Index of January 31st. That, indeed, was some reparation, but not all that was due. Did Mr. Abbot, as a gentleman ought, and as a friendly Liberal working in the same great cause certainly would have done, withdraw his own editorial words and apologize for his ungenerous comments on the wholly unjust advertisement? Not the slightest. Not a word of regret or "amende honorable" did he offer. A heedless man who runs against you in the street, or treads on your corns in an omnibus, will politely beg your pardon; but your boor of a Liberal editor, proud of his culture beyond the attainments of other men, listens to a story originating with a common liar, publishes it broadcast, with a black crow contributed of his own; and then, when the story is proved false, what does he say? what reparation does he make? Why, just simply, coldly, and only this in The Index of Januray 31st: "Mr. Bennett explains his use of the name of McKesson & Robbins on his circular. We drop that subject, not wishing to comment on his explanations."

No wonder he drops the subject, but it was an exceedingly good place and time to put in some "explanations" of his own. Nothing of the kind, however, appears.

I have recently met some Liberals who, hoping that they might be able to retain some remaining confidence in Mr. Abbot, have said: "I think he means well; no doubt he is honest." And I have replied: "I thought so, too, for a time—as long as I could; but I am now compelled to the conclusion that he is not even honest." His persistent assertion that the 70,000 petition for "total repeal," when the language of the petition is "repeal, or modification," shows that he is not honest. His twist of Comstock's denial that he tampered with sealed letters into "tamper with the mails," as noted above, shows that he isn't honest. His representation of his interview with Col. Ingersoll, and what the Colonel said to him, shows that he isn't honest. His publication of the McKesson advertisement, with dishonorable comments, which he did not at once retract and does not yet express regret for, shows not only that he is no gentleman, but that he is meanly and dastardly dishonest; and the stain of this dishonor will never "leave its tinct," nor be erased from the proud escutcheon of Mr. Abbot till he makes ample apology for the injustice done.

Then, worse than all, more blamably worse than his forgetfulness of what he owes to the individual, what is due from one gentleman to another, especially from one Liberal editor to another—who ought to be the soul of honor, and as regal as high-born princes in their intercourse and relations—I say, worst of all in this dishonorable business set on foot by Mr. Abbot—for it is never to be forgotten that he began this fight and Mr. Bennett does but defend himself—is his suggestion, by even the remotest implication, that the 70,000 who signed the petition for repeal or modification are patrons of obscenity, dealers in obscenity, advocates of obscenity, petitioning to abolish all laws, State and municipal, and every bulwark against obscenity; and for this I denounce him as the arch-defamer in this scandal-breeding age. There are depravities very nearly total in politics. There are conceptions in sin and births in iniquity so degenerate in the Church that I do not wonder at their cheerful doctrine of a last judgment by fire to finally consume the whole bad lot; but this slander uttered against the seventy thousand, the very elect of Liberalism, these aspersions on the salt of the earth and crême de la crême of intellectual and social progress, out-deprave the worst depravity in politics, and out-engender the lowest defamations that ever proceeded from the bosom of the Church. Such barkings are to be expected from the savage creatures whelped out of the womb of a dogmatic theology. They are what one might predict of those rickety and aborted people who are fed and nourished through the whole of their useless lives on whims and superstitions. These are known and conceded sources of first-class calumnies, and Mr. Abbot has certainly gone there for first rough models of his own. He never found any warrant for them in Liberalism. No principle of science or formula of Freethought ever inspired such diatribes against 70,000 petitioners for repeal or modification of this great outrage on freedom of the press. If "free religion" is to be credited with this unseemly exhibition, and held responsible for these deeds done in The Index, I am afraid that genuine Liberals will have to learn to like it as they would the luxury of contracting the tobacco habit—only after discouraging fits of nausea and a world of retching, wry-face, and revolt.

"Though we break our father's promise, we have nobler duties first;
The traitor to Humanity is the traitor most accursed.
Man is more than Constitutions; better rot beneath the sod
Than be true to Church and State while we are doubly false to God."

As the Moon and the planets have no light of their own, and only shine with the reflected light of the Sun, their spectrum must consequently resemble that of the Sun, modified only by the passage of the light through the atmospheres of the planets or by the reflection on their surface.

The spectrum of the Moon does not indicate that our satellite is surrounded by any atmosphere, nor any other distinctive feature. In that of Jupiter there is a dark band corresponding to certain atmospheric terrestrial rays, and indicating therefore the presence of vapors similar to those in our own atmosphere. Another band denotes the presence of certain gases and vapors which do not exist there. The spectrum of Saturn is somewhat faint, but it contains certain rays similar to those in the spectrum of Jupiter.

M. Janssen ascertained that many of the atmospheric rays are produced by vapor of water, and it is probable that this aqueous vapor does exist in the atmospheres of Jupiter and Saturn. He goes on to say: "During my recent mission to Italy and Greece, I took observations of several planets in regard to this point, notably from the summit of Etna, where the influence of the atmosphere is almost nullified. These observations, and some subsequent ones, made with the most powerful instruments, indicate the presence of vapor of water in the atmospheres of Mars and Saturn, thus adding a new and important feature to the already close analogies which connect the planets of our system. So we see that all these planets form as it were one family, circulating around one focus, which distributes amongst them heat and light. Each of them has its year, its seasons, its atmosphere, and many of them are known to contain clouds within their atmosphere.

"And, in addition, water, which is so important an element in the economy of every organism, is also common to them. These facts give us strong ground for supposing that life is not the exclusive privilege of our little Earth, herself but one of the younger sisters in the great family of planets!" *

Certain rose-tinted groups have been remarked in the spectrum of Mars, which may have some connection with the red hue distinctive of this planet.

The spectrum of Venus does not show any additional ray to denote the presence of an atmosphere. The absence of these rays may perhaps arise from the fact that the light is probably reflected, not by the surface of the planet, but by clouds some height above it.

X.

The stars, though much farther from us than the Moon and the planets, possessing, as they do, their own source of light, furnish us with more detailed information as to the nature of the elements of which they are constituted.

Until the secret of spectrum analysis was discovered, we knew nothing about the stars, beyond the fact of their immeasurable distance and their striking beauty; now we are in a position to learn some details of their real character.

Spectrum observations tell us that the stars resemble the Sun, as to the general character of their composition. Their light, like that of the Sun, emanates from a matter raised to an intense white heat, and traverses an atmosphere of absorbing vapors. Yet, notwithstanding this structural unity, each star differs from the other, though not to an essential degree, in its chemical composition. Judging them by their spectra, they may be divided into four perfectly distinct types, though a few of the spectra, instead of belonging to one of these four categories, seem to be intermediate between them.† With a few exceptions, the terrestrial elements which are most largely distributed amongst the stars are precisely those which are essential to life as it is on the Earth, such as hydrogen, sodium, magnesium, and iron. The hydrogen, sodium, and magnesium also represent the ocean, which is an essential part of a world constituted as the Earth is.

Looking at the stars generally, they seem brilliant, like colorless diamonds, red, orange, or yellow tinted; but this is not so if they are carefully watched, or observed through a glass, for then we can see next to the red or orange-tinted stars others of a blue, green, or purple color. The spectrum analysis shows us that these diverse colors are produced by the vapors in suspense in their atmospheres, and we know that the composition of a stellar atmosphere is in turn dependent upon the elements which constitute the star, and upon its temperature.

Spectrum analysis of the variable transient stars also reveals to us the phenomena produced by the incessant changes that react upon the rays which these stars transmit to us. Thus it is that we have received tidings of the great perturbations taking place in the brilliant star Corona, which was only recently observed, and which has already decreased in brilliancy.

XI.

During the last 150 years astronomers have been constantly revolving in their minds the veritable nature of the slightly luminous nebulosities (nebulæ) which stand out from the dark surface of the firmament—conglomerations so filmy in substance as to remind one of the comets. This question has become all the more interesting now that they are held to be a part of original matter—embryo stars.

The telescope has failed to enlighten us on this head, though it is true that since the object glasses have been made larger, many of these bodies have turned out to be actual stars. But at the same time other nebulosities, hitherto undiscovered, have been brought within the field of vision, to say nothing of other fantastic figures (aggregations of diffused light), which it is impossible to look upon as the produce of the combined brilliancy of countless suns situated at distances more or less unfathomable.

The American Lady.—Concluded

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

There are heated discussions going on all the time among us in regard to woman's opportunity for work. It is a demand that women should be allowed to work. Well, certainly, she has the right if she wishes to exercise it. There is no reason in the nature of things why a woman, simply from the fact of her being a woman, should not do everything that she can do. If she can paint, or play, or act, or sing, or teach, or nurse, or heal diseases, or plead causes, or preach the gospel of peace and good will, in God's name why should she not do it? If there is a gift, the possession of the gift entitles it to its exercise, nay, demands its exercise. If there be a talent, where is the law that forbids its being used? But if there be that divinest quality called genius in man or woman—genius has no sex, genius knows no difference between male and female—the possession of genius is a call from heaven to go forth and to do what the genius bids; whether it be to enter the sick room as nurse or physician, or to stand before jurors to plead for justice, or to occupy the platform and speak for peace and gentleness and good will, to preach the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man to all who may be drawn to hear. Is this a privilege? No. A right? No. A duty? Yes. And for my part, I have never been able for a moment to see that there was any question about it. There is nothing to discuss. Where there is human power there is human obligation. And yet I must confess that to me it is a sad, a melancholy fact that women must work for the bread they eat. It is not a question whether they may work; it is imposed upon thousands and tens of thousands that they shall or starve. A woman must stand upon her own feet and labor with her own hands; she must strain every power, economize and turn to account every atom of talent and force she possesses, to put bread into the mouths of herself and her children. It is not a question whether she shall be permitted to work; but who shall deny the plea she makes when she is starving and penniless? But, still I say, it is a melancholy necessity. The old Scripture speaks of labor as a curse. There is a sense in which it is. For while there is a noble side to all labor, an esthetic and beautiful side to it, there is a side that is base and coarse and ignoble. Whoever is obliged to earn his livelihood in the world by doing work, must be exposed to perils and temptations, to a baseness and duplicity and coarseness which degrade the finest life. There is a coarsening influence in all work. Even the artist—living in an atmosphere of pure beauty, painting scenes from nature, or making portraits of the divinest countenances of men and women—the moment it is a question of selling the picture, the moment the thought of a market comes in, he leaves the artist's atmosphere and becomes a trader, a mechanic. And hence it is that so many artists disappoint us, when we know them, by a lurking, mercenary spirit that taints all their work. No, the effort of the present day is to refine woman and emancipate man from work. We hand over the rougher and grosser and more degrading work to machinery, to cattle and horses, to the beasts; but we would allow room in the upper sphere for intellectual, refined, sensitive labor, labor that shall bring into play the finer sentiments, the more ethereal qualities of the mind. Are we, then, willing to plunge women into work that we ourselves wish to escape from? For my part I am always thankful when a woman is able to leave work behind, and devote herself to accomplishments and refinements and the cultivation of the more elegant tastes, the enriching of her own mind, and the beautifying of her own heart. This, I think, is woman's work. But when a lady is immersed in mercenary work, as she must be so often, it must be her aim not to lose herself in it, but to keep the sweet, delicate aroma of her nature pure and unsullied, and show those with whom she labors, those who bear with her the same lot in life, how possible it is for one to deal with the commonest and coarsest as well as the grandest problems of existence without contamination, and by her example to glorify, beautify, and transfigure them, and lift them up into an ethereal and purer sphere of thought.

And what shall we say of the other claim that is made for women in these days in America—the claim of a share in political life? Alas, that they should ask for it! Alas, that they should desire to go into the arena to fight with beasts! Yet if any claim the right there is nothing in the genius of American ideas or American institutions to forbid. Is not a woman a person? Is she not taxed, and is she not a holder of property? Has she not to obey the laws? Is she not interested in the complexion of the institutions beneath which her own family are reared? Is she entitled to have no voice in the government which she and all must obey? I certainly think and I freely say she has. And if she chooses to do it, well, there is nothing in the genius of American institutions to say her nay. But why should she choose? When we see how hard it is for the noblest men, the most massive intellectual characters, the noblest in training, the most accomplished, the most cultivated, those born of the best stock, those used to the best principles—when we see how hard it is for these to hold their own and preserve their courage, their truth, their manliness, their personal dignity, their private honor, and their grandeur of manhood amid all the complexity of business, all the meanness and baseness to which they are inevitably exposed, just as soon as they step over the threshold of private life and take any part in affairs, can we suppose that women shall feel nothing of this, that all these degrading and debasing influences that play like batteries against the gentlemanliness of gentlemen will leave them untouched? And when women come into the political field, can we believe that politics all at once will be sublimated, and purified, and glorified? Alas! it seems to me that people who think so never can have looked at the facts, never can have realized how inevitable it is that a new form of danger will be introduced in political life, a danger suggesting impurity, temptation, casuistry, deceit, trickery, and maneuvering, such as now is not exemplified even in Washington. Who would vote for having more females in politics; who would cause an eruption of tens of thousands of women without character, without sympathy, without nobleness, without intelligence, without an idea of what law, or justice, or kindness should be—who would vote for the introduction of all these into the chicanery and strife of political life? Would we have more feeling, more sentiment, more softness and babble introduced into the arena where now we need men of steel? And what place will the lady have? She desires to keep out. She sees the danger. And yet has she nothing to do with taking an interest in affairs that are at stake, in purifying our institutions, elevating the laws, and refining the political sentiment which today taints society? The influence of ladies in politics, as I read history, has occasionally been most salutary, but they are exceptions. Women, by their sincerity, by their simplicity, their nobleness, their sense of truth, their swiftness of apprehension, and their magnetic sympathy, might often defeat the wiles of the politicians, and lead them into peace and kindness where they are treading the path of violence and wrong.

But women can do that now. Standing outside of the arena, taking the combatants when they are off the field, when noisy passion is dead and party weapons are sheathed, they can play upon their lives, upon their turbulent spirits, with that soft, gentle, fine persuasion which is an enviable power. I plead for this in this American society of ours. I plead for gentlemanliness, I plead for ladyhood, I plead for everything that can refine and elevate, and beautify the grosser elements of our being; I plead for art, for poetry, for culture, for beauty, accomplishments, and grace in women; I plead for all these. Let us resist the temptation to merge ladyhood and all womanhood into the female. Let us all strive more and more, with a more desperate resolve, to emancipate womanhood and ladyhood from the grosser affairs of life and hold them above the merely female or rudimental condition.

How shall ladyhood be educated? That is the question. In past times religion has done more for them than all other causes put together. No one who has been in Europe and visited the great cathedrals, and seen how everything was brought to bear upon the more sensitive and spiritual nature of men and women, can fail to appreciate the immense influence that religion, as presented to the eye in form and color in happy combination, must have exerted, especially upon the sensitive nature of woman. One cannot fail to be influenced by the lovely outlines of the heavenly features, and the sweet and gracious form of Christ, and that exquisite image of everlasting and unspeakable tenderness of the Holy Virgin, having her shrine always ready to listen to the voice of complaint, to dry the tear of misery, and give ear to the call of the suffering. It is simply impossible that women, coming from the huts and hovels of their low and darkened existence into this radiant atmosphere, should not be stirred and attracted and elevated by this light and beauty. What substitute have we for this? God has become the unknown and the unknowable; the Christ has faded into mythology, the beautiful Lady of Mercy is a picture. And yet the old, sweet, everlasting principles are always the same. There are the over-arching heavens of sweet and lovely sentiment in the past; there are the gracious forms of men and women whom it is a benediction only to think of, and around us are men and women at whose feet it is a privilege to kneel, whose hand it is a dignity to kiss. Look to these blessed people that draw us as soon as we come near to them, and let the gracious, healing, inspiring influence of their souls be a benediction to yourselves; then, as Beatrice drew with her loving eyes the wandering Dante towards Paradise, as Gretchen glorified and forgiven, blesses and emancipates her thousands, so the eternal in womanhood will lure us onward and upward.

THE BOOK OF THE GENERATION OF JESUS.

CHAPTER I.

In the year 671, in the fourth millenary, in the days of Janneus, the king, otherwise called Alexander,* a great misfortune happened to Israel.

There was a certain idle and worthless debauchee named Joseph Pandera, who was cut off from the tribe of Judah. He was a man of fine figure and rare beauty, but steeped in vice. He lived at Bethlehem of Judea.

Near by there lived a widow, who had a daughter named Miriam, of whom mention is several times made in the Talmud as a dresser of women's hair. This daughter was betrothed by her mother to a very chaste, gentle, and pious youth named Jochanan.

Now it happened that Joseph occasionally passed by Miriam's door and saw her. Then he began to have an unholy affection for her. So he went to and fro about the place, and at length the mother said to him, What maketh thee so thin? He replied, I want to marry Miriam.

Then, said the mother, I would not deny thee the favor; see if she is willing, and do with her as thou pleasest.

Obeying her counsel, Joseph Pandera went frequently by the house, but did not find a suitable time until one Sabbath evening, when he happened to find her sitting before the door.

Then he went into the house with her, and both sat down in a dormitory near the door, for she thought he was her betrothed, Jochanan.

Tum ea homine ait: Ne me attingito: in menstruis sum. Sed is morem illi non gerebat, cumque circa eam voluntati suæ obsequutus fuisset, in domum suam abit.

Circa medium noctis iterum in eo exardescere desiderium malum. Ergo somno levatus ad domum Miriamis viam affectans, ad cellan se confert, factumque repetit.

Valde autem exhorruit puella, et quid hoc, ait, sibi vult Domine, quod eadem nocte bis me convenisti? idque non passa sum ab eo inde tempore quo sponsam me tibi elegisti.

Verum is silens secundo, nec verbum ullum proloquitur. Ergo Miriam queri. Quousque tu peccato scelus addis? annon pridem tibi dixi esse me menstruatam?

Verum ille non attendebat ad egus verba, sed desiderio satisfaciebat, ac tum postea iter pergebat suum.†

After three months, Jochanan was told that his betrothed was enciente. In great agitation, he went to his preceptor, Simeon Shetachides, and, telling him about the matter, asked him what he ought to do.

The preceptor inquired, Dost thou suspect any one? Jochanan said, Nobody, except Joseph Pandera, who is a great debauchee, and liveth near her house.

The preceptor said, My son, take my advice, and keep silent; for if he hath been there he will surely go there again. Therefore be wise, and get a witness, so that thou mayest fetch him up before the great Sanhedrim.

The young man went home and was sorely troubled. He thought to himself, When this thing becometh known the people will say it is my doing. Therefore to avoid the shame and disgrace he ran away to Babylon and there took up his abode.

In due time Miriam brought forth a son and named him Jehoshua, after her mother's brother. She sent the boy to a teacher named Elchanan, with whom he made progress in learning, for his mind was very bright.

And it came to pass by and by that he met the senators of the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem. It was then the custom that whoever met those senators should cover his head and make obeisance.

But this boy as he walked past them bared his head, and touching his forehead saluted his preceptor only.

Then all began to say, What impudence! probably he is a bastard. But one of them said, Indeed he is a bastard, and the son of a separated woman.

Presently Simeon Shetachides said, I remember now that not many years ago my pupil Jochanan came to me and said, Alas! what a shame and disgrace has happened to me! for Miriam my betrothed is enciente, not by me, but by some one else. This is the son of that Miriam.

And when I inquired if he suspected any one, he said, Joseph Pandera, who was near neighbor of hers. And soon afterwards Jochanan went to Babylon where he dwelleth even now.

Then they all said, If these things are so, this boy is indeed a bastard and the son of a separated woman. Then they published him as such by the blowing of three hundred trumpets, declaring him not fit to come into the congregation, and called his name Jeshu, signifying that his name and memory deserved to perish.

When it became known that he was declared unworthy to be admitted into the congregation, Jeshu with a sad heart fled to upper Galilee, where he dwelt many years.

In those days there was a stone in the Temple on which was inscribed the inexpressible name of God. For when David laid the foundation he found a certain stone at the mouth of an abyss on which the name was engraved, and taking it up he deposited it in the Holy of Holies.

* Alexander Janneus reigned over Jewry, according to Josephus, twenty-seven years; and his reign ended between 81 and 78 B.C., according to various authorities. The year 671 of the Olympiad of Iphitus (i.e., the third year of the one hundred and sixty-eighth Olympiad) is undoubtedly the date referred to, which coincides with about the first year of the reign of Janneus. The Roman era would hardly be adopted by a Jew. Besides, 671 A. U. C (82 B. C) would make Jeshu a mere boy at his death, while the year 671 of the era of Nabonassar would fall just this side of the reign of Janneus, and make Jeshu a mere infant, instead of an adult of about thirty years or more, when he died.

† Decency forbids the translation of these few lines, although there are many passages in Holy Writ that are worse.

But when the wise men feared that perchance studious youths might learn this name and bring destruction upon the world (which calamity may God forbid) they made two brazen lions (leones) with incantations, and placed them before the Holy of Holies, one on the right and the other on the left. If therefore any one drew near and learned the hidden name, as he went away the lions barked at him, so that in his fright he forgot the name forever. *

Now when the report that Jeshu was a bastard had spread abroad, he left upper Galilee, and coming secretly to Jerusalem he went into the Temple and there learned the secret letters; and when he had written the hidden name on a piece of parchment, and spoken it, he cut open his flesh and inclosed therein the mysterious parchment. Then having again pronounced the name, he closed up the flesh.

To enter the temple it is necessary to use magic and incantations, otherwise how could the most holy priests, the descendants of Aaron, go therein? Therefore it is manifest that Jeshu did all this by the art of magic and the power of an impure name.

As he was coming out of the door the dogs (canes) barked, and he forgot the name. So he went outside of the city, and, having reopened his flesh, drew forth the writing, examined well the characters, and got full possession of the name.

Then he went to Bethlehem, the place of his nativity, and, with loud voice, cried out, Who are these bad men who report me to be a bastard and of impure birth? They are themselves bastards and impure.

Did not a virgin bear me? Did not my mother conceive me in the top of her head? Indeed I am the Son of God, and concerning me the prophet Esaias spoke, saying, Behold, a virgin shall conceive, &c. Did I not form myself, and the heaven, earth, sea, and all things contained therein?

Then they all answered and said, Make known by some sign, and show by a miracle, that thou art God. He, answering, said, Bring hither to me a dead man and I will restore him to life.

The people made haste, and having dug into a certain sepulchre, found there nothing but dry bones. And when they told him that they had found only bones, he said, Bring them hither.

And when they were brought, he put all the bones together and covered them with skin, flesh, and nerves; so he that had been a dead man stood up on his feet alive.

The people seeing this, marveled. Then he said, Do you wonder at this? Bring me a leper and I will cure him. And when they had brought a leper he restored him to health in like manner through the ineffable name. Which, when the people saw, they fell down and worshiped him, saying, Verily, thou art the Son of God.

And it came to pass, after the fifth day, that the dismal tidings were brought to Jerusalem, the most holy city, and there all the things were told which Jeshu had done. Then the vagabonds rejoiced greatly; but the old men, the devout, and the wise wept bitterly; and in the greater and the lesser Sanhedrim there was sore lamentation.

At length they all resolved to send messengers to Jeshu, saying among themselves, It may be that by the help of the Lord we shall capture him, convict him, and condemn him to death.

Therefore they sent Ananaias and Achasaias, most honorable men of the lesser Sanhedrim, who went and fell down before Jeshu in adoration, thereby augmenting his wickedness. Therefore, thinking that they were sincere, he received them with benignity and appointed them leaders of his wicked flock.

Then they thus began to appeal to him: Lo, the leading citizens of Jerusalem have sent us embassadors to thee, praying that thou wouldst deign to come to them, for they have heard that thou art the Son of God.

Then said Jeshu, What they have heard is true, and lo, I will do all that ye ask, but upon this condition: that all the senators of the greater and lesser Sanhedrim, and those also who have defamed my nativity, shall come forth and worship me, receiving me even as servants receive their masters.

The messengers, returning to Jerusalem, reported all that had been said. The elders and devout men answered, We will do all that he asks. Therefore the men went again to Jeshu and declared that they would do whatever he desired. Then Jeshu said, I will go with you. SCHOLASTICUS.

*There being no historical confirmation of the existence of these two brazen lions or dogs—though the Talmud contains a similar account of a sacred and magical name inscribed on a stone in the Sanctuary and guarded by two dogs—Grotius discredits the whole story. But the legal maxim, falsus in uno falsus in omnibus, is not yet accepted by theologians as applicable to ancient Scriptures. Lardner also stamps the story as a forgery of the fourteenth or fifteenth century, ignoring the existence of Raymond's version in the thirteenth century, as well as what Celsus and the Talmud say.

The Pussy Cat's House.

A FABLE. BY LILLIE DEVEREUX BLAKE.

A benevolent dog, who had grown rich through dealing in skins, resolved to build a house for pussy cats, as many of them had contributed to his wealth. Now when the pussy cats heard this they were very much pleased, and when they saw what a beautiful palace was made for them they were very happy, and said, "What'a generous dog!"

But when the house was done and the pussy cats came to look at the rules, and found that if they went to live there they could not bring their worsted balls, and they must not even purr or so much as think of sitting on a fence, and must get two respectable dogs to say that they had never run up a tree, they grew very sad. "Why," said they, "our brother Tom can go to any house he likes and stay as long as he pleases, even if he sits on a fence and sings all night long. Why are such hard rules made for us?" But the only answer they could get was, "Because you are pussy cats."

Moral.—It is better to be a naughty dog than a good pussy cat.

Spelling Reform Without New Letters.

The new spelings employd in this colum ar not fixt or authoritativ, but tentativ and suggestiv, and, in sum cases, only parshally fonetic. Thay ar on the Anglo-American bāsis, namely, the expression ov each sound in a wurd by the letterz, singly or in combination, which most frequently reprēzent that sound in the comon spelling, and in accordance with the "Few rules for new spellingz" propozed for jeneral adoption by the Spelling Reform Association, az follo: Omit a from the digraf ea when pronounst as e-short, as in hed, helth, etc. 2. Omit silent e after a short vowel, as in hav, giv, etc. 3. Write f for ph in such words as alfabet, fantom, etc. 4. When a word ends with a double letter, omit the last, as in shal, clif, eg, etc. 5. Change ed final to t where it has the sound of t, as in lasht, imprest, etc. 6. Use z for s when s has the sound of z.

Mr. Pitman, in the Phonetic Journal for April, 1878, writes: "A reformed spelling with old letters has now become a necessity. The proprietors of some newspapers desire to show their readers that phonetic spelling is not 'bad spelling,' but easy spelling on a consistent plan; but how are they to do it? They can do it only by incurring expense and trouble in procuring a supply of new phonetic letters, which in most cases would not 'line' with their own fonts, or by means of the types in their possession."

It iz this later method that iz employd in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Its guverning prinsipl, next tu its fonetic caracter, iz exprest in the leter sent tu the English Conferens on Speling Reform in May, 1877, by the Bishop of Exeter, in which he sez: "Sucses will grately depend on making the minimum of change. Ther aut tu be no new caracters, and ōnly the introducshon ov a few diacritical marks. And while it iz nesesery tu insist on the prinsipl, Every leter and digraf shal hav wun sound ōnly, it iz not nesesery tu insist on, and it wūd be unwize tu discard, the prinsipl, Every sound shal be reprezented by wun leter or digraf only."

The "miuimum ov change" iz obtaind by allowing the use ov equivalent leters, which in serten posizhonz or conecshons invariably denote serten soundz. This wil be more fūly explaned hereafter in future numberz.

"MAN'Z PLASE IN NATURE.

"Conserning man'z true plase in nature, Haeckel sez: 'Whotever part ov the body we consider, we find upon the mōst exact examinashon that man iz more nearly relāted tu the hiest apes than the later ar tu the lōest apes. It wūd therfore be hōlly lōrst and unnatūral tu regard man in the zōolojical sistem az constitūting a distinct order, and thus tu separate him from the true ape. Rāther iz the sientific zōolojist compeld, whether it iz agrēabl tu him or not, tu rank man within the order ov the true ape (Simiæ).'

"Tu whotever minūshiē ov detail the comparison iz carid, we reech in every case the same rezult. Between man and the anthropoid apes ther ar the clōsest anatomical and fiziō logical rezemblansez. In form and funcshon, ther iz the most exaat agrēment between all the corresponding bonez ov the skeleton ov eech; the same arrānjment and structure ov the muselz, nervz, and entire visera, and ov the spleen, liver, and lungz—the later bēing ov espeshal significance, for between the maner ov breething and the proses ov nūtrishon ther iz the clōsest relāshon.

"The brain, âlso, iz subject tu the same lawz ov development, and diferz ōnly with regard tu size. The minute structure of the skin, nailz, and ēven the hair, iz identical in caracter. Althō man haz lost the grater part ov hiz hairy covering, az Darwin thinks in consequence ov sexūal selecshon, yet the rūdimentary hairz upon the body correspond, in meny respects, tu thoze ov the anthropoidz. The formashon ov the beerd iz the same in both cāsez; while the fase and eerz remain bare. Anthropoidz and men becum gray-haird in ōld age. But the most remarkable sercumstance is that, upon the uper arm, the hairz ar in both cāsez directed downward, and upon the lōer arm upward; while in the case ov the hāf apes it iz diferent, and not az soft az that ov man and the anthropoidz.

"The i [eye], on account ov its delicate structure, iz pecūliarly sūtabl for comparisonz ov this kind; and we find here the grātest similarity; ēven inflamashon and green cataract occur, under the same sercumstansez, in both. See, âlso, Darwin upon this point.

"Ther iz no more striking proof that man and the anthropoid apes hav the same anatomical and fiziological nāture, and require the same food, than the similarity ov thare blud. Under the microscope the blud corpuslz ar identical in form and appearance, while those ov the carnivora ar cleerly diferent from them.

"It may now be interesting, in confermashon ov whot haz bin sed, tu refer tu the family life, and, if wun may so speek, tu the mental and moral life ov the anthropoidz. Like man, the ape providez with exceeding care for its yung, so that its parental affecshon haz becum proverbial. Connūbial fidelity iz a jeneral and wel-nōn vertue. The muther ape leedz its yung tu the wâter, and washes its fase and hands in spite ov its crying. Woondz are âlso washt out with wâter. The ape, when in distress, wil weep like a hūman bēing, and in a maner that iz sed tu be very affecting. Yung apes manifest the same tendensiz az hūman children. When domesticāted, thay ar in yooth dōsil and teechabl, and âlso, at timez, like all children, disobē lient. In ōld age thay ofen becum morose and caprishus. Mōst apes construct huts, or, at leest, roofs, az a protecshon from the wether, and sleep in a kind ov a bed.

"Wun pecūliarity iz alone comon tu them and man, and this iz the habit ov lying upon the bak in sleep. In batl thay defend themselves with thare fists and long sticks; and, under utherwize like sercumstansez, thay manifest like pashonz and emoshonz with man: az joy and soro, pain and envy, revenge and simpathy. In deth, espeshaly, the ape fase assumes a pecūliarly hūman-like and spiritūal expresion, and the suferer iz the object ov az jenūin compashon az exists in the case ov a man. It iz âlso wel nōn that apes bery thare ded, laying the body in a seclūded spot and cuvering it with leevz. Regarding the domestic life ov the ape, Darwin sez, in his 'Descent of Man' (vol. i, p. 39):

"'We see maternal affecshon manifested in the mōst trifling detailz. Thus Rengger obzerved an American monky (a Cebus) carefully driving away the fliez which plāgd her infant; and Duvancel saw a Hylobates washing the fāsez ov her yung wunz in a streem. So intence iz the greef ov fēmale munkiz for the los ov thare yung that it invāriably cauzd the deth ov serten kindz kept under confinement by Brehm in North Africa. Orfan munkiz ar âlwayz adopted, and carefūly garded by uther munkiz, both malez and fēmalez. Wun fēmale baboon had so capāshus a hart that she not ōnly adopted yung munkiz ov uther spēshiz, but stole yung dogz and cats, which she continūaly carid about with her. Her kindnes did not go so far, however, az tu share her food with her adopted offspring; at which Brehm woz surprized, az hiz munkiz divided everything quite fairly with thare ōn yung wunz. An adopted kiten scracht the abuv-menshond affecshonate baboon, hoo sertainly had a fine intelect, for she woz much astonisht at bēing scracht, and immēdiately examind the kiten'z feet, and without more ado bit off the clawz.'

"The number ov caracteristics pozest in comon by man and the hier apes iz, indeed, very grate, and includes not only fizical and emōshonal but ēven intelectūal quolitiz."—From Schlickeysen's "Fruit and Bread," translated by Dr. Holbrook.

Sicilian Brigandage.

Whatever form the sentiment generally inspired in Sicily by the brigands may assume, the ground of it is respect for force, mingled with a feeling of dread. Indeed, it sometimes happens that if a band is dispersed and its chief taken or killed, his disbanded followers are refused food and shelter even by the peasants; but none, not even a man of social position, will dare to utter a word of blame against a Capo-Brigante in power. It often happens, indeed, that you will hear persons who have every appearence of being honest and well educated speak with indulgence and sympathy of the deeds of a brigand. It forms part of brigand polity to win the support of the poorer classes by doing now and then some generous action. The legend of the brigand benefactor is handed down from generation to generation, and no Capo-Banda of any worth fails to avail himself of some occasion to give a dowry to some poor girl, or pay the debts of some peasant, or publicly to reproach one of his followers for having waylaid a poor muleteer, and to condemn him to restore the plunder. Thus is explained in part the peculiar power of the brigands, and how a Capo-Banda in the territory where he dominates is the recognized authority, and plays the part and performs the offices of a regularly-constituted government. It is, in short, no exaggeration to say that the relations of a Capo-Banda with the persons on whom he levies taxes are as regular and peaceable as those of a governmental tax-gatherer—even more so. When sending to ask the land-owners for produce or for money, he often makes known his demands in the most courteous terms, and the land-owners in equally courteous forms respond to them. Thefts, ransoms, and appropriations in the form of common crimes are far less frequent than is generally supposed. The task of the brigand at the present day reduces itself mainly to the sequestration of rich proprietors. A prisoner is usually treated with the greatest courtesy, and his table is furnished with the most dainty food. In every capture it naturally follows that the family of the poor prisoner is constrained by love or by force to furnish the sum demanded by the chief of the band. There are still extant many traditions of the Capo-Banda Cucinotta, who for several years (until 1875) domineered over a large portion of the province of Messina, a province considered one of the most tranquil and happy in the country. He exercised brigandage and smuggling to the advantage and with the connivance of citizens of every class. He smuggled on a large scale, he unloaded vessels, and found no lack of proprietors who offered him places of concealment for the goods. He and his band, moreover, had undertaken to protect certain industries, and had thus acquired such power over the population that even in private affairs they performed the part of the public authority, and exercised quite a tyranny. The Gazzetta d'Italia, in 1875, gave some interesting particulars concerning them: "They formed a well-constituted organization. They gave themselves out as men who made war against government, and they exercised in the districts where they had sway a strange and cruel despotism. Not only had they a chief, but also spies and accountants. They levied taxes on the bakers, on the wood-cutters, on the millers, on the shepherds, affording them in exchange protection against whomsoever it might be necessary. Those who were taxed for such protection made up for it in their turn by levies upon other people's property, being certain of defense in case of need. They acted the part of judges, and, under condition that nothing should be revealed to the authorities, appeased offended parties with money which they obliged the offenders to disburse under the law of retaliation. They obliged them to return stolen goods, and to repair any damage caused. They prevented marriages that did not please them, and brought about those which they approved. They acted as peace-makers between father and son, husband and wife, and betrothed lovers, and pacified them by fear. They acted as custodians, obliging proprietors to pay them a certain sum for guarding fruits, which in truth were stolen by themselves. They took women, and by force gave them in marriage to whomsoever they pleased. The number of the brigands, properly so called, compared with that of the facinorosi of every kind, is much less than is usually imagined through hearing so much said of the Brigantaggio in Sicily. Even when the most flourishing, the Capi-Bandi, are but five or six in number. But the secret of their power lies in its being inextricably combined with that of other malefactors of every kind.—The British Quarterly Review.

Continued Misrepresentation.

The journal of "Cultured Freethought," in its issue of the 13th instant, contained in its article, "The two Sides of the Shield," about its usual amount of misrepresentation, which we do not feel is quite our duty to let pass unnoticed. We deprecate contention in the Liberal ranks nearly as much, probably, as any person can. We do not think we have sought to bring contention into our ranks. But we have been so grossly misrepresented by certain parties, and so many offenses have been laid to our charge, of which we are not guilty, that self-respect, if not a duty we owe to thousands who have coöperated with us in the endeavor to defend the cause of truth and liberty against the aggressions of our Christian opponents, that we feel impelled to speak.

The cultured man who edits that high-toned sheet still persists in misstating the facts of the case. In speaking of the petition he says: "As we feared, therefore, and as we warned the Liberal public when the petition was started, the result has been to strengthen the existing law, and to give Comstock a new lease of power, notwithstanding the dangerous perversion of which this law has been proved to be capable. Every attempt to repeal that law will have the same effect, and every such attempt greatly lessens the probability of getting it modified."

There are several falsehoods in this short extract. 1. The result has not been to strengthen the existing law. It never was so weak any time since its passage as it is to-day. The attention that has been called to it by the petition has caused this. 2. A new lease of power has not been given to Comstock. His power is weaker now than it has been at any time within the last six years. The petition has helped to do this. 3. Every attempt to repeal the Comstock law will not have the effect to increase Comstock's power; but on the other hand it will have directly the opposite result. The more the attention of Congress and of the public is called to the enormities of that law, the more his power for evil will be lessened. If the effort to get the law repealed or modified has not been as successful as might be desired, it has attracted attention to the matter, and has prepared the way for more effective work on some future occasion. It would be just as false to say that the early efforts made in favor of human freedom were detrimental to the abrogation of the laws of slavery. By the same rule it is very wrong to say a word in favor of any of Mr. Abbot's "Nine Demands of Liberalism," for according to his logic to make an effort for any reform, and to fail the first year, is to "strengthen the existing law." What falsehood! 4. There is not the slightest ground for asserting that the effort for repeal has lessened the chance for future modification or for future repeal. If a man has fifty miles to walk, he certainly can never accomplish it unless he walks the first five. 5. It is false that the committee showed itself any more favorable to modifying the law than for its repeal. Comstock has no more desire for one than the other, and the Christian committee seems to be governed by his wishes and his representations. It is to be hoped that a future committee of a future Congress may take a different view from that which this committee has taken. We have succeeded in securing attention to the state of things that exists; perhaps next time it may be induced to act. We repeat that there is not the first scintilla of evidence that any portion of the Christians of Congress are any more in favor of modification than of repeal, and it is base and false for any man, whether cultured or not, to persist in such misrepresentations.

What is the status of the Comstock law of 1873, that Mr. Abbot and the Christians of the country are so indignant because seventy thousand of us have asked for its repeal or modification? 1. Was the law needed? 2. Was its passage secured in a proper manner? 3. Did any considerable portion of the American people ask for its passage? 4. Has its operation been productive of good? 5. Is it not Comstock's law, and has anybody else had any use for it? These are the replies to the interrogatories: 1. The law was not needed. The previously existing laws were quite sufficient to meet all necessities that arose. As proof of this it is only necessary to state that all the really obscene publications that were seized and destroyed—such vile books as were published by Dr. Haines, Ackerman, Dr. Gumpertz, Dr. Manches, and Jerry Farrel of this city—were seized before Comstock's law of 1873 was passed, and that that law has only been an engine of tyranny and cruel oppression that has since been used to crush hundreds of comparatively innocent people, of whom Leonard Fox & Son, Dr. E. B. Foote, Dr. S. C. Abbey, E. W. Jones, E. H. Heywood, and many others are specimens.

2. Its passage was not secured in a proper manner. It was hurried through the closing scenes of Congress in the greatest confusion and uproar by an excited and half-drunken House, when not one in ten of the members who voted for it had the slightest idea of what he was voting for, and at the time the bill for doubling salaries, back pay, and similar villainous frauds were passed. A law was never passed in these United States under more utterly disgraceful circumstances.

3. No considerable portion of the American people asked for its passage. It was enacted to give Comstock more complete power, more Christian despotism, over his unfortunate victims. It was enacted at the request, and by the influence of the Young Men's Christian Association, and that, possibly, is the very reason why the cultured Liberal editor is so much in favor of it.

4. Its operation has been productive of evil, and only of evil. It has been the American Inquisition, and under its iron rule American citizens have been unduly and cruelly persecuted, their business destroyed, and their families rendered unhappy to an extent that would disgrace Russia or Turkey. The fact that all the real obscenity was suppressed before this law was enacted, and that its power has only been productive of evil is sufficient answer to the question.

5. It was passed directly by Comstock's efforts, and nobody else has had any use for it. This is quite enough to totally condemn it. Anything that Comstock approves may be set down as bad, and if it is a law, it ought to be repealed at once.

The Liberals of America are hereby appealed to, to know if asking for the repeal of such a law as this is sufficient grounds for a cultured and pretended Liberal editor to denounce the motives and morals of the seventy thousand who so asked for repeal or modification? Can they not see in all the hue and cry that has been raised upon the subject the most contemptible captiousness and hair-splitting hypercriticism and Zoilism. Does it really become a Liberal editor to occupy such grounds? Can he be honest and consistent in persisting in such a course? There was no necessity for the law, and there is no good in it, and every who asked for its repeal did a good and noble deed, and every man who opposes the effort justly covers himself with ignominy.

What if the Supreme Court of Christian judges, upon a partial and rather weak presentation of the subject, has strained a point "for the good of the cause," and has pronounced the law constitutional, when clearly it is not so? Its decision has not a leg to stand upon, and, as J. B. Wolff says, is unworthy the respect of an honest man. It is as untrue as was a former decision by the same court in the Dred Scott case. That decision was false, and so is this; and as we have lived to see that decision set aside, so we hope to live long enough to see this unrighteous decision also set aside.

There was a time more than forty years ago when Southern politicians wished to prevent Abolition documents, which were then termed "incendary matter," from passing through the mails; but at that time such statesmen as Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Thomas Benton, Lewis Cass, Silas Wright, John Quincy Adams, and others, together with the U. S. Supreme Court, decided that the Constitution gave no such power; that that instrument gave no right for a censorship of any kind to be established over the mail matter belonging to the people. A pro-slavery man and an anti-slavery man had equal privileges in the mail. It was true then, and it is true now. An unbeliever in Christian dogmas has as much right to use the mail as the strongest believer; an immoral man, as a moral man; an uncultured man as one highly cultured; an indecent man as one so sensitive to indecency that he would faint away at a representation of the Greek Slave or Adam and Eve in the garden; and it is hardly probable that Mr. Abbot will be able to change this great fact. A censorship of the mails is totally unconstitutional, and the American people will never be in favor of it. Comstock and Abbot may join hands in supporting a censorship, but they assuredly will not have our company.

If the Constitution gives to Congress the right to prohibit the passage of mail matter on the grounds of its indecency, it also grants the right to prohibit it on the grounds of immorality in not coming up to the orthodox standard, and by teaching heterodoxy in any form. If "Cupid's Yokes" and The Word can be stopped for indecency and immorality, why not, just as logically, stop THE TRUTH SEEKER, The Investigator, and even The Index, for immorality and heterodoxy? If Congress has the right to institute a consorship on moral grounds, who can say where it shall stop? If they have the right to construe what is immoral in one case, why not in another? If it is left to the party in power to decide what decency and morality are and what they are not, who can tell that the mildly heterodox Index may not also be brought to grief? There are some good people who already condemn it on the ground of its immorality. If the Christian persecuting power is allowed to have its own way unopposed, and to decide what morals we shall adopt, we may expect one step after another will be taken until every phase of Freethought and mental liberty is crushed from the land, and nothing but orthodox morality and orthodox decency is allowed to exist in America. Will not the cultured editor then be still found with the moral party?

No, lovers of freedom and mental liberty, we must not yield the fight. We must repel every encroachment upon the rights of individuals. We must oppose every effort made by the Church, or any representatives of the Church, to decide what is moral and what is decent from a Christian standpoint. Let not the cry of cowards, that we must square our conduct by what our Christian opponents may think of us, deter us from standing upright like men and saying that our souls are our own. Let not even the cry of "indecency and obscenity" make us flinch in our duty.

Is it indeed so great a crime to ask for the repeal of a bad and useless law that we should be denounced, week after week, as being immoral, obscene, and as disgracing the Liberal cause? As free men and women, have we not the right to ask our servants in Congress for the repeal of any law that we have reason to wish to be repealed, without incurring the reprobation of the Mrs. Grundy of cultured Orthodoxy, or cultured Liberalism?

In that petition which has been so severely censured by the apostle of Liberal culture, we asked for just what he pretends to want as much as we asked for anything. We asked for "material modification" as an alternative, with repeal, while he professes to want a "radical modification." Surely the difference is so slight as not to be worth quarreling about. We accorded to Congress the option whether it should be modification or repeal. Every time that that self-righteous sheet pretends we have insisted upon a "total repeal," that we have given repeal the preference, or that we have taken sides with those who seek to corrupt, pollute, and debauch the young, he says what is most untrue, and if it utters it a thousand times it will still be a falsehood. We are as much in favor of what is really moral and decent as is his holiness, and, we think, quite as much in favor of truth, and quite as much opposed to misrepresentation, slander, and vilification.

We wish the astute editor of The Index would point out the difference which exists between "repeal or modification," and "modification or repeal." In the strict use of language do they not mean much the same? When a child asks its mother for a piece of bread and butter, or a piece of pie, would the mother be justified in persisting that the child had asked for bread and butter only, and that nothing else would satisfy it?

The Index man says we have done wrong because we asked for repeal. We begin to think we did do wrong, but in quite a different direction from what he thinks. We are inclined to think we should have asked for REPEAL first, last, and all the time, and for nothing but repeal. The law is unconstitutional, unnecessary, and tyrannical: It was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. It was framed by Anthony Comstock, was enacted for Anthony Comstock, and has been used only by Anthony Comstock, and we trust never will be used by anybody else. It has done no good, and its influence has been evil and evil only. It assuredly ought to be repealed, and that is the only remedy adapted to the case. When a wolf gets into a shepherd's flock and takes the life of two or three sheep a day, what is the shepherd's duty? Shall he try to modify the wolf, or shall he shoot him down—repeal him altogether? From this day forward we are for the repeal of the Comstock laws, Col. Ingersoll and O. B. Frothingham to the contrary notwithstanding. Let those woo respectability and Mrs. Grundy's approval who choose to, but as for us, we shall aim to cherish justice, liberty, and truth.

The Index says: "It cannot be truthfully said that they [Heywood and Bennett] have not overstepped the boundaries of decency, or that they have not thereby tempted prosecution." We declare the statement to be false. We have not overstepped the boundaries of decency, and we defy the man of great culture to point out wherein we have been indecent. As for tempting prosecution, every man who speaks against the superstitions of religion, against the fables of Christianity, and against the fictions of the Church, may be said to tempt prosecution. Even the circumspect editor of The Index has said some radical things, and to this extent he may have tempted prosecution. Would not the country weep were he to be prosecuted?

The Index man again says: "From this danger and injustice we have strenuously endeavored to shield these men to the small extent of our power." Probably we ought to be very much obliged to the truly good man for "shielding" us so extensively, but we beg of him not to do so any more. We had far rather take the pelting storm of Comstockism and orthodoxy than to be protected by such a shield. Besides, he should not be so lavish in his shielding others when his own position calls for it so loudly. He needs a shield far more then we do. We beg of him not to leave himself exposed on our account. Shield yourself, cultured man!

The editor once more says: "THE TRUTH SEEKER contained column after column of misrepresentation, and calumny, and silly anger." Miserable falsehoods. We have not misrepresented him in any instance. We have not calumniated him, and we have not been angry. We have simply been disgusted that a man who professes to be an honest, independent, high-minded Liberal should take such a cowardly, cringing, contemptible course. If he is so anxious to secure orthodox respect and orthodox recognition, why does he not go over to orthodoxy and be done with it? If his treasure is there, let his heart and his carcass be there also. In that event the Liberal cause would lose a vast amount of culture, but it is highly probable it could stand the loss without collapsing.

Recurring to the Comstock law again The Index says: "That law is based upon a correct apprehension of the requirements of public morality and the public welfare." A greater mistake could hardly be made. It is not based upon the requirements of morality, but upon the requirements of orthodox bigotry, and of the Young Men's Christian Association, and of the bigoted orthodox medical gentry. It admits at the same time that "the law is so vaguely worded as to render it possible to persecute Freethought under the pretense that it is immoral." What kind of requirements of morality are they which admit of persecution for honest Freethought utterances? Cannot the reader see the illogic of such flimsy arguments? Are such axioms of wisdom of any more value than a last year's bird's nest?

Once more from the source of culture: "The chance of success in any such attempt as this has been seriously lessened, at least for the time being, by the ill-considered petition already presented to Congress." More meanness and falsehood could hardly be crowded into three lines. Although we have not accomplished all we have wished, the petition, backed by the sound arguments of J. B. Wolff and others, has damaged the Comstock laws almost fatally. We predict that Comstock and his laws will not ride rough-shod over the country to the extent they have done. He is shorn of his strength, his power is broken, the eyes of the country are upon him, and nothing that The Index can say in favor of him or of his laws will ever reinstate him where he stood eight short months ago.

A fair sample of the truthfulness of The Index is its quotation from a Christian paper, the Newark Register about the obscene literature that was introduced into the Brooklyn schools. The whole affair is bogus. No such obscene literature has been introduced into the Brooklyn schools. Superintendent Fields denied the falsehood and virtually told Comstock to mind his own business. If obscene matter was sent to the school children, we know of nobody who would be so likely to do it as Comstock himself. He has the stock and the taste. There is probably no man who has more of either than himself.

Whenever the obscenity hunter wishes to create a sensation and to shock the feelings of the public, he utters an alarming pronunciamento about the tons of obscenity being sent to schoolgirls. The whole thing is a base lie, and those very moral papers who repeat it are entitled to a part of the odium of its circulation. Very little of any obscene matter has passed through the mail in the last five years, and whenever it is charged that it is going through the mails, tons upon tons, it is simply a mean, villainous, Christian falsehood. If such vile stuff should at any time be sent to school children through the mail, how easy to check it most effectively by having the children's mail matter inspected by a suitable person, instead of breaking down the rights of the people of the United States in the name of morality and the protection of the school-girls.

The cultured editor closes his somewhat weary article thus: "The chance of success in any such attempt as this has been seriously lessened, at least for the time being, by the ill-considered petition already presented to Congress; but when the Liberal party shall prove by its actions that it is equally alive to the interest of public morality and of individual liberty, they will certainly carry their point in the end. We hope to see some movement initiated which shall command the support of all Liberals without exception by fully and fairly recognizing both sides of the shield." Thus we have it, and thus we can see what is the matter with the man. The work that has been accomplished by the seventy thousand who signed the petition goes for nought with the cultured apostle. He was not called upon, he did not draw up the petition, and he was not even consulted in reference to it; hence it is all wrong and contrary to refined and cultured ideas. He can never sustain it, nor see in it the slightest good. But he holds out a hope for the future. When he finds time to draft a petition and to present it to the Liberals of the country in an approved and cultured style, then it will be all right, and then The Index will support it, and every Liberal, whether cultured or uncultured, will be expected to throw up his hat and shout for the Abbot petition for slight modification, but not repeal. Everything will then be lovely, and Mr. Abbot will kindly spread his shield over all the decent and moral Liberals of the country. "Oh, that will be joyful, joyful, joyful!" Then perhaps a Liberal can hold up his head in conscious pride that he is cultured and is not guilty of debauching the minds of school-girls.

The Index seems fond of printing the letters it receives from Colonel Ingersoll; but we fail to see wherein the last letter published from that distinguished source is any special credit to the writer. He seems to be at a loss whether he signed the petition or whether he did not. He sort o' thinks he did, and sort o' thinks he didn't; but if he did sign it he is quite sure he did not read it. That sounds very little like the Colonel's usual bold, clear cut, independent utterances. If the cultured editor had kindly suppressed that letter he would hardly have done the Colonel an unkindness.

Now we heartily deprecate this family quarrel. We wish The Index had had the good sense to let us alone and not vilify and malign us when we were doing the best we knew how in fighting Comstockism. Its stab in the back was most unfraternal and uncalled-for, and it has scarcely added any credit to its stock of culture by its carping, hair-splitting course. And if it will let us alone now, and not continue to accuse us of debauching the minds of the young or of fraternizing with those who are debauching them, we will certainly let it alone. It may enjoy its transcendent Culture to its heart's content, and we shall be very willing not to wilfully disturb its calm serenity.

THE CHAMPIONS OF THE CHURCH, THEIR CRIMES AND PERSECUTIONS, an octavo volume of nearly twelve hundred pages, will be ready to send to subscribers before our next issue is received by our patrons. It is a work of deep interest, and a heavy broadside into the decaying old hulk of Christianity. It is believed a more effective and damaging work against theology and Christianity has never been issued.

Those who have subscribed are requested to remit at once, that the books may be forwarded as soon as received from the binders. Delays are dangerous. It has been hinted to us that Comstock intends to take steps to have the work suppressed, or to have an injunction placed upon it. We know not how much truth there is in this rumor but we feel sure it will be quite safe for all who wish the book to order at once. Prices, in cloth, $3.00, leather and red edges, $4.00, morocco and gilt edges, $4.50.

JUST FROM THE PRESS—"Chronicles of Simon Christianus," and his manifold and wondrous adventures in the land of Cosmos. Discovered by L. N. Fidel, in conjunction with A. Hook. A very interesting little work. Price 25 cents.

The National Defense Association—a Society for the Promotion of Virtue.

Having failed in obtaining at the hands of Congress a repeal or modification of what are known as the onerous Comstock laws, enacted March 3, 1873, and realizing the peril that awaits certain classes of independent thinkers in the domains of theology, medicine, and radical literature, as well as the necessity of being prepared to meet attacks and make due defense when necessity calls, a number of the Liberals of this city have formed themselves into a society or committee for the purpose of making prompt defense whenever any of our friends in this city or elsewhere are attacked by those tyrannical and unconstitutional laws just referred to.

The following-named gentlemen have been chosen to act as officers of this society:

President, A. L. RAWSON, D.D., LL.D.,
Vice-President, JOHN P. JEWETT,
Treasurer, G. L. HENDERSON,
Secretary, E. B. FOOTE, JR., M.D.,
Executive Committee, THERON C. LELAND,
HUGH B. BROWN,
WILSON MCDONALD,
CHARLES WINTERBURN, M.D,
CHARLES A. CODMAN.

So long as such laws as those above alluded to remain upon our National and State statute books, it is absolutely necessary that we, as a class, should be in a constant state of preparation for any emergency that may arise. If we are in a due state of preparation, a defense is already half accomplished. These are sound maxims: "In time of peace prepare for war;" "In spring and summer prepare for the frosts of winter."

It is believed that by having efficient officers and an energetic executive committee we may at all times be ready for any attacks that our enemies may see fit to make upon us.

Our Christian opponents have their "Society for the Suppression of Vice," but it has proved itself to be a suppressor of innocence and good intentions, and it has become an engine for persecution and tyranny. We mean that our society shall be emphatically for the promotion of virtue, and that it shall be the antagonist of the first-named society so long as the same remains in the interest of sectarianism, bigotry, superstition, and intolerance. So long as we know we have a deadly enemy, our only prudent course is to have our weapons burnished and in readiness. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." "Who would be free themselves must strike the blow."

The work is before us, and they are cowards who basely shirk it, and cryingly seek to make a dishonorable truce with our designing foes.

There are no expenses connected with the running of this Society for the Promotion of Virtue, or, at least, will not be for the present. Money is not called for now, but those who feel like pledging such amounts as they are willing to donate in case of necessity, are requested to write to the Secretary or to the editor of this paper, stating what amount they will send to the Treasurer when needed for the defense of any unfortunate Liberal or independent thinker who may be brought under the ban of the dominant Church. Whenever money is sent let it be directed to the Treasurer. All sums received and all pledges made will be duly published in THE TRUTH SEEKER and in The Positive Thinker.

It is hoped the generosity of the friends of liberty and justice all over the country will be manifested in this connection, and that due responses will be made. The money will by no means be called for unless needed, and if it is needed it will be very convenient to know on whom to call.

It is deemed advisable that friends in various parts of the country form auxiliary societies to co-operate with the parent society so far as necessary.

It is hoped by some tuat the organization may become national, indeed, and that it may form the basis for an efficient and permanent organization for maintaining the principles of mental liberty and equal rights, as well as promoting all the real reforms of the day. We have already an organization which has obtained some notoriety, but unfortunately it is of a narrow gage, and seems illy fitted for more than one or two ideas. It is intended to run this organization on a broader gage and to be able to recognize the importance of more than one species of reform. Its cardinal motto will be "OPPOSITION TO COMSTOCKISM."

Those who feel inclined to favor this movement and like branches in the towns and cities of the country will correpond with the Secretary or the editor of this paper. Forms and blanks will be furnished as soon as printed. Charters from the parent society will be furnished upon application.

It may not be amiss to briefly give a few particulars concerning the officers of the organization:

Prof. Rawson is a well-known artist and author. He studied for the ministry, but early lost faith in the mysteries of theology. He received the title of D.D. in this country, and LL.D. in London. He is a prominent member of the Liberal Club and of the Society of Humanity.

John P. Jewett is the original publisher of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and many other popular works. He has a national reputation.

George L. Henderson is well known in the Liberal ranks as a firm and consistent Radical. He is editor-in-chief of The Positive Thinker. He is eminently safe for all the funds that may be entrusted to his care. He is a prominent member of both the Liberal Club and the Society of Humanity.

E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D., is a young man of special promise. He pursued a scientific course at Columbia College, and was graduated by the College of Physicians and Surgeons of this city. He is also an author and lecturer of considerable note.

Theron C. Leland is a conspicuous writer, lecturer, and Reformer. He is also the third oldest phonographic reporter in the United States. There is hardly a man in the country better informed upon the subjects of phonography and phonetics, as well as the various reforms agitating the public mind. The productions of his pen are very popular.

Hugh B. Brown is well known also as a lecturer and writer. He is associate-editor of The Positive Thinker and a prominent member of both the Liberal Club and the Society of Humanity.

Wilson McDonald is the noted sculptor. Several works of art from his hand grace Central Park and other places of public resort. He is a decided Liberal.

Charles Winterburn, M. D. is an eminent Physician of the Homeopathic school. His reputation for intelligence and a wide experience is not surpassed by any physician in the city. He is a decided Liberal.

C. A. Codman is an accountant, and is assistant treasurer of the Liberal Club. He has long been prominent in the Liberal and Positivistic ranks.

Thus our banner is thrown to the breeze; the names of our officers are enrolled thereon and we hope to meet friendly responses from all parts of the country.

Around the World.

We have received a very pleasant and entertaining visit from Bro. J. M. Peebles, M.D., who has lately returned from his second tour around the world, by way of Australia, Ceylon, Southern India, Madagascar, Natal, and South Africa, to England. Dr. Peebles studied the manners, customs, and laws of the so-called heathen, and the native tribes of those countries. He has seen more countries, and visited a greater number of tribes than Bayard Taylor or any other American traveler. He says that even the lowest black men of Australia, the Beddahs of Ceylon, and the Caffirs of South Africa have conceptions, crude and irrational, to be sure, of some divine existence and a future life. Belief in immortality seems to bubble up spontaneously in the lowest races. The degraded blacks of Australia have a saying like this: "He goes down a black man, up jumps a white man."

At night time they are afraid of ghosts and demons. The doctor spent some time in Ceylon, the head center of Buddhism. He pronounces many of the Buddhist priests the most metaphysical men with whom he has met. On the question of the soul's final absorption into Nirvana, he confessed that one of these Buddhist priests sorely puzzled him Orthodox clergymen can do nothing with them in arguments The Buddhist sacred books are much better authenticated than the Old and New Testaments. In an oral discussion held in Pantura, Ceylon, between a Buddhist priest and a missionary, the latter was completely defeated and demoralized. The Buddhists of this country are repairing their temples, and show much vigorous life. They have already sent two missionaries to France, and are raising the question of sending missionaries over the wide waters to evangelize the Christians. The Brahmins are more objectionable, in this traveler's estimation, because of their adherence to the "caste" system; and then the lower class Hindoos are exceedingly superstitious. They have an equal dislike for English rule and missionary influences. The doctor said that crows or rooks and missionaries are found in all climes and latitudes. The missionaries in Madras are having a fiery controversy over the translation of the New Testament into the Telegu language, the Baptists rendering the Greek word for baptising, immersion. The different Christian sects sorely puzzle these poor heathen. One class of missionaries says the bible teaches this; another, that; and then it is exceedingly difficult to convert Unitarian Mohammedans to trinitarian orthodoxy. They cannot comprehend how the son can be as old as his father.

The doctor says unhesitatingly that the so-called heathen nations are more moral, so far as drunkenness, thieving, and other misdemeanors are concerned, than are Christian nations. They are not as intellectual and scientific. If missionaries would teach them the English language, the arts and sciences, if they would transfer to those far lands the American school-house, the spade and the plow, they would do vastly more good to these people of the orient.

In Natal, and the country westward he saw the Hottentots, the Kaffirs, and the Zulus. It was these native Africans that so puzzled Bishop Colenso about the creation of man and the Book of Genesis. Though this Englishman is considered by evangelical Christians to be full of heresies, he nevertheless is a bishop in the English Church, performs the functions of his office, and draws his governmental stipend. In this country Mr. Peebles lectured upon the India famine and the subject of psychology. He pronounces Southern Africa a magnificient country, rich not only in diamonds, but in gold, silver, and other minerals.

The difficulties that the English are having with the native tribes is caused by the same Anglo-Saxon cupidity that causes our warlike troubles with the Western Indians. He met H. M. Stanley in Cape Town, South Africa, and listened to his grandiloquent description of his battles—thirty of them—in Central Africa.

Instead of opening Central Africa, he has virtually closed it to future explorers, unless accompanied by a large military force. Mr. Stanley should learn modesty and wisdom from such men as Livingstone, Lieut. Cameron, and other African explorers who preceded him.

We have great confidence in the ability and careful and extensive reseach of this great traveler, and we are glad to learn that he is preparing a very interesting account of his varied and valuable experiences.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will lecture at Elmira, N. Y., June 30.

The Dishonesty of some Clergymen.

Ever since I was emancipated from the thralldom of the Church, I came out into the glorious liberty of the sons of God. I have been peacefully convinced that in the discussion of a question of history, government, or science, bearing even remotely on the Church's claims, no sincere clergyman of any denomination who feels allegiance to his creed, can be trusted, either for his statement of facts or the honesty of his reasonings.

The English Episcopalians, and their High Church brethren in the United States, hate the Church of Rome with more bitterness than any other Protestants, although one of their most eminent bishops declared that there was only a paper wall between the two bodies They call the Catholic Church, in scriptural phraseology, the Whore of Babylon. It was the most galling thought to them that in tracing the apostolical powers of their own bishops to Christ's apostles at Jesusalem, they have to travel by the way of Rome, and through centuries of crime and moral filth, when the clergy of all orders, from pope down to priest, were the biggest rascals in the world. In other words, they are compelled to acknowledge that if the Church of Rome is the Whore of Babylon, the Church of England was the first-born of the womb of this prostitute—Henry VIII., the original founder of the English Church, having broken his allegiance to Rome merely because the pope would not consent to his divorce from Queen Catherine.

And if the English Church is the daughter of a prostitute, what origin, except one of bastardly, has her daughter, the Episcopal Church of the United States? To avoid the shame of such a parentage what an expedient do the American priesthood devise? Why, with as much skill in cookery as Joseph Cook exhibits, in defiance of history, they cook up the theory that their bishops derive their title, authority, and succession, not from Rome, but from some bishop who had conveniently emigrated, as if for the purpose, from Jerusalem to England in one of the early centuries of the Christian Era, and who, with his successors, in office, had seemingly been living in entire ignorance of what had been going on in the Christian Church for five hundred years! When Judge Black, in the Vanderbilt will-contesting case, in trying to prove the testator too insane to make a will, remarked, as a proof of mental weakness, that a man would believe a foolish proposition, as, for instance, the doctrine of apostolic succession. Mr. Surrogate Calvin, lawyer as he was, and acquainted with the laws of evidence, spoke up and said: "I believe in that doctrine." No doubt also he believes in the luminous—lucus a non lucendo—definition of the Trinity given in the Athanasian Creed.

We have a glaring instance of the utter untrustworthiness of a clergyman's opinions in discussions and questions of government in the case of the Rev. Dr. Woolsey of New Haven, who has just given the world a treatise on Political Science, in which the landmark from and to which all his bearings in the discussion tend is the vile, effete, medieval system of theology introduced into this country in colonial times by emigrants from king-ridden and priest-ridden Europe. Under the old hallucination, the government is an ordinance of God, miraculously established, instead of a human institution; and the civil magistrate, whoever he may be, the minister of God, instead of the representative of the people; and that the object of government is "the perfection of human nature," he openly expresses the opinion that government in aiming at this purpose, may not only "protect" religion, but "may also support an established church."

Hugh Miller, the eminent Scotch Geologist, who was an elder in the Presbyterian Church, undertook to make the rocks composing the crust of the earth double up, or undouble in conformity to the teachings of the Westminster Confession of Faith. And when he found that Geology stood out and refused to be whipped into the service of a creed which numbers 5,133 distinct phases of theological faith, he fretted himself into a suicidal death.

Another Scotchman, now at the head of Princeton College—the Rev. Dr. McCosh—has no idea of following the latter part of Hugh Miller's example, but more cannily concludes that if the mountain will not come to Mohammed, Mohammed will go to the mountain. With that sang froid peculiar to and strikingly illustrative of the character of the clergy as a class, after battling the doctrine of Evolution for years as Infidel in its tendency, he, seeing that scientists generally, in Europe and America, accept it, is trying to make himself and others believe that it is consistent with the Bible, in the same way that his countryman Hugh Miller made the six days' work of creation in Genesis to be demiurgic days, millions of years in length, while he limited the seventh day—the Sabbath—to twenty-four hours of common time. Now all this is very ingenious, but very dishonest.

I took up my pen, however, to say that I lately examined again the interesting and instructive volume of Archdeacon Trench "On the Study of Words," and when I came towards the end of the book, noticed that what he says of the word absolution furnishes another instance and proof of what I said above, that no priest or clergyman can be trusted in any matter affecting his Church or Bible. Dr. Trench is a minister of the Church of England, an able scholar, and a truly pious and good man. He knows that in the Ordination service as contained in the Prayer Book, the bishop, in giving Holy Orders to a Priest, acts as a successor of the apostles. He confers upon the kneeling candidate for the priesthood, by his authoritative voice, the sovereign power to forgive or retain sins. In human governments, as for instance that of the United States, one of the highest, if not the highest acts of sovereignty is to pardon a criminal under sentence of death. The crime of a murderer, as stated in the bill of indictment, is against the people, and in an act of pardon the executive, as the representative of the people, exercises sovereign authority. The assumption of such an authority in the moral government of the world by a priest or clergyman is so clear an invasion of the prerogative of the Almighty that common people cannot believe that a human being can be guilty of it. To me it looks like treason. But while it makes one's hair stand on end at the boldness of the act, it is nevertheless true that when the bishop ordains a man he gives him as a priest this apostolic grace and power to forgive or retain sins as he sees fit. Not only so, but he declares that all other clergymen, not receiving this grace from apostolic hands, they and their flocks, are given over to the "uncovenanted mercies of God," which is only a polite and condescending way of saying they are doomed to eternal hell-fire. This business of forgiving other people's sins is called in the formularies of the Church, absolution. The priest says, "I absolve thee." That is to say, that, whereas the sinner was before bound fast to his sins which were sinking him into perdition, now the priest "absolves"—loosens him authoritatively and officially from them, and he becomes as holy as Adam was in the Garden of Eden, and fit for death and judgment.

The Apostle Peter said to the lame man, "In the name of Jesus of Nazareth, rise up and walk." But the priest, popish or Protestant, of our day declares, "I absolve thee; I have the keys of the kingdom of heaven in my hands, and have the power in myself, communicated to me by the laying on of the hands of the bishop, who got it immediately from Christ, to open or shut the doors of heaven to all comers." The priest on earth puts Almighty God in heaven under binding obligations to confirm and ratify what he does; for the divine commission he holds runs thus: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost! Whose sins ye forgive they are forgiven, and whose sins ye retain they are retained; for whatever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." The power evidently is absolute, and the exercise of it is purely discretionary with the priest who holds it.

Hence, as cited by Lord Amberley, in M. Lamartine's poem entitled "Joclyn," when a bishop, during the French Revolution, was condemned to death, he sent for a young deacon—an aspirant for the priest's office—who was living in concealment in the Alps with a maiden who loved him deeply, and whom, since the irrevocable vows of priestly celibacy were not yet taken, he intended to marry. Regardless of the young man's pleading, the bishop, under the threat of his dying anathema, forced the unhappy youth to receive priestly orders at his hands, solely that he might then listen to the bishop's confession, and forgive his sins. Marriage, of course, thus rendered impossible by the vow he had taken, two lives were consigned to enduring misery that a bishop might die in peace!

It is worth while to remember that this "power of the keys" was not relinquished by the Protestants at the time of the Reformation, with the rest of the popish mummeries. Not only the Church of England, and her daughter, the Episcopal Church of the United States, but the Presbyterian Church, in all its manifold denominations everywhere, followed the example of "the mother of us all." The Church of Scotland, in abolishing the order of Prelatical Bishops, transferred the power of the Keys to the pastors of the churches as agents of the Presbytery. This I suppose is the case also with the Baptist and Methodist churches, which came into existence during the last century, and with the Congregational churches of New England, whose conferences and associations exercise a jurisdiction similar to that of the Presbytery. It is interesting to see how the clergy everywhere hang on to their privileges as embassadors of Jesus Christ, with power to bind and loose, and it is mournful to see how generally the laity, like Surrogate Calvin, concede the claims. There are Protestants who tremble at the anathemas of their priests as much as King Henry did at the fulminations of Thomas à Becket.

But the point I wish to call attention to in this communition is, that in reading Dr. Trench's account of the etymology of the word absolution, which is purely an ecclesiastical term in its origin and use, a plain man would be led to suppose that it means God's loosening men from the bonds of sin, whereas he well knows, from the office of the Visitation of the Sick, in the Prayer Book and elsewhere, that the priest says to the candidate for absolution, "By the authority committed to me, I absolve thee from all thy sins, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Amen." It is an old law maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, and this gives the instrument, called a power of attorney, its legal force. The agent has not only the power of his employer to act in the specified case, but the discretion to use it or not, as he deems best. The analogy is complete between such an agent so interested and a priest or minister of the gospel who has received in ordination the commission and grace of priesthood. Standing up before the audience, he says, "I absolve thee from all thy sins." Yet so good a man as Dr. Trench, when he knows that this was the meaning of the word, and the doctrine of his Church, conscious, as he seemingly was, of the stupendous influence and arrogance of the assumption, eases it off and makes the false impression on the minds of his English readers that the term absolution meant God's absolving instead of the priest's.

It is not diverging much from the line of thought to call attention to an important question that now arises. As the absolution pronounced is based upon the simple confession of the sinner, if the sinner has played the hypocrite, and merely confesses with the lips what he does not feel in his heart; or if he is self-ignorant and self-deceived as to what constitutes true repentance and true confession, and is still, like Simon Magus, in the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity, what is his spiritual status? The priest has unequivocally and unconditionally pronounced his absolution, and the act is ratified and recorded in heaven. He is entirely freed from all culpability, and is absolutely holy. Yet in point of fact he is the same old sinner that he was before, either self-deceived or a hypocrite, palming himself off to his credulous priest as a penitent only for some sinister purpose. His real character forbids his going to heaven, since he is under the curse of a broken law; while the absolution of the priest, confirmed in heaven, prevents his going to hell. Like Mohammed's coffin, he seems to be midway between the heavens and the earth. Would some bishop be good enough to define his status? It looks as if he were neither saved nor unsaved.

SENEX.

B. F. Underwood on the Petition.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL., June 9, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: A friend whom I esteem requests me to "state my position in THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to the law against obscenity, the action of Comstock, etc.," the reason of this request being that he thinks I am "misunderstood by some parties."

If I am "misunderstood" on this subject the fault is not mine; for my position has been stated frankly, and, I believe, clearly. Possibly "some parties" have "misunderstood" me because I have not descended to personalities such as have characterized several articles that have been published on the subject. There is a certain class of minds that seem to think a writer, to give emphasis to his views, should question the motives and assail the character of those who cannot see a subject in the same light in which he views it. I have no wish to please such persons. Their "Liberalism" is of a kind not to my taste.

But since my good friend thinks it would be well for me again to define my position on the matter referred to, I cheerfully do so, although at this time, when after more than eight months in the lecture field, speaking almost every night, I am obliged to defer all writing and other work not absolutely necessary, in order that I may meet existing engagements. I am disinclined to engage in any controversy on the subject.

In my opinion, (1.) there should be laws against the circulation of that kind of literature known as obscene, and concerning the character and influence of which there is no dispute among decent people, be they Christians or Infidels.

(2.) Congress has the same right to prohibit by law the circulation of filthy books and indecent pictures through the mails that it has to prohibit the transmission of all other articles which postmasters are forbidden to put into or send through the mail.

(3.) The law which of late has been a subject of discussion between THE TRUTH SEEKER and The Index has some good features and some bad ones; and it ought to be so modified that under it none but venders in obscene literature can be punished. This was clearly stated in a resolution which was submitted by me and adopted at the last session of the Congress of the National Liberal League held in Philadelphia, July, 1876. In some of its features the present law against obscenity, etc., is simply ridiculous, and indicates a lack not only of statesmanship but of common sense in those who framed and passed the law.

(4) Comstock's office is wholly unnecessary and should be abolished; and the performance of all duties and the enforcement of all laws and regulations pertaining to the circulation of books and articles through the U. S. mails should be entrusted to postmasters, and mail agents.

(5.) While there is reason to believe that Comstock has done some good, he has been the cause of arrests for which there was no good reason, and of suffering, in several cases, wholly unmerited. His course shows him to be, as far as I can judge from what I have heard and read, an unscrupulous, mercenary, heartless man. Some of the methods he has employed are of a character that no honorable man can approve.

I will add that I regret exceedingly the bitter personal controversy between The Index and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Have not Liberals sufficient breadth and catholicity of thought and liberality of spirit to drop personalities, subordinate their differences on unimportant points, and unite on a plan and programme to which they can all agree.

Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

REMARKS.—Mr. Underwood agrees with us in part, and differs from us in part. We agree that laws should be passed against obscene books and pictures, but we don't quite agree as to the proper means by which this should be done. Like other crimes and misdemeanors, this properly comes under the jurisdiction of the States. The United States has nothing to do with the morals or opinions of the citizens of the States. The Constitution imparts no such power.

If Congress has the right to prohibit letters and other mail matter because it is decided to be indecent, immoral, or obscene, it has an equal right to prohibit the same if it be skeptical, heretical, and infidelic. If one is Constitutional, so is the other. If the lines are to be drawn, who shall say that Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, and all Radicals who do not acknowledge the main points in orthodox theology shall not be legally tabooed? If Congress has the power to say this and that kind of literature shall not go through the mails, why not also that and the other?

Nobody thinks there is no good in the Comstock laws of 1873. There is scarcely any law but what contains some good; but that is no reason why it is not proper to repeal certain laws. The Comstock laws contain far more of the bad than the good; and they have not been as productive of good as many suppose. Nearly all the obscene literature that has been seized was taken before the passage of those laws. Most of the cases that have been prosecuted under those laws have been miserable instances of officious tyranny and orthodox bigotry which had far better been omitted. It makes us almost doubt the soundness of Liberals to hear them advocate those laws or praise the good they have done. Those laws have been an absolute curse to the country, and there was not the slightest need for their passage.

We agree with Mr. Underwood as to Comstock's office, the manner in which he arrests and convicts his victims, and also as to his real character. We also regret with him the quarrel that has arisen between The Index and ourselves. But we are sure we did not begin it. When The Index charged us with "indecency," "forgery," and a "great wrong," and a "great blunder," in asking that bad laws be repealed or modified, it was only natural that we should defend ourselves. Had The Index been fraternal, reasonable, just, and truthful, we should not have raised our voice against it. It is the man who begins a quarrel that is responsible for it. We did not begin it.—[Ed. T. S].

Mr. Wolff on the Petition.

Editor of The Truth Seeker: On the strength of his consent to address one of the committees, the name of Col. Ingersoll, with those of the local committee, were signed to a petition to the Senate in order to bring it before that body simultaneously with the House. So far as we know, he did not sign the regular petition, and we don't care whether he did or not, as his name is no better than that of other people, less prominent, and less squeamish about their reputation with people who "do evil that good may come." The committee gave him no instructions, and he was at liberty to adopt either alternative—amendment, or repeal.

I asked the committee to amend or repeal; but in my own right I demanded the repeal of all laws assuming that Congress has the right, in any way or degree, to deal with moral questions, except those named in the Constitution, piracy, treason (purely political), crimes committed without the jurisdiction of any State, and counterfeiting, the latter of which should be relegated to the States, as a matter of public economy. As I am now revising my argument for publication, it is needless to discuss the question. But I may take this occasion to say that there is little hope of favorable action without a vigorous effort. These gentlemen are too busy with personal and political matters to attend to their sworn duties. They have no time to look after personal rights or Constitutional invasions. The most of them are afraid of clerical influences, which now dominate legislation and administration to an extent which will astonish even Christians when they see all the facts massed. Many of them are churchmen, or have been educated under the shadow of church institutions, and their sympathies, prejudices, and personal interests are on the other side, so that it takes only a little of "Comstock" to justify them in neglecting to look into this matter so as to be able to act intelligently.

Something more is necessary than sending in monster petitions. The whole case must be clearly and forcibly presented, and they must be induced to examine it thoroughly. Among Liberals there should be no dissensions; and no white feathers. The man who flinches now is a coward. I have no use for men who dodge and shirk in the great battle for principle and right. They may seem heroes and martyrs, but they lack the "stuff" of which martyrs are made. Nor have I any use for the legal mind that fails to see that all such laws are invasions of the Constitution, and violate those fundamental principles without which government and society cannot exist. For the Supreme Court—appointed usually as partisans, which has decided the law constitutional—I have less respect than for the hod-carrier or cartman who performs his duties faithfully. I want it understood that I am opposed to all legislation by Congress on moral questions. That august body is not a moral institution, and not qualified to judge of moral questions. They belong to the States, and not to the United States. Whether I favor "obscenity," etc., or not, is not to be considered. These are the questions:

1. Is the law Constitutional? 2. Is the method of the law the best? 3. Are the agents and methods of the agents the best? All personal and moral questions are secondary to these; and until these are settled all side issues are out of order. For the truth and the right always,

920 F. St., Washington, D. C. John B. Wolff.

The Slavery of Ignorance.

Besides the arbitary laws that enable the few to absord a large per cent of the labor of the many, mankind are oppressed with many burdens that are the result of ignorance. Even the vices, or at least the most of them, are the result of ignorance. Even gambling, the use of coffee, opium, rum, tobacco, eating hearty suppers, condiments, etc., are the result of ignorance of the self-harm they engender and the slavery to a habit once formed. Education in the proper direction is the remedy. Ignorance of law, medicine, mechanism, and trade, creates a larger number of "middlemen" or non-producers than would exist, if every man studied those things as far as he was able. The money spent for rum, tobacco, coffee, and superstition, would go far towards making every one proficient in these essentials.

Ignorance in agriculture causes much waste of labor. It is the most practical and least understood of any profession. It is thought the simplest, where, in fact, it is the most intricate and profound of all professions. What to plant, how to plant and cultivate, the adaptation of soils, climates, and foods, the elements of the soil, of manures, of products, how and when to apply fertilizers, etc., are all subjects little understood. The South raising cotton for its fiber, the North flax for its seed, is poor American economy. The South depending upon corn so much for stock food is irrational. Wearing out land as fast as you can make one crop after another, as is the usual practice on fresh soils, is poor economy. Those distant from market raising raw produce for sale and those nearer market raising stock, reverses the natural order of rural industry.

Last and not least, the slavery of superstition wastes much of the time and means of the sons and daughters of toil. The loss, at least of two months in the year (Sundays), the spending of hundreds of millions annually to support sixty thousand non-producing parsons and chaplains, and to build churches, parsonages, etc., is paying very dear for the good their is in Christianity. If the time and money wasted on the creeds and false morality of Christianity were devoted to the spread of true morality and education in spelling, reading, writing, grammar, geography, the languages, mathematics, philosophy, chemistry, and the arts and sciences generally, oh! what a glorious reform it would be. It would give every man and woman in the United States an education that would fit them, if naturally capacitated, to adorn any position in the Government.

Keep reform a moving,
By your reason stand,
Ignorance ever reproving,
Till its driven from the land. Amen!

My Purification.

Intellectual Center of the Universe.

I am purified, likewise cultured. My culture is of long standing, my purification is more recent. I was born without the aid of father and mother—fathers and mothers are so horribly vulgar—and educated for the ministry. But in the college were men who used to pray loud and talk about the blood of the Lamb. I couldn't stand that, you know, and I left theology and went into the society of Boston where culture abounds. They used to shock me sometimes by talking about the women's voting, and once I fainted on hearing a lady speak of the relations of the sexes. But I am now purified as well as cultured, and I will tell you how the ol— how it wo—, no I will relate the circumstances and describe the subsequent transactions into which I was led by having the grace of purity in my heart.

Those who have never been purified or cultured, that is, Boston culture, little know the overwhelming immaculateness which takes possession of the soul filled with the grace of culture. One immediately soars above the coarse clay of his fellow-creatures and dines only with angels on the nectar-like essence of rectified dew. The ordinary fare of common mortals is like asking fairies to eat cold cab—, no, I cannot even write it; it's so horribly vulgar. But about my purification. I must tell you so you can get some grace too.

I dropped into our club the other night. Our club is composed of gentlemen who are all cultured. The president is editor of the Index Expurgatorius, and is the most cultured and pure man living. Most of our members would only faint on reading something about the se— relations, but he faints promptly on hearing the word "obscene."

At seven different times have I known him to fall upon the ground when he has heard some unpurified wretch say "obscene literature." He would die if anybody should tell him that he was born like ordinary persons. He was born with his clothes on, and was educated for the ministry, too. As I said, I went to the club, and seating myself by the table took up the Index Expurgatorius, the only sheet cultured enough to be allowed in our club (of course our library is limited, but then it is select). I read the editorial on the purification of Liberalism, and a change came over me. I thrilled and glowed all over. I was fanned by the wings of the pure, and I felt the soft down brush against my cheek as the purified hosts of heaven encircled me in their cultured arms. I was wild. I could no longer tread the earth—the coarse earth on which walked anybody who chose. I wanted to fly but I couldn't. It needed another editorial to give me wings—only one more, and I should have been an angel. But I must do something. I felt that my mission had been miraculously unfolded to me. It was the purifying the earth and disseminating culture. I could do that, and I would. But how shall I commence? I rushed to the street and seized a man by the arm.

"Are you purified?" I gasped, my heart bounding wildly.

He looked up in my face with a pitying expression in his grey eye. "You d——d lunatic!" he said, and lifting me in his arms dropped me gently into the gutter.

My delicately nurtured body could not stand the contact with such coarse clay. I felt that my missionary work could not be carried on among such people without assistance. What should I do? "Ah! I have it!" I exclaimed, and fell down in a transport of joy.

I had a friend. Before I was purified I regarded him as a good man. He never stole; he never murdered; he never got drunk; he never signed a minister's name to a document the minister told him not to. But now I was purified, I discovered a fault. He had not the grace of culture. He swore! Horrible! horrible! horrible! I had heard him on one occasion say "G—— d—— it all to h——!" But I am purified—I cannot write it. It lacks culture, and I cannot write anything uncultured. He must be purified, and I must do it. Faith without works is of no account. I set to work to cleanse him. I would purify him or kill him in the attempt.

But how should I do it? Should I go to him and say he needed purification and culture? No; that would not do. He would tell me it was none of my d—— (I cannot write it) business what he needed. I hit upon another plan. "I will devise a device against you," said the Lord. I would imitate the Lord." I would devise a device. I turned to the manifold twistings and circuitous columns of the cultured and purified Index Expurgatorius, and perused them anxiously carefully, and with an eye of faith. I saw how Brother C. did. I was elated. I would do the same. Even if I used another man's name, it was in a good cause. I must purify my friend. I read the clergy's encomiums of Anthony, and I decided. I looked around for a law that would reach my friend. If I couldn't find one I would have one made, with the aid of Abbot, Comstock, and the Y. M. C. A. But I found one. It is on the statute books of the District of Columbia. If any one shall blaspheme he shall be bored through the tongue; if he swears twice he shall be branded; if three times, he shall be killed, and the editor of a purified paper cannot preach his funeral sermon. Neither can the clergy. I shouted in glee, O splendid law! O purified and cultured law-makers! I had him. I would purify him. I would visit his heart with the grace of culture which passeth understanding.

I went to W. I wrote to him. I told him if he would come he would hear of something to his advantage. I did not tell him he would be purified. He didn't care for purification. I didn't sign my name either. I borrowed a congressman's, a friend of Comstock's. He came. I had an interview. I told him I had called him for his good. He must be purified. Glorious ecstacy! he swore. Not once, but thrice, yea, three several times did he swear. I had him. I disclosed my vocation—the Great Purifier of Liberalism and Agent of the Society for the Dissemination of Culture. I arrested him, took him before a magistrate. He swore that he swore, but that he did it because I had lied to him—humbugged him—inveigled him into it. I made my charge and pointed to the law. My victim argued that it was unconstitutional; that it wasn't in accordance with the great fundamental principles of our charter of liberty. He said that the law was obtained in a surreptitious and fraudulent manner; that it was used by an unprincipled villain (Great Heavens! could he have meant me?) to curtail the rights of American citizens; that it was designed to make everybody measure their conversation by the standard erected by a purified ass who couldn't see the difference between the right of freedom of speech and the liberty to debauch everybody in the universe (Hell and furies—Oh! I forgot myself—could he have meant my friend, the editor of the Index Expurgatorius?), and he wound up by swearing that as long as he lived under the Stars and Stripes he should swear and deny the existence of a god as much as he pleased, and that he would see me damned before I should dictate to him what he would say.

I never was so shocked in my life. In fact, before he got through I fainted six times, and nearly the seventh, but just as I was going off he finished, and I rallied sufficiently to tell my story. I didn't tell the judge how I had lied to him, decoyed him to Washington, and induced him to swear. No; I just proved, on my own unsupported testimony, that he had sworn in a most shocking manner. That was sufficient. The learned and purified magistrate was satisfied. Of course he was! Wasn't I the Agent of the Society for the Dissemination of Culture? Wasn't my word better than that of a man who swore? What if I did lie and act the spy, wasn't the president of our society cultured, and didn't that make up for my deficiencies? To be sure, he had been known to swear himself, and had even issued circulars in which he swore, but then he was cultured, and that made the difference.

"He has blasphemed; he shall be bored through the tongue," pronounced the judge.

"Nay, but he has sworn more than once," said I, determined that my friend should be thoroughly purified.

"Then shall he also be branded," said the judge; "for thus saith the law."

"But he has taken the name of the Lord on his unpurified tongue three several times," said I, for I saw that my friend would not be purified by boring and branding.

"Then shall he die; for so it is written," said the judge.

"O beautiful law!" I shouted. "O wise and virtuous judge! Thy mind is purified and thy heart is filled with the grace of culture. Blessed is the name of the editor of the Index Expurgatorius! Let us pray." And the judge and I knelt down and prayed long and fervently for the graceless profaner of Liberalism, that he might see the beauty and constitutionality of the law which enabled us to kill him because he was not purified. But oh, remarkable event, the thankless man was not a bit grateful for being purified. He swore roundly about the cruelty of the judge and the meanness of myself, as though we had not done all in our power for his good and our glory. Protestations fierce and bitter did he hurl from his lips. Oaths round, full, and so shockingly uncultured and unpurified, that I closed my ears, and turned hastily away, weeping for the coldness and hardness of heart of the man I had tried to purify. The executioners led him away, and I returned sadly to my office, bewailing the lack of culture which pervades the world.

Some would have the law repealed or materially modified so I could not kill men for swearing, but such people are profaners and advocates of profanity, and do not feel the purifying grace of culture. If they should succeed, blasphemy would stalk through the land, corrupting the morals of the rising generation, as has been so ably pointed out by the Index Expurgatorius. Yes, the law must stand, or we should have wicked people peddling profanity everywhere. Any one who cannot see the beauty of this law is a horse-thief, and any one who would sign a petition for its repeal is a vile, vulgar, swearing, blaspheming, impious coadjutor of a vampire, and should not be allowed to pollute by his presence the nostrils of a purified society. My advice to everybody is to go and do likewise.

Yours, Custus Morum.

Letters from Friends.

ROCKLAND, WASHINGTON Co., O., June 2, 1878.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: Prof. Draper's works, which you sent me some time ago, are the most fascinating historical books I have ever seen. Nothing dry about them. I would not part with them for twice the price I paid for them. They are the ones I take the most pride in. No Liberal should be without them, for therein is a perfect mine of facts. Yours for Freethought and the truth,

GEO. WOLCOTT.

PAINSVILLE, LAKE Co., OHIO, June 10, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: My daughter takes your paper, and in your paper there are many letters on the money question, yet I have an impression that there is no real question at issue. The Constitution of the United States says, "That no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender in payment of debts. Paper promises are only representatives of money, and until the Constitution is altered by a majority of States, all such paper purporting to be legal tenders should be made unlawful as legal tenders by State authority." Yours truly,

FRANKLIN PAINE, SR.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., June 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A short time ago I picked up one of your papers, and, seeing that it was an Infidel paper, was about to cast it aside; but noticing an article headed "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," concluded to read that one piece, after which, as a natural consequence, I read the whole paper through, and found enough in it (by referring to the Bible references) to satisfy my mind that the Bible is a myth. The only thing that surprises me is to think that I never have read an Infidel paper or book until I read THE TRUTH SEEKER a few days ago, and am now reading Paine's works. Will say that I have been a member of the M. E Church since I was seventeen (for the past seven years), which is the probable cause. Yours truly, T. H. LEWIS.

PORT HOPE, ONT., June 10, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Your TRUTH SEEKER is enlightening me, or rather creating a rebellious feeling toward Christianity. I did not know until lately that there was such a paper published. Trust that those tracts will throw more light on Christianity. Yours truly,

JAMES H. SHANNON.

DES MOINES, IOWA, June 12, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: It has been about two years since I first had the courage to examine both sides of Christianity. Since that time I have been grasping in every direction for truth, and am glad to inform you that I have had nothing to assist me out of more difficulties and clear up more doubts in my mind than THE TRUTH SEEKER. You can depend on me as a regular subscriber for your paper, because I believe it to be a great reservoir of truth and knowledge. Inclosed find one dollar, for which please send me photos of the following-named persons: D. M. Bennett, Thomas Paine, Voltaire, Rousseau, Humboldt, George F. Train, Underwood, Ingersoll, Darwin, Susan B. Anthony, and P. Cooper, And oblige, S. H. HELWIG.

MADISON, LAKE Co., OHIO, June 10, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I have seated myself to write a few lines to you to let you know my hard fortune. My wife is dead—the second one that I have lost. She was nearly seventy-two years old. Both were as good women as I could wish were I young again. I am now alone. I have nothing to live for, neither do I wish to live; still I don't know but I am as well off as ever I was. I have no Jesus to comfort me. I don't want one. I don't think there is nor ever was any. If it had not been to let you know something about Seth. W. Payne, you would not have heard from me. I thought of writing what he has sent me with regard to your character, but I will send the paper to you. It is scandalous. If he can be beat, in lying he cannot, I am sure. I often have felt sorry there was no hell for such men. It seems that Abbot is trying to pull you down. What is the matter? It strikes me if you could make a pull all together, you would rend the walls of old Zion so that the breach could never be repaired. Well, go ahead; give no quarter to such men. As long as I can pay for the paper I shall take it. I should like to see you very much, but can't come there. Shall be seventy-six next September. Now I will close, wishing a long life and a pleasant one.

Yours truly, LEE NORTON.

VESTA, NEB., May 26, 1878

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find fifty cents' worth of postage stamps. That is all I can raise just at present. I mean to do better soon. I am more and more pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER every week. It is certainly smashing many of the household gods of superstition and ignorance. "Simon," thou art a magnificent fellow; almost equal to thy ancient namesake, whose surname was Magus. I languish to know what wonderful thing thou sawest next in the mysterious and teeming land of Cosmos. Thy fond prophetic soul hath plucked the subtle wreath of allegoric fame from off the clammy brow of the itinerant tinker. Bennett, go on! Success lies just beyond. Every true man and woman is really with thee, not in word or name, perhaps, but in deed. The world is moving. The scientific columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER are perfectly impregnable, and worth five times the cost of the whole.

Yours in haste, JASPER STONE.

DEWITT, IOWA, June 9, 1878.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: Some time last fall Dr. Munson received from you a petition for signatures just as he was on the point of starting for Texas, to be gone some two months. He handed it to me and with the assistance of some friends fifty or sixty names were procured, with very limited opportunities, as it rained nearly all the time, until it had to be returned. And as the motives of the signers are brought in question, I will state that the parties signing the petition were men of age and experience, well read, and knew just what they were doing, and are at all times prepared to give an intelligent reason for what they are about to do. I have no obscene literature about my place, and never have had except perhaps a few copies of a book that Hilkiah the priest found that is supposed to have been written by some old carpet-bag Jews (2 Chronicles, xxxiv. 15). We are all of us intensely American, holding in veneration the early fathers and the institutions they established, not the least of which is our postal facilities, and are quite determined to use every effort in our power to prevent any black-hearted villain putting his hand upon our mail matter. As to the influence that surrounds our children we will take care of that. Please give through THE TRUTH SEEKER the names of parties voting on the question, and how they vote, as it may effect men in high places. Yours respectfully, I. L. WILCOX.

CHEYENNE, WYOMING, June 7, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed you will find $2.50 for "The Useful Companion." I was pleased to read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 1, that the "Champions of the Church" will be out about the 20th inst. I shall hail its arrival with pleasure. Your TRUTH SEEKER is becoming more and more interesting to me. I feel as though I cannot do without it now, and hope that you may live to a good old age to publish it. Prof. Denton is delivering us a course of illustrated scientific lectures on Geology. I should think that those Christian people who I see attending the lectures regularly would have a very poor opinion of that part of the Bible where it speaks of the creation of our planet out of nothing in six days, after he gets through with his lectures. Yours very truly, THOS. CREIGHTON.

NEWBURG, MINN., June 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I subscribed for your paper six months ago, and like it better than any other of the kind. I wish it good success in the future, and hope that I may be able to send you in a number of subscribers besides myself. Since my old subscription will expire July 1, next, I will therefore herewith inclose two dollars to renew my subscription until Jan. 1, 1879, and for the remaining fifty cents you will please send me as many sample copies of TRUTH SEEKER and tracts as you possibly can. I want them to circulate among my religious and pious friends who seem to think that without Bible reading and praying to an unknown God or gods, it is impossible to be a good and honest citizen. There are two different religious sects in this place, viz., Lutheran and Methodist. The latter were having a great two weeks' revival here last winter when they thought they would grasp all and everybody, but unfortunately it failed. When the Hon. preacher had called and begged to the Almighty to revive the sinners and save them from hell and damnation for twelve successive evenings, there were two young ladies who joined. I should think they were about twelve and thirteen years of age. Pretty slim work. He (the preacher) found that many of the young men were better posted on that subject than he was himself. Please know me as one of the Liberal class. I am respectfully yours, E. O. MOLSTERTEIG.

LEBANON, MO., June 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER since my sojourn in this city, which has been about six months, and to say I have been both pleased and edified by the perusal of its contents would but faintly express my appreciation of it. And I guess I have made it do some good work in opening the eyes of some thinkers' minds here. When I first came into this city I was assailed by self-constituted, righteous priests, who were anxious to know to what church I belonged, whether or not I took an interest in the blood of Jesus Christ, and what I thought of him crucified, etc., etc. But I informed them I belonged to the church of the world, and I looked upon all men and women as brothers and sisters; that I took no stock in the blood of a murdered God; that, if saved at all, I calculated to be saved by my own merits; and I looked upon all who claimed a share in the foul murder of Jesus Christ and expected to reap any benefit from it, as particeps criminis, and as the old adage has it, "The partaker is as bad as the thief," and instead of its securing to them happiness and salvation, it ought to sink them into misery and damnation. And I gave them a problem to solve by the rule of three, now called proportion, viz: "If the eating of a good apple brought all misery, and pain, and woe upon us, what ought the killing of God to bring?" Then some of the extra pious denounced me as a damnable Infidel, and cautioned their followers to shun me for fear I might tangle them in their talk. But this only created a desire in their minds to hear for themselves what the old Infidel said that was so horribly blasphemous and dangerous. So they improved every opportunity to talk with me on the all-important subject of death, judgment, religion, and common sense, and I would lend them THE TRUTH SEEKER, and not a few after reading acknowledged it had given them great light on the subject of divinity and a reasonable, common sense religion.

The letters of old Luce on the theory of making all things from nothing, opened a grand fount for their reasoning and contemplation. "For," said they, "we don't suppose the description is scientifically true. Yet, it shows up the foolishness of the old fabled account of creation as given in the Bible; and Woodruff's talk with the Evangelist is an eye-opener. "The Darwins," by Mrs. Slenker, is a feast to their minds, and the "High-Cockalorum Sermon on Saving Faith," is a settler." And finally, they say, it is filled with good, sound, common sense reading matter, and is a severe goad to old orthodox dogmas. I think it is the best Liberal paper that I have ever taken. May you continue to ferret out the miserable sloughs of superstition and bigotry, until truth shall shine forth in all its splendor.

The other day a church member told me his pastor said he hoped that old Infidel James, with his wretched paper called THE TRUTH SEEKER, would leave the city soon, because its obscene and hellish sentiments were getting a strong hold on the minds of many young men, and even some members of the Church swallowed its smooth and hellish lies. I told him he had better send for Comstock to come and watch the post-office awhile.

I think the waters are somewhat troubled. If I could get a few to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER I would, but the church people hold the balance of power here yet, and the common people are rather timid. Hope they will grow bolder soon and assert their manhood. I send this and you can do as you think best about publishing it. I am not a public writer nor lecturer, but I am an old man and have been ground in the old orthodox mill of bigotry pretty soundly. So a little free breath makes me feel very happy, and I want everybody to know what a Savior I have found, therefore I have written this. I shall leave this city next week for Rockvale, Ogle Co., Illinois, where my home is, and you will please send the paper here until the present subscription expires, and I will renew there, and will do my best to get you more subscribers. If I can I will get some one to take my place. I am, dear sir, fraternally yours, JOHN JAMES.

MACEDON, WAYNE Co., N. Y., June 10, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: W. S. Bell's lecture was the first lecture ever delivered in Macedon on the side of true mental liberty; subject, What has Freethought to offer in Place of Christianity? The new and commodious hall was filled to overflowing with Liberals and Christians. Many of the Christians came in the full confidence that Christian morality could not possibly be improved or set aside by anything better; but they were disappointed in finding that the speaker was prepared with an array of facts to show not only the weakness of their system, founded as it is on mysterious faith, but also the strength and grandeur of that system founded on reason and the knowledge of nature and her laws, and from which eternal system the Christian system has derived all that is of any value in it. The lecturer has called forth much thought in an entirely new line, and will do a vast amount of good. In due time we shall witness its effects. Mr. Bell is doing a good work, and should be encouraged by the Liberals of this country. How shall the truth be known unless it is set before the people? Fraternally thine, JOSEPH FRITTS.

LAWRENCE, MASS, June 9, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send you another list of subscribers and $8,25 in money, to which I suppose you will not object. I would have been glad to have sent you more, as I know it must be needed in the great work you are doing. I think if your paper was smaller, say twelve pages, it would better suit the majority of your readers. There are many who scarcely find time to read so large a paper. If you have saved any copies of "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," please send me some. Those I had have been lent and read till they are worn out, and there are numerous inquiries for them. I have been making an effort to organize a Liberal league here, and the prospects look favorable. The churches are becoming more Liberal every day. It will not be a great while before they get the wool off their eyes enough to lay aside the old Bible as an inspired book. THE TRUTH SEEKER is fast opening the eyes of the investigating portion of the community. They call it the best and boldest paper printed in the United States. The scientific articles, especially those on astronomy, are splendid; the Darwins, "ever so nice." I trust Mrs. Slenker will keep her pen agoing while I read THE TRUTH SEEKER. BENJAMIN GRIFFIN.

OAK RIDGE, MO., May 30, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In your issue of the 27th ult., I find an article that proposes to unbutton things, namely, "Is there a future life?" by G. F. Rockwell, M. D., also a graphic note from A. B. Pikard. The future life is based upon what is called the "soul spirit," if any one knows what that is. I dare say germ, for germ means something that is a seed or that part of the seed which carries on to perfection its kind. Prof. Denton would say "soul of the thing." First, we should decide upon this "soul spirit," in what it consists. Is it something, or is it nothing? When we have deciphered that something really exists after death, then we think it is time for research. If nothing is left after death, why so much fuss and feathers? Second, how to commence the investigation is the question. None of the Gods tell us what this soul or spirit is, or in what part of the physical body it lives; then it is time lost to look in the direction of the gods. Christ does not define spirit, however, for he said to the thief by his side, that he (the thief) should be with him in Paradise. Both died. Was death the Paradise? Who knows? Touching Mr. Pikard's gas, or "spirit" filling the cells between the globules or molecules of the body—we repeat, gas, common gas—same with his "hewn-off spirit legs,"—pretty good—exhibit an oasis in the human brain. If man lives after death, may we not reasonably suppose that other animals live also? Where shall we commence to discriminate? Animals have intelligence, some "reason." However, man kicks the beam of the intelligent steelyards, so far as we know, the greatest intelligence, gods not excepted.

If there is a God, we cannot think he "reasons in a human sense." The Bible makes him anthropomorphic, at the same time omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent. Such we cannot call a being. A being must have "body form." Then we say nothing outside of nature can be omnipresent. If so, nature is God, and we think her laws fixed. What we are driving at is to locate and define, if not analyze, this soul spirit said to be domiciled in every human body, and is separate from it at death, the body returning to its natural elements, as well as the soul spirit to the God that gave it (nature). This living part to be subject to honor or to dishonor, and without a chance of progress after leaving the temple or body, all depending upon the character of the spirit while in this tenement of clay. Such is Christianity! to which we say "bosh." Spirit-hunting in the light or dark is more rational, and more in keeping with our senses. Besides, it does not impeach the goodness of the author of our being as does orthodoxy. It can be nothing worse than an humble effort of the creature to learn something of what is said to be himself, and of which he knows nothing. Spirit "mirage" perhaps. If life be spirit, it certainly dies with the body, and as death is the opposite of life, there cannot be life in death any more than darkness in light. Spiritualism, to my mind, is but another link in the orthodox chain, and if we are to have life after death, or a continuance of life, this "miraged link" is decidedly the best link in the chain. It's worth hunting for. The old caricature or Christian devil is stale. The mind has supped and dined upon his majesty quite long enough; the age demands something better.

The Christian thinks if man is led to believe there is nothing more of him after death, that we should be miserable. Besides, without a restraint, "hell and devil," no man could depict the carnage that would be in the world. This theory places the human family below the lower order of animals. Animals prey upon animals—not so much upon their kind. It is man's laws and not a fear of hell, or punishment after death, that restrains him from the commission of crime. The Christian's idea of man's fall, and the plan of his salvation, is fit only for the dark ages. That God or nature went "nest-hiding with one of its creatures," though it be lovely woman, is too thin. "An attempt upon the part of the finite to degrade the infinite." It would be well to call the attention of Comstock to this.

People have learned that Christianity is but a fashionable institution—have evolved out of its old grooves, and if essential to salvation, there cannot be a modern Christian in heaven. For Christ "defines his flock," namely: You cannot lay up treasures on earth; cannot worship God and Mammon; dare not have any starch in your character; you must be poor; you must not loan money for interest, for sinners do this, and you would be no better than they; give to those who ask, and if a man sue you for your coat, give him your cloak; try if you can put a camel through the eye of a needle, and woe unto you if there is a failure; you must not swear; say "yea" or "nay" to all things. Next you must drink one quart of hemlock, put in your bosom rattlesnakes, cast out devils, open the eyes of the blind, etc., etc. Then you will know you have a promise of a place in the kingdom, provided, however, there be a kingdom or anything to be rewarded after the body die. The whole Christian theory is based upon a book called "Genesis," much of which is as mythical as anything ever written, as well as obscene. Much is said against Spiritualism, the dark seances, etc. There is more light in the darkness of the nineteenth century than ever emanated from under the cowl of an "interested priesthood."

Take the spirit from the Christians' and the Masons' great light, the Bible, and it is not worth the paper upon which it is printed. We have a right, it is a bounden duty, to search for the truth, and if found unalloyed, though in a dark seance, it is equally valuable as if found at noonday upon the pinnacle of the church, or in the sanctum sanctorum. Investigate, be not afraid of the critic. I believe in a great spirit; however, I am not able to define or locate it if it doesn't exist in nature, if not nature. Very respectfully,

M. J. HINES.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I know that sympathy is a pretty thin diet, but I still believe that to know that you have many strong friends and sympathizers, who approve and appreciate your good work in the cause of humanity, must help sustain you or else I do not see how you can stand up under the load you have to carry. I do not mean the superstitious bigots and fanatics with whom you are battling to enlighten, but the dog that professes to be friendly and slips up behind and bites your heels while you have the orthodox hounds in front. We expect the hounds of orthodoxy to malign, stigmatize, and falsify such men as Paine, Voltaire, Volney, and yourself, but when a man like the editor of The Index shall say that seventy thousand of the best men of the land are aiders and abettors and lovers of obscenity, then he must know that such statement is utterly false. And I will say right here that unless Mr. Abbot takes back that statement every honest lover of human rights ought to quit his paper at once. Every person knows that a slander or insinuation coming from our professed friends hurts much worse than from our sworn enemies, as we expect nothing better from them. Respectfully yours,

JAMES M. PRATT.

D. M. BENNETT: Being a new convert to Liberalism, and wishing to learn as much as time and circumstances will admit, I inclose post-office order for five dollars for the following books: "The Career of Religious Ideas," by Hudson Tuttle, and "The Champions of the Church," by D. M. Bennett, binding to suit price. I am sixty-seven years old, illiterate, don't know a rule in grammar, know nothing about rhetoric, logic, punctuation, etc., but eat the same kind of food that others do—when I can get it—and somewhere in THE TRUTH SEEKER or somewhere in your writings you say thoughts are the result of potatoes and other food, so, notwithstanding I have no book learning, I have concluded my thoughts, perhaps, are the same as those of other persons who are compelled from necessity to live on plain, coarse diet, only not so refined as those who are intelligent.

Well, I was born in the Church, and fed on dogmas and superstition till an overdose of potatoes or something else forced me to thinking without the circle or prescribed rule of sectarianism only a few years since. About the first thing that bothered me in my belief was the eternity of the Son. I could not get the thing to work right. They, the priests, told me I must exercise faith, I must not doubt but believe; but priority of existence in the term Father and Son I could not overcome. And this vicarious atonement, that produces such a wonderful effect through faith, when tested by what little reason the Church had left me in possession of, was morally wrong, for sin, as they termed it, was a crime and not a debt. A debt I conceived to be a commercial transaction which could be canceled by proxy, but transgression or sin was a moral wrong, and none but the transgressor should suffer. There are many more things in theology that appeared equally absurd and irreconcilable to reason or common sense. And then the bigotry of different sects and their hatred of each other disgusted me; so I quit going to hear any of their quarrels and let my potatoes and buttermilk and reason have free scope till I was led to examine Judaism from the reformed standpoint. I read several books and pamphlets by Wise, of the Hebrew College, Cincinnati. These enlightened me some, as they discarded hell and vicarious atonement, denounced Christianity, and made Paul the author of it instead of Jesus. I thought I had gained a point, and so I had, but it was only a standpoint to view things differently from what I had done before—could see now plainly that every religious sect hated all others which differed from itself. I was now occupying an unenviable position, when the "Epitome of Positive Philosophy," etc., was found in my box at the post-office. In a short time THE TRUTH SEEKER was also sent, I know not why unless my name was obtained from Dr. E. B. Foote, whose "Plain Home Talk" I had obtained, read, and sold a few copies of. I was also a subscriber to his Health Monthly, not even suspecting him to be a Liberal. But now I have ascended a little further up the hill and my standpoint is better to view the situation and confusion among religionists. I believe now that to believe without evidence is immoral, and the Jew is just as bigoted as the Christian or Mohammedan. When Wise and others were preaching in Christian churches, which I gleaned from The American Israelite, I was inclined to believe differently; but the manner in which Prof. Felix Adler was treated in Chicago made me pronounce them all bigots, and bigotry is the groundwork of all persecutions; all that is wanting is power. Intolerance is the greatest enemy to truth and progress of all things. I hate it from a Jewish standpoint. I find the early Christians were divided between Peter and Paul, or Jew and Gentile; circumcision preached by one and uncircumcision preached by the other. The only reason why the Jews have not been persecuted in modern times since they were denationalized by the Romans is the want of power!

Excuse my intrusion and desultory remarks, for they are from honest convictions, and I felt it a duty to let them out, whether from potatoes, reason, or delusion, all the same.

J. B. EVERETT.

HANS SCHMITT.

RICHFORD, VT., May 28, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: One of the most important considerations is to endeavor to know positively that any given affirmation is truly made. We have a Bible, and on the title page we have, Holy Bible, and the book is full of affirmations from first to last, with no evidence to our reason, senses, and sober judgment that one in a thousand of those affirmations are true. It is affirmed, and sworn to by all the clergy in Christendom, that the Bible is a revelation from God. And there is no evidence that any man on earth ever knew G-o-d, only to repeat priest-fabricated and priests-consecrated names. There are perhaps more than thirty thousand god-names priests have dedicated to the true god, as true as any god, and sincerely worshiped by ignorant people, and not a particle of information was ever imparted to any man by divine revelation; and the whole world is in total ignorance to-day of any real, definite thing revealed by those gods or bibles, only what has been got by experiment and observation of men. All the affirmations in any book that cannot be proved true outside of the book, are to us unknown.

There was a notable transaction that occurred in the vicinity of Richford, Vt. Several priests, lawyers, and loafers made an excursion to Glen Potter, for the purpose of fishing trout. It became known to some newspaper correspondent at Masonville, who dressed the story to suit himself, describing these fishers as probable Fenians, armed and equipped. It was published in Boston, New York, and papers generally. The story, coming from such a Christian people as there are in the States, Boston and New York in particular, when it got into the Dominion, it caused as great excitement as Felix experienced when Paul preached the judgment to come. And it made more and better converts than Moody and Sankey have, with their devil, hell, and damn-brimstone fire, and the wormy, immortal soul that cannot die, since they came over the big brook.

Then was fulfilled what Paul said. "He shall descend with the voice of the archangel." The Boston Herald and the trump of God, the New York Sun and the dead in Christ, that is, the poor church members in the Dominion, rose first and scattered the news. Then those that are alive, the members of Parliament, were caught up, and armed the militia. The foregoing circumstance probably will cost the working people of the Dominion half a million of dollars Thus, Christianity obeys the law of Confucius, Matt, vii, 12.

IS CHRISTIANTY DIVINE?

This question is being asked even by the clergy very often, and is answered by them always by affirmations, for there is no evidence to prove that it is not a fabrication of mystagogues. Take the first verse of Matthew: "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham," when he was neither. "Abraham begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob." We ask why was the begetting of Isaac any more than the begetting of Pharez by the St. Judah of Tamar; the beginning of the gospel? (Genesis, chapter xxxviii.)

St. Judah begat the son of God, and was a greater traitor then Judas Iscariot. Luke goes on to say the Highest overshadowed Mary, and the Holy Ghost came upon her. And Matthew says the Holy Ghost did beget it, and the angel told Joseph so. And Mary said Joseph was Jesus' father. Such are some of the evidences of divinity. Now, as the first two chapters of Matthew are faulty, and the first three chapters of Genesis are contradictory, the first verse in Genesis contains four affirmations that cannot be proved true; its divinity is suspicious.

In the beginning of creation! What man ever knew anything about a beginning without a starting point? And who knows the universe ever had a beginning? Who knows anything about G-o-d, only to repeat a priest's fabricated name? If that name means anything, it is the unknowable unknown. Who knows what "to create" means? Who knows that "Shomayin," "Shomilies," the sky, or boundless space, ever had a beginning? Until Christians bring some proof that our Bible is not the greatest bundle of contradictions on the earth we know not what contradictions are. Millions of affirmations amount to no evidence at all. It is a fact that Christians have assumed the whole thing—taken it for granted—and then murdered, fought, persecuted, and damned all who did not assume the historic monster.

How to Live.

MR. EDITOR: I see by your prospectus of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the coming year that there is to be a corner devoted to domestic affairs, recipes, etc. I think although there is a vast quantity of recipes to be found in the papers and cook books, that the right ones have not been made, and that the profession of housekeeping needs some advanced minds to initiate a new departure—quite as much so as religion or politics or anything else. When I hear of people suffering for food and clothes and houses, my heart aches for the poor; but the only cure that has ever presented itself to my mind has been to mend their own circumstances by a better use of what they have, or might have if a wise direction of matters existed. The doctor, of all persons, is the one most likely to be brought into contact with the shortcomings of the people in this direction. Housekeeping on business principles is one of the things which are so scarce that I have never seen a single case, and I have traveled some, and been in many houses and seen quite a variety of cooking and general housekeeping; and I often think that it will never be done until some well-educated man undertakes it. This is said with no disrespect to the women, but is founded on the fact that they receive radical ideas freer from the men than from their own sex; for, as things now exist, Mrs. Grundy reigns almost supreme in domestic affairs.

Here on the prairie the mere staff of life is of little money value, and is wasted to a very great extent, while not one house is furnished with good, wholesome food, scientifically prepared and eaten in the proper quantities and at proper times. I have noticed that there is an old maid somewhere in New York undertaking to teach cooking to the poor, but about all that I could learn of her new mode was the cooking of peas and calling them lentils. Another cooks a rat's tail in a scientific manner and gains laurels by it. The points for a book to teach are at how little cost one or more persons can be fed and have all the elements necessary to support a healthy organism, a thorough system of weighing and cooking, and the cost of the commodities at any given place, so that when the book is read prices can be compared with these of the locality where the parties live, and a clear estimate made. This, with a statement of age, size, temperament, employment, sex, and every conceiveable condition, is what is needed; and the whole scheme supported by the practical life of the writer. Let such books be put to press and sold at a cheap price and become as plenty as dime novels, and millions of money can be saved and many people become wiser and better. The reports of cheap meals at restaurants and cheap life in communities do not reach the class of cases I refer to, but the isolated individuals and families.

Perhaps I had better say here that I am no advocate of the poor man's living cheaply that he may work for less. I want him and his family to have all that would be good for an emperor, but I wish him taught how he can economize and thus save something to support himself while he contends for the full value of his labor against the powerful monopolist, for if he would be free, himself must strike the blow; and that blow must be superior intelligence harnessed to a strict economy. The easiest way to compel all men to labor for what they get is for the present laborers to do no more than will support them in a plain and healthy manner. Let every one make himself a sovereign and prince, and the principles of the American republic will be put in living action, and not until then. It is the home and individual practice of the question of universal mental and physical liberty that will bring about the equality so much demanded by the multitude.

Waconda, Kansas. DR. GEO. W. CHAPMAN.

The king from the council chamber
Came weary and sore of heart;
He called to Iliff the painter,
And spoke to him thus apart:
"I am sickened of faces ignoble,
Hypocrites, cowards, and knaves!
I shall shrink to their shrunken measure,
Chief slave in a realm of slaves.

"Paint me a true man's picture,
Gracious, and wise, and good,
Dowered with the strength of heroes
And the beauty of womanhood.
It shall hang in my inmost chamber,
That, thither when I retire,
It may fill my soul with its grandeur,
And warm it with sacred fire."

So the artist painted the picture,
And it hung in the palace hall;
Never a thing so lovely
Had garnished the stately wall.
The king, with head uncovered,
Gazed on it with rapt delight,
Till it suddenly wore strange meaning,
And baffled his questioning sight.

For the form was his supplest courtier's,
Perfect in every limb;
But the bearing was that of the henchman
Who filled the flagons for him;
The brow was a priest's who pondered
His parchments early and late;
The eye was a wandering minstrel's
Who sang at the palace gate;

The lips half sad and half mirthful,
With a flittering, tremulous grace,
Were the very lips of a woman
He had kissed in the market place;
But the smiles which her curves transfigured
As a rose with its shimmer of dew,
Was the smile of the wife who loved him,
Queen Ethelyn, good and true.

Then, "Learn, O king," said the artist,
"This truth that the picture tells:
That, in every form of the human,
Some hint of the highest dwells;
That, scanning each living temple,
For the place where the vail is thin,
We may gather by beautiful glimpses
The form of the God within."

An Infidel's Opinion.

INGERSOLL FOR PRESIDENT.

We clip the following from the Ross County (Ohio) Register, published at Chillicothe. It was written by a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has so much of the right ring in it that with pleasure we transfer it to our columns. We second his proposition fully as to Col. Ingersoll.

To the Editor of the Register:

Col. Ingersoll has more qualifications for the presidency than any man living. If honesty and capability are the requisites, he is our man every time. President Hayes said to a clerical man not long since: "Col. Ingersoll is every inch a gentleman." With Hayes this meant the highest encomium. In my judgment, Hayes' opinion is of more value than that of all the priests of Ohio to the contrary, because unbiased. True, Ingersoll agrees to Hayes' "Southern Policy," but then he disagrees with him on other important questions; hence, the President's judgment of Col. Ingersoll is valuable, because, unlike the priesthood, he is unprejudiced. I am digressing, however, from my real subject.

A few weeks ago, the "Reverend" A. C. Hirst performed a sermon at the Walnut Street Church, under shelter of an illiterate body of members, in which the more ignorant ones thought the parson "used up" Col. Ingersoll (a valuable opinion considering the source). Wiser persons, however, said that Hirst's argument consisted of violent assertions, sustained by no proof whatever (none being necessary before his membership). Hirst has been requested, by three different parties, to publish his performance, or a synopsis of it. This request he dodges and refuses. While Hirst is a clever gentleman, of fine oratorical talent, morally he is a coward. He is not honest, and doesn't believe half he preaches. He is no fool, and far too intelligent to believe a moiety of the nonsense he reads weekly before his church. He preaches for money, in which he resembles Beecher; and he cares not a "continental" what doctrine he preaches, so that the money comes. This may sound rather rough; but remember, when we fight the devil we must use fire.

Hirst's only reason for not publishing his performance is that he knows his utter inability to construct an argument in behalf of his superstitions which "these Infidels" will not soon riddle if put on paper. He knows that all religions are superstitions, founded on "false facts"—that every Christian argument embraces a sophism adapted to catch such men in the "dug-out" as Wiseman of the Advertiser—and hence he dare not put upon record the vocal utterances from his pulpit, which he throws into the gaping mouths of an ignorant congregation much as the mother bird drops the worms into the extended mouths of the blind young robins in the nest. His members know nothing of the truth or falsity of his eloquent assertions and assumptions, and delight in swallowing all that comes, being taught from infancy that superstitions are more worthy of belief than the facts of science. If Hirst says he honestly believes the flatly absurd dogmas he preaches, then he makes himself out a fool. But this is not my estimate of the man. In my opinion, he well knows the superstitious character of all beliefs in the existence of spirits and supernatural beings, of the belief in a future life, or in a heaven or a hell. His congregation know nothing, however, on these subjects. Hence, he is willing to teach such delusions just as long as they are willing to pay. When the pay stops he stops. In short, if the pay were to stop everywhere, the belief itself would stop everywhere. It is the love of money, therefore, which keeps religion (i. e. superstition) alive. The priest wants it, and the fools are willing to pay for being humbugged.

The reader may say this looks like charging fraud. I reply, there is not a system of religion on earth which is not a fraud upon humanity—an obtaining of money (in case of Christianity) under the delusion, the false pretense, of a heaven or a hell. Religion means superstition; and when superstitions are practiced to extract from ignorant but honest people their hard earnings, without any equivalent save the delusions taught, they are but naked frauds. Instance the delusion of a future life. Hirst must admit the well established rule of science, the law of nature, that "everything in the universe which has a beginning must also have an ending"—a law without an exception. The rule applies especially to all forms of existence rather than to matter itself. Yet he will preach to you that the human body, if he believes in the resurrection, or the human mind or soul if he doesn't, is mortal at one end and immortal at the other! He will preach the gross absurdity that when a man dies he is not dead; that when the brain, the thinking organ, is decomposed and destroyed, the power to think still survives! This superstition has been preached so long by artful priests that ignorant people now readily believe it; i. e. they have faith in what the priesthood say, and this is what is called faith in religion. What greater fraud than to promise illiterate people a life in heaven if they "shell out," or a life in hell if they refuse to "shell out" for the support of the clergy!

I fancy I hear some superstitionist cry, "blasphemy." Just let him scream. Let him aerate the poison of superstition.

Col. Ingersoll fought slavery until abolished. He is now splendidly fighting its twin sister, superstition. He attacks, almost alone, a paid army of 70,000 priests, and at every charge they quake. A hundred years, and Ingersoll's name will be immortal. Fifty years ago, Wm. Lloyd Garrison, almost solitary and alone, attacked the institution of slavery. He got into the field an anti-slavery ticket in every free State; a few votes was the only result. Little by little his grand movement gained strength. Thirty years of defeat and persistent renewal, and the effort culminated in war and the abolition of slavery. The Infidel Lloyd Garrison now stands among the blessed! Friends, remember this glorious example; and may Col. Ingersoll, in his similar battle, meet with like success and a like glorious reward. SCIOTO.

Facts from my Sundays' Reading.

"The ladies of Quito spend much of their time in needle-work and gossip. They take more interest in political than domestic affairs. Dust and cobwebs are unmistakable signs of indifference to cleanliness. Brooms are rarities. Such as exist are besoms made of split sticks. The ladies are inveterate smokers and use little mats for spittoons.

"The lungs of the Indians from the highest regions about Quito are of extraordinary dimensions, and the cells are larger and more in number, hence the unnatural proportion of the trunk, which is plainly out of harmony with the extremities, the result of larger inspirations to secure the requisite amount of oxygen."

"The early discoverers of the country found not a cereal grain of the Old World, not an orange nor an apple, and no sugar-cane nor strawberries, and the vase is still shown in which Father Bixbi brought the first wheat from Europe" (Ortin's Andes).

The volcano of Antisana is 19,000 feet high, and snow covers it 3,000 feet. On its side is the celebrated hacienda of Antisana which sheltered the great Humboldt more than sixty years ago. It is 13,300 feet above the sea and is one of the highest human habitations in the world.

Cotopaxi is the loftiest of active volcanoes, though its grand eruptions are a century apart, according to the rule that the higher the volcano, the less frequent its eruptions, but all the more terrible when they do occur.

Sangai, in Ecuador, is the most active volcano on the globe. From its unapproachable crater, three miles high it sends forth a constant stream of fire, water, mud, and ashes. No intermission has been noticed since the Spaniards first saw it 300 years ago. As many as 267 explosions have been heard in an hour. Its ashes are almost always falling on the city of Guayaquil, 100 miles distant.

A man in Tia Juana, California, gathered nearly 200 heads from one stool of barley (3 crops).

The Chinese historians trace the origin of their kingdom back through ninety millions of years before the Christian era.

A whale would choke upon a morsel fitted for the deglutition of an ox.

There are three ember days in our calendar, and on these days our forefathers ate no bread only that which was baked under hot ashes.

Victor Hugo on Voltaire.

The London Telegraph of May 31st contains a very full special account of the celebration of the Voltaire centenary in Paris on the previous day, from which the following extracts from Victor Hugo's speech are taken:

"A hundred years ago a man died. He died immortal, and he departed loaded with years, loaded with works, loaded with the most illustrious and the most terrible of responsibilities—the responsibility of the human conscience warned and put in the right track. He departed cursed and blessed—cursed by the past, blessed by the future. Those, gentlemen, are the two superb forms of glory. He was more thon a man—he was an age. He had exercised a function and fulfilled a mission. The eighty years that he lived occupy the interval which separates the monarchy at its apogee from the Revolution at its dawn. His cradle might have seen the last days of the great throne, and his bier the first glimmerings of the great abyss."

"O Voltaire! thou didst utter a cry of horror, and it will be thy eternal glory! Then didst thou begin the terrible trial of the past; thou didst plead against tyrants and monsters the cause of the human race, and thou didst gain it. Great man, be forever blest! Voltaire has conquered. Voltaire has waged the brilliant war, the war of one against all, the war of thought against matter, of reason against prejudice, of the just against the unjust, the war for the oppressed against the oppressor, the war of goodness and of sweetness. He had the tenderness of a woman and the wrath of a hero. He was a mighty spirit and an immense heart. He vanquished the old codes and the old dogmas—the feudal lord, the Gothic judge, and the Roman priest. He elevated the populace to the dignity of the people. He taught, pacified, and civilized. He was indefatigable and immovable. He conquered violence by a smile, and despotism by sarcasm; infallibility by irony, obstinacy by perseverance, and ignorance by truth. I have pronounced the word 'smile.' I dwell upon it. The 'smile' is Voltaire. Whatever may be his just wrath, it passes, and Voltaire irritated is always succeeded by Voltaire calm. Then in that profound eye the smile appears. That smile is wisdom.

The new society, the desire of equality and concession, and that beginning of fraternity which is called tolerance, reciprocal goodwill, the recognition of reason as the supreme law, the wiping out of prejudices, the serenity of souls, the spirit of indulgence, and of pardon, harmony, and peace—that is what has come from that grand smile. The day, doubtless, is near when there will be an identity of wisdom and of clemency. The day when the amnesty shall be proclaimed, I affirm it, above there in the stars Voltaire will smile. . . . It has only been given to three nations to resume epochs in the name of men—to Greece, to Italy, and to France. We talk of the age of Pericles, of Augustus, of Leo X., of Louis Quatorze, and of Voltaire. This privilege is the highest mark of civilization. Except Voltaire they are the names of chiefs of States. Voltaire is a chief of ideas. He begins a new cycle. One feels that henceforward the high governing power of the human race will be thought. Civilization was obeying force, she will now obey the ideal. The people will have no other sovereignty than the law, and the individual than conscience. For each of these in the two aspects of progress come out clearly—they are to exercise one's right, that it is to be a man, and to accomplish one's duty, that it is to be a citizen. Such is the signification of the words, 'the age of Voltaire.' Such is the meaning of that supreme event, the French Revolution. The nineteenth century glorifies the eighteenth. The time is coming; right has found its formula—the human federation. To-day violence is called to account and is beginning to be judged; war is put in accusation; civilization on the complaint of the human race is drawing up the mighty criminal dossier of conquerers and captains; people are beginning to understand that the aggravation of an offense cannot be a diminution of it, and that if to kill is a crime, to kill on a large scale cannot be an extenuating circumstance; that if to steal is a crime, invasion cannot be glorious, and that in the eyes of God eternal the face of the murderer is not changed because he wears the crown of an emperor instead of the cap of a convict. Ah! let us proclaim absolute truths; let us dishonor war. No, sanguinary glory exists no longer; it cannot be. O ye mothers who surround me, that war should continue to rob you of your children! It cannot be that humanity works, that civilization progresses, that arts and industry are perfected to end in that terrible international exhibition called a battle field. The true battle field is here. It is that rendezvous of the masterpieces of human toil which Paris now offers to the world. The true victory is the victory of Paris.

"Barbarism persists; let philosophy protest; let the eighteenth century come to the assistance of the nineteenth; let us invoke the illustrious phantoms of the philosophers, our predecessors, who proclaimed the sovereignty of reason, the holiness of labor, and the goodness of peace, and since night comes out of thrones, let light issue from the tombs."

SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents, which will be forwarded, post-paid, to any address on receipt of price. K. P. KIDDER.

Christianity and Infidelity:

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

A thick 12mo volume of 580 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL OR OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

Gems of Thought.

THE body—that is dust; the soul—it is a bud of eternity.—Oulverwell.

WHAT is the best kind of government? That which teaches us to govern ourselves.—Goethe.

WHAT is mine, even to my life, is hers I love; but the secret of my friend is not mine.—Sidney.

IN one thing men of all ages are alike: they have believed obstinately in themselves.—Jacobi.

ALL that poets sing, and grief hath known, of hopes laid waste, knells in the word "alone."—Lytton.

WHEN loving hearts are separated, not the one which is exhaled to heaven, but the survivor, it is which tastes the sting of death.—Praslin.

I THINK the first virtue is to restrain the tongue; he approaches nearest to the gods who knows how to be silent even though he is in the right.—Cato.

SLEEP that knits up the raveled sleeve of care, the death of each day's life, sore labor's bath, balm of hurt minds, great nature's second course, chief nourisher in life's feast.—Shakspere.

THERE are some men's souls that are so thin, so almost destitute of what is the true idea of soul, that were not the guardian angels so keen-sighted, they would altogether overlook them.—Beecher.

WHEN a man is made up wholly of the dove, without the least grain of the serpent in his composition, he becomes ridiculous in many circumstances of life, and very often discredits his best actions.—Addison.

IT is better either to be silent or to say things of more value than silence. Sooner throw a pearl at hazard than an idle or useless word; and do not say a little in many words, but a great deal in a few.—Pythagoras.

LET youth cherish sleep, the happiest of earthly boons, while yet it is at its command; for there cometh the day to all when "neither the voice of the lute nor the birds" shall bring back the sweet slumbers that fell on their young eyes as unbidden as the dews.—Lytton.

TO ME the eternal existence of my soul is proved from my idea of activity. If I work incessantly until my death, nature will give me another form of existence when the present can no longer sustain my spirit.—Goethe.

WHO, in the midst of just provocation to anger, instantly finds the fit word which settles all around him in silence, is more than wise or just; he is, were he a beggar, of more than royal blood; he is of celestial descent.—Lavater.

WHY should we look one common faith to find,
When one in every score is color-blind?
If here on earth they know not red from green,
Will they see better into things unseen?
Oliver Wendell Holmes.

IF I am mistaken in my opinion that the human soul is immortal, I willingly err, nor would I have the pleasant error extorted from me; and if, as some minute philosophers suppose, death should deprive me of my being, I need not fear the railery of those pretended philosophers when they are no more.—Cicero.

THE man who makes everything that leads to happiness, or near to it, to depend upon himself, and not upon other men, on whose good or evil actions his own doings are compelled to hinge—such a one, I say, has adopted the very best plan for living happily. This is the man of moderation; this is the man of manly character and of wisdom.—Plato.

THE most agreeable of all companions is a simple, frank man, without any high pretensions to an oppressive greatness, one who loves life, and understands the use of it; obliging alike at all hours; above all, of a golden temper, and steadfast as an anchor. For such an one we gladly exchange the greatest genius, the most brilliant wit, the profoundest thinker. —Lessing.

"IT is not safe for man to be alone," nor can all which the cold-hearted pedant stuns our ears with upon the subject ever give one answer of satisfaction to the mind; in the midst of the loudest vauntings of philosophy, Nature will have her yearnings for society and friendship. A good heart wants something to be kind to; and the best parts of our blood, and the purest of our spirits suffer most under the destitution.—Sterne.

SOCIETY—the only field where the sexes have ever met on terms of equality, the arena where character is formed and studied, the cradle and realm of public opinion, the crucible of ideas, the world's university, at once a school and a theatre, the spur and the crown of ambition, the tribunal which unmasks pretension and stamps real merit, the power that gives government leave to be, and outruns the lazy Church in fixing the moral sense of the eye.—Wendell Phillips.

WE cannot have a more pleasant and healthful recreation than that of gardening combined with its sister employment, floriculture. Digging in dirt is a luxury that all should indulge in, especially in the spring time. The personal contact with the newly-stirred soil of our dear old Mother Earth imparts vigor, life, and elasticity to the human system. There is a subtle influence that is ever emanating from the ground, especially when we are working, sitting, lying upon it, that builds up and continually renews the wasting tissues of the body. Exercise in the open air—a daily sun bath—is one of the best of tonics, "cheap as dirt," and available to each and every one of us.—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

WHEN the day breaks, the pieces go into morning.

"NEVER marry for wealth," says a contemporary, "but remember that it is just as easy to love a girl who has a brick house with a Mansard roof and a silver-plated door-bell as one who hasn't anything but an auburn head and an amiable disposition."

HE pressed her to his manly breast;
She seconded the motion;
His lips on hers he fondly pressed.
There was a slight commotion.

"I'll put the question now," said he.
"That you and I be married."
He voted "aye," and "aye," said she:
Decided—vote was carried.

TACKLING THE WRONG TOM CAT.

A man he owned a terrier dog—
A bob-tailed, ornery cuss,
And that there pup got that there man
In many an ugly muss;
For the man was on his muscle,
And the dog was on his bite;
So to kick the dorg-goned animile
Was sure to raise a fight.

A woman owned a Thomas cat
That fit at fifteen pound;
And other cats got up and slid
When that there cat was round.
The man and his dog came along one day
Where the woman she did dwell,
And the purp he growled foreciously,
Then went for that cat pell-mell.

He tried to chaw the neck of the cat,
But the cat he wouldn't be chawed,
So he lit on the back of that there dorg,
And bit! and clawed! and chawed!
Oh! the hair it flew! and the purp he youled!
As the claws went into his hide,
And chunks of flesh were peeled from his side;
Then he flummuxed, and kicked, and died!

The man he ripped, and cussed, and swore,
As he gathered a big brick-bat,
That he would be durned essentially
If he didn't kill that cat!
But the old woman allowed she'd be blessed if he did,
And snatched up an old shot-gun,
Which she fired, and peppered his diaphragm
With bird shot number one.

They toted him home on a window-blind,
And the doctor cured him up;
But he was never known to fight again
Or own another pup.
Folks may turn up their snoots at this here rhyme,
I don't care a cuss for that;
All I want to show is that fighting dogs
May tackle the wrong Tom cat.

NOT EVEN OVER NIGHT.—THE CONFESSION THAT MR. BOSBYSCHELL, OF BURLINGTON, WOULD ON NO ACCOUNT WAIT TO TELL.—Some one, a figure arrayed in white, with frills around its head and blood in its eye, let him in, and he lunged with easy grace into the first chair that went past him, after he had made several vain attempts to seat himself on the piano. The reproachful figure of Mrs. Bosbyschell regarded him with calm severity, and her icy silence made him feel uncomfortable.

"Meggarock," he said thickly, but with grave earnestness, "Moggareck" (Mrs. Bosbyschell's front name is Margaret). "I've—hic—I've gotta—gotta quinckened coshielsce."

"A what?" asked Mrs. Bosbyschell, in calm disdain.

"A quicked coshience," repeated Mr. Bosbyschell. "A quicked coshience. A—hic—I've got something ommy min', Moggart. I've gotta—hic—coffessiol—codfession—gottacofession t'make.

"You can make it in the morning," she said, imperiously. "I am going to bed. You may sleep where you please, or rather where you can."

"Naw," protested Mr. Bosbyschell, with much vehemence. "I can't—cantwait—hic—cantgo't sleep 'th th'sload ommy—ommy mind. Got coffession't'make, an' mus'—mus' make it. Done suthin', Moggart—hic—been—been a beena load ommy mind long time. Been—hic—carryin' guilty secret 'round 'ith me too long. Quicked coshiense won' gimme—won' gimma nope—hic—no peace. Mus' tell you sumpin', Mogert: sumpin' 'll s'prise you. I've——"

"Mercy on me, man!" exclaimed Mrs. Bosbyschell, startled from her composure. "What have you been doing? Tell me quick; tell me, for heaven's sake!"

"Moggart," said Mr. Bosbyschell, "it's sumthin' ye nev—hic—never suspec—suspected. It'll mos' kill ye. Hic! S'pec' it'll n—nigh drive me crazy, 'Sawful t' think 'bout it. Y'—y' wouldn' b'lieve it of me. Margart, 'y—ye wouldn'. I've been——"

"Speak!" shrieked the almost frantic woman. "I'm wild with suspense! Speak, tell me all, quick. Oh, I could tear her eyes out. Tell me, you brute, what is her name? Who is she?"

"Wh—wh—hic! Who'sh who?" demanded Mr. Bosbyschell, in blank amazement.

"The woman, you wretch!" screamed his wife; "who is the woman?"

"Oh, shaw, Moggart," ejaculated Mr. Bosbyschell, "tain't—hic—that. Wussun that. 'Smore dreadful. Hic! 'Smore crushin'. You—hic—'y won't hardly b'lieve it—hic—w'en tell ye. Moggart——"

"Speak!" wailed the anxious woman, wringing her hands. "Speak; let me know the worst! What have you been doing?"

"Moggart," said Mr. Bosbyschell, solemnly and with the air of a man upon whom a quickened conscience had wrought its perfect work, "Margart," he said, nerving himself for the shock of confession, "Margort, I've—hic—I've been drinking!"—Burlington Hawkeye.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Pope has expressed his earnest regrets that an unsuccessful attempt has been made upon the life of the Emperor William.—Graphic.

PASTOR JASPER has given up lecturing on the motions of the heavenly bodies, and is giving his individual attention to revival among his people.

FIFTY-ONE metals are known to exist, thirty of which have been discovered within the present century. Four hundred years ago but seven were known.

THE Evangelist says that one of the most depressing signs of the times is "the general decay of seriousness." But cheerfulness is better than seriousness any time.

BEECHER says he prefers one of Isaac Watts' hymns, which begins, "Unveil thy bosom," to Bryant's "Thanatopsis," which directs you, on the contrary, to "wrap the drapery of your couch" around yourself.

A NEW Presbyterian church is to be erected in Paradise. This is not in the Garden of Eden, the site of which was discovered by Dr. Newman, but in Lancaster county, Pa. Possibly that is the only paradise that church will ever be able to find.

IN Jerusalem there are about 13,000 Jews, being about one-third the whole population of the city. In the other cities and towns of Palestine there are in all about 12,000 Jews. There are a great many more Jews in this city than in the whole land of Palestine.

A CHILD was called as a witness in a Charleston court. The opposing lawyer asked her if she knew where liars went when they died, and objected to her testimony because she answered no. "Well, that question has not been settled by anybody satisfactorily," said the Judge.

THE Toronto Telegram called the Rev. J. V. Roy an unmitigated scoundrel. Mr. Roy thought this ought to be worth $5,000 to him, and sued the Telegram for that amount. The Telegram showed up Mr. Roy as a bigamist and a writer of scandalous letters, and so Mr. Roy goes without his coveted $5,000.

THE Turkish Sultan is grievously in want of money, and has great difficulty in even feeding his extensive household. Bakers, grocers, and other tradesmen, to whom he is already much in debt, refuse further supplies without cash, and attempts to borrow, except in very small sums, have been without success.

MORE hasty baptisms. A colored brother in Georgia is this time the hero. He baptized eighty-nine converts in twenty-six minutes and thirty seconds. He says that he did it without indecent hurry. If that colored saint could thus rapidly furnish passports to heaven, what a heavenly fellow he must be to be sure.

A METHODIST presiding elder was annoyed by an incompetent brother who wanted a license to exhort, and in order to confuse the aspirant asked him the difference between an exhorter and a preacher. He answered, "Well, you see, a preacher takes a text and sticks to it, but an exhorter can rattle round and say what he likes."

"SALVATION FACTORY" is the name of a church in Coventry, England, as shown in the petition recently presented for its registration. The projectors are a peculiar sect, who have been for some time holding meetings in the streets, and the building which they now have secured for their church was formerly a bicycle factory.

THE Bergen druggist says Vosburgh must have abstracted the tartar emetic on the occasions when he called at the store to get a copy of the "Christian Secretary" and of Dr. Phillips' book on the Holy Land. It is seen, then, if the allegation is correct, that the business of wife-poisoning does not interfere with theological research.

BRICKS from Moody and Sankey Tabernacle at Boston are to be sold for twenty-five cents apiece, nicely polished by machinery. Ten thousand of them are to be thrown on the relic market. In New Haven the relic business is lively, and bits of the late tabernacle in which the evangelists did their missionary and musical work find ready sale at moderate prices. Would it not be well for Prof. Doremus to analyze one of those bricks and see how many grains of holiness it contains more than an ordinary ungodly brick?

THE Baptist ministers are now discussing the validity of baptism, and seem to be arriving at the conclusion that this depends entirely on who administers it, and whether he was or was not properly baptized by immersion. Many of the Baptists hold that immersion administered by an unimmersed clergyman is no baptism at all. They reject such baptism, for instance, as that administered by the Presbyterian Talmage in the baptistery under his platform, because all the baptism Talmage ever received was "infant sprinkling."

WHILE most city pastors of other denominations generally go out of town for the greater part of the summer, nearly all the Methodists remain in the city, taking only short and inexpensive jaunts for holiday recreation. The consequence of this is that for the visiting of very sick persons and the burial of the dead, in the hot months, a Methodist minister is generally called. One Methodist minister found last summer that the majority of funerals he was called to attend were outside of his own membership, and from churches whose pastors had gone out of town, leaving no provision for such services.

A BOSTONIAN is undertaking to evangelize the merchants of Boston by sending religious appeals through the mails. Sometimes on postal cards and sometimes on bits of coarse yellowish-brown paper done up in envelopes, merchants receive messages to this effect:

> Which will You do,
> Forsake your sins, and go to > HEAVEN, > or Keep your Sins and go to > HELL?

The census of conversions by means of this style of evangelism has not yet been heard from.

A CHURCH in Chicago was scandalized on a recent Sunday by the efforts of a sewing-machine man to make the congregation an advertising medium. Just before church time he had a number of fans placed in the pews. These fans were of the shut-up kind, and it was not until the people began to fan themselves that the discovery was made that each fan was embellished with a conspicuous advertisement of the sewing-machine man's business. The objectionable fans were promptly and indignantly hustled from the sacred edifice. The sewing-machine man says he cannot see how this method of advertising is any worse than the common practice of giving out notices from the pulpit.

CHARLES F. WILLIAMS has just been sentenced, in Portsmouth, N. H., to three years' imprisonment. His criminal career is remarkable. During the war he was a notorious bounty-jumper, and was sentenced to be shot, but Lincoln changed the penalty to imprisonment for life, and Johnson pardoned him. Afterward he served several terms for bigamy and assault. In his intervals of freedom he was a public singer, clown in a circus, and a Methodist clergyman. In the latter character he was successful as a revivalist, his sermons and singing being wonderfully effective with sinners. He was always able to get good pay in the form of collections, and, having secured a sufficient sum, he went to some large city to spend it in debauchery.

MR. LECKY, in his "History of the Middle Ages," says, with respect to cleanliness, that the saints in Mesopotamia regarded washing the body as a pollution of the soul, and no man was considered to have attained the full odor of sanctity until he had converted himself into one hideous mass of clotted filth. St. Anthony, in his extreme old age, refused to put his feet in hot water, on the ground that washing of any sort was a fleshly vanity. St. Abraham, for fifty years after his conversion, rigidly refused to wash either his face or his feet, "observing that the face ought to reflect the purity of the soul." St. Euphrasia joined a convent of 130 nuns who never washed their feet, and who "shuddered at the mention of a bath." These customs are features of Christianity carefully observed by many good Christians of the present time.

PASTOR VANDERVEER, of the Union Park Congregational church, Chicago, resigns because his salary has been reduced from $5,000 to $4,000, and he thinks he is worth the full $5,000. But with household supplies at lower prices than they have been for twenty years, and the present lack of disposition to pay high pew rents, a minister who can keep a $4,000 position is wise to do it. There will be at least a hundred applicants for Bro. Vanderveer's vacant slippers, fifty of whom will be willing to take a contract to do the work as well as he did for half the money he received. And Vanderveer may wander about in search of a pulpit for many years to come, with a feeling of profound regret that he did not hold fast that which was good while he had a chance.

EVEN GREATER THAN THE MAMMOTH CAVE.—Another wonderful cave has been discovered near Glasgow, Ky. It has already been explored a distance of twenty-three miles. In another direction, called the short route, the avenues are very wide, and a span of horses can easily be driven through a distance of eleven miles. Three rivers, wide and very deep, are encountered on the long route. One of them is navigable for fourteen miles, until the passage becomes too narrow to admit a boat. The cave is wonderful beyond description, and far surpasses in grandeur the Mammoth or any cave before discovered. Several mummified remains have been found in one of the large rooms. They were reposing in stone coffins, rudely constructed, and from appearances may have been in this cave for centuries. They closely resemble Egyptian mummies.

PRAYERS AND LAW IN FIJI.—A missionary ship was stranded on a reef near one of the Fiji islands. One of those large tidal waves which traverse the Pacific carried it off. On the arrival of the ship in port the missionary told the natives that he had fervently prayed that the ship might not be wrecked, and that they had had ocular demonstration of the result of prayer. A few days later came a deputation to the governor from a neighboring island. "O governor," they said, "is it true what this missionary says?" The governor replied that it was true. "But did you not say, when you made us subjects of the Queen of England, that our property would be safe, and that if a man injured it he would be punished?" The governor assented. "Then, O chief," continued the deputation, "let this missionary be punished, and let our village, which was destroyed by the great wave, which came because the missionary prayed for it, be built up again by the missionary." The question raised by these enfants terribles of natural logic is by no means easy of solution, either in its ecclesiastical or in its legal aspect.

THE Tribune chivalrously comes to the defense of Mr. Bryant's "Thanatopsis," and attempts to vindicate it from the allegation of Mr. Beecher, that it is a pagan poem, or, as he puts it, "the sweetest of pagan poems." Both Mr. Beecher and the Tribune have a faint glimmering of the truth, but both are somewhat more than half wrong. If Mr. Beecher means that "Thanatopsis" is not a Christian utterance, he is clearly right, for it has not a word of Christianity in it, and might have been written 2,500 years ago. If he means it is an irreligious poem, he has given a wrong definition to paganism, for the pagans everywhere are far more religious than any modern civilization. A little country like Greece, about as large as Massachusetts, containing 18,000 gods, and worshiping "unknown gods" lest some deity should be neglected, can scarcely be classed as irreligious. "Thanatopsis" is not pagan, but materialistic, and as such, any religious allusions in it would have been incongruous and a violation of esthetic principles. The fact that religious poems are good and wholesome does not detract in any way from the grace, beauty, and worth of "Thanatopsis," nor does the fact that it is a "pagan" poem make it necessary to apologize for it in the least. Some of the most beautiful passages in the New Testament are word for word from "pagan" sources. Perhaps the Tribune may find it necessary to volunteer as an apologist for Homer, Plato, Socrates, Hesiod, Epictetus, Æschylus, Pindar, Marcus Aurelius, Plutarch, Aristotle, Confucius, and other eminent "pagans" from whom civilization has inherited many of its sweetest flavors. Or may it perhaps be true that Bryant knew what he was about and needed no extenuation?—Graphic.

"To tell you, my dear Dora, that I was astonished and indignant would be but the merest shadow of what I really felt. The mean, contemptible, selfish wretch! Did he imagine that after all these years of desertion, while he was rolling in wealth, and I and my babe drinking to the dregs the cup of poverty, I could, at a few pleading words, forgive and forget? Could he believe that idolatrous love, such as I once felt for him, could ever be kindled after it had been so completely killed out by his cruel, heartless, selfish conduct? Did I not know too well that he married Miss Simms instead of me, because she owned six thousand dollars and I had not a cent? I know that he did once love me, but it was a wild and careless love like his reckless nature, though it was all he was capable of, and doubtless he thinks he loves me yet, and maybe does as much as such as he can love. And just see how complacently he talks—just as if he had but to open his arms and I would fall into them at once. His dried-up, wizened old frame is but an outward picture of the inward man. He is contemptible in every sense of the word. I should feel it, even had I not known all his manners to his family during the many years he has "honored" your town with his presence. Had he dreamed that you and I corresponded he would never have come back here or sought me out. I am certain of that. His religion is as shallow as his love. His sermons are an intellectual feast, but I know him too well to believe they are his true sentiments. He could not feel them, for his soul is too shallow for a deep thought to find permanent lodgment therein. But enough of him. I shall write him a scathing letter that will take a little of the self-complacency out of him, or I am no judge.

"Yours as ever, CARRIE BROWN.

"P. S. 'Tis two days since I penned the above, and as I have neglected to mail it, I open the letter too add the denouement. You remember that wild and wilful sprite, Hetty Cooper, that I wrote you about last summer. She is now chambermaid at the hotel here. She had charge of Mr. Conway's room, and he had made quite a pet of her, giving her little presents, and, preacher-like, a kiss now and then to keep in her good graces, so that she would run errands and do little extra jobs for him. Well, the night after he gave me the letter he offended her in some way, and the next morning while he was at church preaching his Sunday sermon, she opened his trunk, which for a miracle he had forgotten to lock, and got to rummaging among his papers, and at the very bottom of the trunk she found a large package carefully tied up, which on opening proved to be sermons, all filed and numbered, and each one signed with the name of Luther S——, who, you remember was a talented young student of the University at B——, and was killed on the cars a few months after he graduated. He was just starting to take charge of a congregation in West Virginia, and consequently had all the sermons he had ever written (and he was an enthusiastic writer) along with him. As it happened, Hetty was his cousin, and knew all about the circumstances, and that the hand-bag of sermons was never found. She surmised at once that Mr. Conway had somehow obtained possession of them and was memorizing and preaching them as his own productions. She was not only offended at the deacon, but desirous also of having the sermons credited to her cousin, so she went at once to Rev. Mr. Booth and told him of her discovery; and after evening service Mr. Booth invited Conway to his house, telling him he had some important business with him. When he came he told him of Hetty's discovery, and added that for some time he had suspected something wrong about him, because of the great difference between his common conversation and public speaking. 'And,' continued he, 'I had written to two of your pretended endorsers, and last night's mail brought me word that they had neither of them ever given a man answering to your description a letter of introduction to any church in the country, and I am, therefore, compelled to think you guilty of forgery and the basest deception. I shall be compelled to expose the whole transaction at our next meeting, and you ought, besides, to be handed over to the civil law which you have so flagrantly violated, but for the honor of the church I give you twenty-four hours in which to leave the county, and if I hear of you continuing your nefarious practices in any other place, I shall surely deliver you up to the tender mercies of the law.' Mr. Booth said the wretch just wilted down and left without a word, and in two hours he had his arrangements all made and quitted the town for parts unknown."

"This is all that she wrote concerning your father, Sue, but it is enough to show you that he is well and living in clover. The church there is a wealthy one, and the sermons he stole were so fine that he had no difficulty in making large collections. His new converts had made up several nice amounts from time to time, as many of them had been wild, reckless, and drinking men, and they felt truly grateful to him for being the agent by which they were turned from their bad ways into paths of peace and happiness. In speaking of the good that was done through Mr. Conway's ministrations at that place, Mrs. Brown says: 'I feel that a great work has been done here, and hope that the reforms will be permanent. That the Church does much good I am forced to own, but I question whether it does not do far more of evil by fostering falsehood, deception, and hypocrisy—by teaching known error in the idea that good will result from it. I am no Christian, as you are aware, Dora, for I lost all my religion—all my faith in a kind father's love and care, in his heavenly mercy and tender protection—during my years of trial and suffering, when love, trust, and even common charity were denied me, and I was left to battle alone with sickness, shame, poverty, and sorrow! My aged mother died of the calumny and disgrace which covered a name that for countless generations had been pure, spotless, and unstained. Oh, Dora! I feel almost wild even now, when I think of the passionate prayers I put up to what I imagined to be a great, good, and just being. Prayers for the precious life of my beloved mother; prayers for the happiness of my faithless lover; prayers for the death of my unborn babe; prayers for my own death after its birth; prayers uttered in intense agony at the thought that the helpless, innocent child was doomed because of its illegitimacy, to suffer the extreme torments of an endless hell throughout all the ages yet to come; to suffer in anguish inconceivable, simply because of my own sin, and the sin of its heartless father. And should she live to become a mother, all her children and children's children, 'even to the tenth generation,' must endure for billions and billions of quintillions of eons of ages, torments which no fear can picture or describe. 'The bastard shall not enter the kingdom of heaven,' rang into my ears for months and years. I said to myself, These are only sheep and goats, only heaven and hell, only two alternatives, and my poor little child has not a straw of hope to cling to. Oh! I shudder to think of all this, even now that it has become so entirely a thing of the past. Is it any wonder that my faith in a kind, overruling providence was at last shaken? That I gradually lost my hold upon Christianity and the Bible, and learned to believe in nothing outside of nature and its material agencies? But I must stop, or my P. S. will be longer than my letter. The coming of Mr. Conway to this place, and again acting out his base, hypocritical, lying nature, has so stirred up and awakened thoughts of the past, that I can hardly help pouring them all into your sympathizing bosom, my old and dear friend. I know you rejoice with me that the shadow has at last been lifted. My daughter has grown up to be a good and lovely woman, honest and truthful notwithstanding the elements of baseness she must have inherited from her father. I see her happy, loved, and respected, and find with her and her noble, true-hearted husband, peace, happiness, and contentment, so that my life now flows on in a calm, peaceful current. As of old, I am your loving friend, CARRIE BROWN.'"

As Edith concluded the letter, Sue heaved a sad sigh, and was for a moment silent. Then suddenly sitting up firm and erect she said: "I am grieved and sorry that it is possible for human nature to be so degraded and vile, so mean and contemptible, and that I must call such a man by the holy and revered name of father, but what is, cannot be helped, and all I can do is to wait and hope. Perhaps something may some day awaken his better nature, if he has any, and he may be able to retrieve some of his past."

"Yes," said Edith, "we will hope for the best. And now, to change the topic of conversation, we will coax Rose to tell us why she seems to be resting under a cloud. We know it is not because of any disgrace or unhappiness in her own pleasant, cozy, little home, or in that of her kind, useful, and respected parents, so we will hope she may be induced to unburden her heart, and by sharing divide her sorrows. If we only write down our troubles in a private diary it relieves them; and to tell them to a friend always lightens the burthen, so to tell them to a whole circle of friends will, maybe, scatter them to the winds."

Rose smiled, and said she was ready to confess, and that maybe her story might serve to "point a moral or adorn a tale," though the actors therein were strangers personally to them all. "You remember, girls, how disappointed I was that my Tennesee friend, Miss Emma B——, could not come to my wedding; and how surprised I was that she only sent a short note, saying it was impossible for her to fulfill her promise, asked me to excuse her, etc. The note was so cool I was really hurt about it, as we had always been such warm friends. Well, last night I received a long letter from her, and as we are all friends together, I will read it for you."

RUDIMENTARY ORGANS.

From reasons derived from comparative anatomy and other circumstances, we can with certainty draw the inference that all insects now living (all dragon-flies, grass-hoppers, beetles, bees, bugs, flies, butterflies, etc.) have originated from a single common parental form, from a primary insect which possessed two well-developed pairs of wings, and three pairs of legs. Yet there are very many insects in which either one or both pairs of wings have become more or less degenerated, and many in which they have even completely disappeared. For example, in the whole order of flies, or Diptera, the hinder pair of wings—in the bee-parasites, or Strepsiptera, on the other hand, the fore pair of wings—have become degenerated or entirely disappeared. Moreover, in every order of insects we find individual genera, or species, in which the wings have more or less degenerated or disappeared. The latter is the case especially in parasites. The females have frequently no wings, whereas the males have; for instance, in the case of glow-worms (Lampyris), Strepsiptera, etc. This partial or complete degeneration of the wings of insects has evidently arisen from natural selection in the struggle for life. For we find insects without wings living under circumstances where flying would be useless, or even decidedly injurious to them. If, for example, insects living on islands fly about much, it may easily happen that when flying they are blown into the sea by the wind, and if (as is always the case) the power of flying is differently developed in different individuals, then those which fly badly have an advantage over those which fly well; they are less easily blown into the sea, and remain longer in life than the individuals of the same species which fly well. In the course of many generations, by the action of natural selection, this circumstance must necessarily lead to a complete suppression of the wings. If this conclusion had been arrived at on purely theoretical grounds, we might be pleased to find its truth established by facts. For upon isolated islands the proportion of wingless insects to those possessing wings is surprisingly large, much larger than among the insects inhabiting continents. Thus, for example, according to Wollaston, of the 550 species of beetles which inhabit the island of Madeira, 220 are wingless, or possess such imperfect wings that they can no longer fly; and of the 29 genera which belong to that island exclusively, no less than 23 contain such species only. It is evident that this remarkable circumstance does not need to be explained by the special wisdom of the Creator, but is sufficiently accounted for by natural selection, because in this case the hereditary disuse of the wings, the discontinuance of flying in the presence of dangerous winds, has been very advantageous in the struggle for life. In other wingless insects the want of wings has been advantageous for other reasons. Viewed by itself, the loss of wings is a degeneration, but in these special conditions of life it is advantageous to the organism in the struggle for life.

Among other rudimentary organs I may here, by way of example, further mention the lungs of serpents and serpent-like lizards. All vertebrate animals possessing lungs, such as amphibious animals, reptiles, birds, and mammals, have a pair of lungs, a right and a left one. But in cases where the body is exceedingly thin and elongated, as in serpents and serpent-like lizards, there is no room for the one lung by the side of the other, and it is an evident advantage to the mechanism of respiration if only one lung is developed. A single large lung here accomplishes more than two small ones side by side would do; and consequently, in these animals, we invariably find only the right or only the left lung fully developed. The other is completely aborted, although existing as a useless rudiment. In like manner, in all birds the right ovary is aborted and without function; only the left one is developed, and yields all the eggs.

I mentioned in the first chapter that man also possesses such useless and superfluous rudimentary organs, and I specified as such the muscles which move the ears. Another of them is the rudiment of the tail which man possesses in his 3—5 tail vertebræ, and which, in the human embryo, stands out prominently during the first two months of its development. It afterwards becomes completely hidden. The rudimentary little tail of man is an irrefutable proof of the fact that he is descended from tailed ancestors. In woman the tail is generally by one vertebra longer than in man. There still exist rudimentary muscles in the human tail which formerly moved it.

Another case of human rudimentary organs, only belonging to the male, and which obtains in like manner in all male mammals, is furnished by the mammary glands on the breast, which, as a rule, are active only in the female sex. However, cases of different mammals are known, especially of men, sheep, and goats, in which the mammary glands were fully developed in the male sex, and yielded milk as food for their offspring. I have already mentioned before that the rudimentary auricular muscles in man can still be employed to move their ears by some persons who have perseveringly practiced them. In fact, rudimentary organs are frequently very differently developed in different individuals of the same species; in some they are tolerably large, in others very small. This circumstance is very important for their explanation, as is also the other circumstance that generally in embryos, or in a very early period of life, they are much larger and stronger in proportion to the rest of the body than they are in fully developed and fully grown organisms. This can, in particular, be easily pointed out in the rudimentary sexual organs of plants (stamens and pistil), which I have already mentioned. They are proportionately much larger in the young flower-bud than in the mature flower.

ORIGIN OF NEW ORGANS.

I have remarked that rudimentary or suppressed organs were the strongest supports of the monistic or mechanical conception of the universe. If its opponents, the dualists and teleologists, understood the immense significance of rudimentary organs, it would put them into a state of despair. Their ludicrous attempts to explain that rudimentary organs were given to organisms by the Creator "for the sake of symmetry," or "of a formal provision," or "in consideration of his general plan of creation," sufficiently prove the utter impotence of their perverse conception of the universe. I must here repeat that, even if we knew absolutely nothing of the other phenomena of development, we should be obliged to believe in the truth of the Theory of Descent, solely on the ground of the existence of rudimentary organs. Not one of its opponents has been able to throw even a feeble glimmer of an acceptable explanation upon these exceedingly remarkable and important phenomena. There is scarcely any highly developed animal or vegetable form which has not some rudimentary organs, and in most cases it can be shown that they are the products of natural selection, and that they have become suppressed by disuse. It is the reverse of the process of formation in which new organs arise from adaptation to certain conditions of life, and by the use of parts as yet incompletely developed. It is true our opponents usually maintain that the origin of altogether new parts is completely inexplicable by the Theory of Descent. However, I distinctly assert that to those who possess a knowledge of comparative anatomy and physiology this matter does not present the slightest difficulty. Every one who is familiar with comparative anatomy and the history of development will find as little difficulty about the origin of completely new organs as about the utter disappearance of rudimentary organs. This disappearance of the latter, viewed by itself, is the converse of the origin of the former. Both processes are particular phenomena of differentiation, which, like all others, can be explained quite simply and mechanically by the action of natural selection in the struggle for life.

The infinitely important study of rudimentary organs and their origin, the comparison of their palæontological and embryological development, now naturally leads us to the consideration of one of the most important and instructive of all biological phenomena, namely, the parallelism which the phenomena of progress and divergence present to us in three different series. When, in the last chapter, we spoke of perfecting and division of labor, we understood by those words progress and separation, and those changes effected by them, which in the long and slow course of the earth's history have led to a continual variation of the flora and fauna, to the origin of new and to the disappearance of ancient species of animals and plants. Now, if we follow the origin, the development, and the life of every single organic individual, we meet with exactly the same phenomena of progress and differentiation. The individual development, or the ontogenesis of every single organism, from the egg to the complete form is nothing but a growth attended by a series of diverging and progressive changes. This applies equally to animals, plants, and protista. If, for example, we consider the ontogeny of any mammal, of man, of an ape, or of a pouched animal, or if we follow the individual development of any other vertebrate animal of another class, we everywhere find essentially the same phenomena. Every one of these animals develops itself originally out of a single cell, the egg. This cell increases by self-division, and forms a number of cells, and by the growth of this accumulation of cells, by the divergent development of originally indentical cells, by the division of labor among them, and by their perfecting, there arises the perfect organism, the complicated composition of which excites our admiration.

It seems to me here indispensable to draw attention more closely to those infinitely important and interesting processes which accompany ontogenesis, or the individual development of organisms, and especially to that of vertebrate animals, man included. I wish especially to recommend these exceedingly remarkable and instructive phenomena to the reader's most careful consideration, first, because they are among the strongest supports of the Theory of Descent, and secondly, because, considering their immense general importance, they have hitherto been properly considered only by a few privileged persons.

We cannot indeed but be astonished when we consider the deep ignorance which still prevails, in the widest circles, about the facts of the individual development of man and organisms in general. These facts, the universal importance of which cannot be estimated too highly, were established, in their most important outlines, even more than a hundred years ago, in 1759, by the great German naturalist Caspar Friedriech Wolff, in his classical "Theoria Generationis." But, just as Lamarck's Theory of Descent, founded in 1809, lay dormant for half a century, and was only awakened to new and imperishable life in 1859, by Darwin, in like manner Wolff's Theory of Epigenesis remained unknown for nearly half a century; and it was only after Oken, in 1806, had published his history of the development of the intestinal tube, and after Meckel, in 1812, had translated Wolff's work (written in Latin) on the same subject into German, that Wolff's theory of epigenesis became more generally known, and formed the foundation of all subsequent investigations of the history of individual development. The study of ontogenesis now received a great stimulus, and soon there appeared the classical investigations of the two friends, Christian Pander (1817) and Carl Ernst Baer (1819). Baer, in his remarkable "Entwickelungsgeschichte der Thiere," worked out the ontogeny of vertebrate animals in all its important facts. He carried out a series of such excellent observations, and illustrated them by such profound philosophical reflections, that his work became the foundation for a thorough understanding of this important group of animals, to which, of course, man also belongs. The facts of embryology alone would be sufficient to solve the question of man's position in nature, which is the highest of all problems.

Christianity and Materialism.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Christianity teaches that God takes judicial cognizance of our religious opinions; that right beliefs involve moral merit, and erroneous beliefs moral guilt.

"He that believes and is baptized, shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned" The most abandoned and worthless characters, by belief and repentance in the last moments of earthly existence, can secure an inheritance in heaven. The noblest benefactors that ever lived, that ever labored for suffering, struggling humanity, will, without belief in Christ, be eternally damned. Every pious fanatic who has "died in Jesus," every priest or demagogue who has robbed and enslaved the people, and has been shrewd enough, at last, to cheat the devil out of his dues by availing himself of the great scheme of redemption, has been, or will be rewarded with a crown of glory; while Jefferson, Paine, Franklin, Owen, Kneeland, Parker, with a multitude of Freethinkers of many ages and of different climes, although noted for their disinterested philanthropy and eminent services to the cause of human progress, are doomed to torment as horrible as God can inflict, as unremitting as the flow of time, and as lasting as eternity. The last murderer who was hanged because it was deemed unsafe to allow him to remain on earth, having repented before his execution, and availed himself of the offers of the great plan, by which he had always intended to escape the natural consequences of his acts, will, Christianity teaches, have an eternity of joy with Jesus and the angels; while the unfortunate man he murdered, dying without belief or conversion, will suffer unending torment.

Who would not rather be damned with intellectual moral men and women, whose chief crime is that they are independent and courageous enough to examine the faith of their ancestors, and to reject whatever seems contrary to their reason and their sense of right, however consecrated by time, than to be saved with the ignorant and the vicious, whose principle merit consists in their declining to doubt or to investigate, in their adhering firmly to the religion taught them in childhood, and their confidence that the blood of Jesus has the virtue to wash away all their sins and fit them for the mansions of the blest? Who, I say, would not rather be damned with the former than be saved with the latter?

The Materialist holds that belief is not a matter of volition, and cannot therefore imply moral merit or demerit. Right opinions, like health, are desirable; wrong opinions, like disease, are undesirable. But the best men, morally, may entertain erroneous views on religion as on other subjects; while the worst men may have been educated in—or by their intellectual ability, may have acquired—correct opinions on subjects of a religious nature. A man's religious views depend largely upon the place of his birth, his religious surroundings in childhood, the associations of his later years, his opportunities for study, as well as the intellectual and moral character—dependent on his cerebral organization—which he has derived from his parents. If he is born in Turkey he will not be likely to be a Christian. If he is born in Massachusetts or Illinois he will probably not be a Mohammedan. If he has inherited religious tendencies, is surrounded in youth by religious influences, and possesses but little self-reliance or independence, he will probably retain through life the faith of his childhood. If he has a bold inquiring mind, is disposed to examine subjects for himself, has access to works of a Liberal, philosophical, or scientific character, he will probably outgrow many of the religious errors of his early years. How absurd to hold that the religious opinions of any man, be he orthodox Christian, Mohammedan, Jew, Infidel, or Pagan, involve guilt! Does the difference between the Baptist and the Methodist, the Episcopalian and the Presbyterian, involve criminality? May not the disbelief of the Unitarian in a triune God be without sin? May not the benevolent belief of the Universalist, that no human being will be consigned to endless punishment, be not only honest, but free from sin? Liberal-minded Christians will answer affirmatively. Why not go a little farther, and admit that Theodore Parker was not necessarily sinful because he rejected as unhistorical the miraculous portions of the New Testament. Why not admit that the opinions of the Atheist, whether they be true or false, involve no moral turpitude? What reason or sense is there in the declaration that "He that believes and is baptized, shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned."

We recognize the importance of correct opinions, and labor to discover and advance the truth; but we think as little of condemning men for their honest opinions as we do of blaming them for their complexion or nationality. If wrong opinions lead to acts that are in violation of law, society, to protect itself, may punish the offender for the acts, but not for his abstract beliefs, whatever they may be.

Christianity encourages the worship of God by prayer and praise. The orthodox Christianity of to-day erects, for this purpose, immense churches and cathedrals. Among the most costly edifices in the land are houses of worship. They have been built chiefly from the earnings of the struggling poor, from the scanty pittance of men and women who have to work so hard and so constantly that they have neither the time nor the energy to improve their minds by study and reflection. And these expensive and showy buildings are dedicated to God, and used for purposes of worship, which worship consists in uttering and singing God's praises, telling him how great and glorious he is, and how mean and miserable are the men and women he has made. Yet it involves not simply a doubtful compliment, but a positive insult to the supposed maker of man, that is, if he is capable of being insulted.

Materialists believe that true worship, if the term may be used, consists in living an honest life, and trying to make ourselves and our fellow-beings better and happier. We confess we do not profess to love a being we know nothing about, but among our own species we can find objects worthy of our deepest affections. We do not speak the praise of a being of whom we have no proof, but we render homage to genius and worth in humanity. We never thank an unknown something or somebody for our misfortunes, but we hold to a philosophical resignation to the harshest decrees of nature, if they cannot be averted or avoided. For religion we substitute practical morality; for prayer, self-reliance; for piety, intellectual culture; for love of God, love of man and a tender regard for everything that feels in common with us the consciousness of existence. Leigh Hunt, in a little poem, expresses the very quintessence of our "faith."

"Abou Ben Adhem—may his tribe increase,—
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight of his room,
Making it rich and like the lily's bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?' The angel raised its head
And with a look made all of sweet accord
Replied, 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' asked Abou. 'Nay, not so,'
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, 'I pray thee, then
Write me as one who loves his fellow-men.'
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
He came again, with great awakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blest,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

Christianity teaches that there are two distinct localities to which human beings are consigned after death; one is a place of happiness, the other is a place of torment. The way to heaven is narrow and but little traveled; the road to hell is broad and thronged with people.

"Enter ye in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat. Because strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." Matt. vi, 14, 15.

"I might," says Massillon, the great preacher, "speak to you of the two ways, one of which is narrow, rugged, and trodden but by few; the other, wide, smooth, strewn with flowers, and covered with the multitude of mankind. In the sacred books, the people generally are always spoken of as deserving of reproof, and the righteous as forming an insignificant number when compared with the great mass of sinners.

"I figure to myself that our last hour is come; the heavens are opening over our heads, time is no more, and eternity is begun. Jesus Christ is about to appear to judge us according to our deserts, and we are here awaiting at his hands the sentence of everlasting life or death. I ask you now—stricken with terror like yourselves, in no wise separating my lot from yours, but placing myself in the situation in which we all must one day stand before God, our judge—if Christ, I ask, were at this moment to come to make the awful partition of the just and the unjust, think you that the greater number would be even equal? If the lives of the multitude here were sifted, would he find among us ten righteous? Would he find a single one?" (Sermon on the Small Number of the Chosen.)

This religion requires us to believe that countless millions of our race will suffer unending torment. Our nearest and dearest friends who have died or may die unconverted, will be thrust among fiends and devils, into a lake of fire and brimstone. Even when the belief in such a hell is given up by orthodox Christians, it is still held that the punishment of the unconverted is so terrible, that the thought of human beings struggling in a lake of fire and brimstone, alone can enable us to realize the intensity of the sufferings of the damned. And this is a religion of consolation!

STRUCTURE OF PLANTS.

MY DEAR READERS: You have already perceived that I feel a partiality towards the subject of botany, and I shall not do full justice to my feelings unless I say something further to you upon the subject.

By way of repetition, I may say then that the science of botany includes every thing that relates to the vegetable kingdom, whether in a living or in a fossil state. It embraces the consideration of the external forms of plants, of their anatomical structure, of the functions they perform, of their distribution over the globe at former epochs as well as at the present time, and of the various uses to which they are subservient. It takes the vegetable world from the earliest stage of development, when the plant consists of a simple cell, and follows it up through all the stages through which it is capable of ascending. It takes cognizance of the minutest and simplest lichens and mosses, which are visible only by the aid of the microscope, and the most gigantic productions of your tropic zone. It marks the relations which subsist between all members of the vegetable family, and traces the mode in which the most despised weeds contribute to the growth of the mighty denizens of the forest.

The elementary structure which is the foundation of all vegetable tissue is the cell. In the young succulent bud of a growing stem, each cell consists of another firm, elastic membrane of cellulose constituting a cell wall; within this, a gelantinous soft mass of protoplasm, a cell cavity containing a more or less watery fluid—the cell sap. Of these elements of the cell, the protoplasm is that which is essential for its growth and development. In it are contained all the substances requisite for the formation of the cell wall and the cell sap, and the nucleus is merely a differentiated portion of it. From it, then, all the other parts of the cell are formed, and it is essential to the growth of the cell.

The growth of the cell is usually, at first, uniform throughout, and it has therefore a more or less rounded form. The protoplasm in the process of growth may be completely absorbed; and when this occurs, growth ceases and the cell walls form merely a framework. It may, however, remain a long time, assuming various shapes, and often uniting with coloring matters.

We have thus in the cell an epitome of vegetable life, and this is the most perfect form of the cell. As we pass to the higher forms of plants, where many cells are united, we find a physiological specialization taking place, by which certain cells are set apart for assimilation, some being embryonal, some supporting, and others protective, etc.

Cells, I will say again, united together constitute cellular tissue. It exists in all plants, and abounds in fleshy roots, stems, leaves, and in succulent fruits. It constitutes the pith and outer bark of trees, and is very abundant in the centre of the stem of special kinds of trees. The cells in the tissue vary much in size. In a cubic inch of a leaf of a carnation there are upwards of three millions of cells. They are frequently found one one-thousandth, one five-hundreth, and one three-hundreth of an inch in diameter. In some of the cucumber tribe, and in the pith of some aquatic plants, cells one fiftieth and one thirtieth of an inch in diameter are often found.

The protoplasm which lines the interior of the cell wall, and which is the essential living portion of the cell, consists in albuminous substance mixed with water, and some incombustible materials, and it also contains some organic compounds. It has a homogeneous, soft, gelatinous substance. As usually found in the cells it has a granular and turbid appearance. This arises from an admixture of formative matters, to which the term metaplasm has been properly applied.

By the term cell sap, is meant the fluid contained in the vacuoli. It consists in great part of water, in which are dissolved various salts derived from without, and compounds formed by assimilation in the plant itself. Among the latter I will mention inulin, a substance closely allied to starch and sugar, found in composite plants.

Chlorophyll is the green coloring matter of plants. It occurs in the cells of the superficial parts of plants united with small portions of the protoplasm which are combined into grains of various forms. Starch grains are usually abundant in the chlorophyll bodies. Chlorophyll consists of four substances, two yellow, and two green, which possess distinct optical properties. Physiologically it is very important. It is developed under the action of light, and undergoes changes according to its state of oxygenation. Hence the varied tints of leaves in autumn. Numerous coloring matters occur in plants, especially in flowers, and all such when not green are included under the general term chromule.

Starchy and oily matters and albuminoids occur very abundantly in the cells of plants, where they are stored for the purpose of nutrition. Starch, composed chemically of carbon and the elements of water (hydrogen and oxygen), occurs in the form of fine grains, more or less oval or rounded, which vary in diameter from the one four-thousandth to one two-hundred-and-fortieth of an inch. Each grain contains starch in two forms; one, receiving the name of granulose, is easily soluble, and gives a deep blue color on the addition of iodine; the other form, starch cellulose, is less soluble, and gives a green or brown color with iodine; but the former is most abundant in the grain. The individual grains either lie distinct from each other in the cells, as in the potato, wheat, and pea, or they are aggregated so as to form compound grains, as in arrow-root, sago, procured from the arum maculatum. Grains of starch present a very characteristic concentrically striated appearance. This is the result of their mode of formation. Starch is often accumulated in the internal, and often in the subterranean, parts of plants. It occurs abundantly in the fleshy roots and in stems, as well as in seeds and fruits, and is easily separated by washing. The ordinary cultivated grains yield starch in considerable quantity, as do the potato, arrow-root, cassava plants, the sago-palms, and banana fruit.

Sugar occurs abundantly in the sap of plants. When pure, and in a solid state, this substance is crystalline and soluble in water, but it also occurs in an uncrystallized form. There are two marked varieties of it. Cane sugar, produced from the sugar cane, sugar maple, beet, carrot, etc., and grape sugar, occurring in numerous fruits, as grapes, gooseberries, currants, peaches, apricots, etc. During the sprouting of the seed the starch is converted into grape-sugar, and a similar change is induced by the action of malt or any ferment. A sweet substance (not a true sugar) called mannite is procured from the manna-ash, as well as from the various seaweeds, and from species of the eucalyptus, and even the dandelion.

Gum, or mucilage, is another substance found in vegetable tissues. When pure, it is soluble in water, and also in dilute acids, but not in alcohol or ether. It is one of the forms through which vegetable matter passes in being applied to the purposes of plant life. It exists largely in the vegetable juices. From the bark of many trees it is procured in the form of an exudation. Two well-marked kinds of gum are met with, Arabian, soluble in cold water, constituting the chief ingredient of gum-arabic, procured from various species of acacia; and cersin, insoluble in cold water, but readily soluble in boiling water, constituting the gummy secretion obtained from the cherry, plum, and peach. A substance called bassorin, or vegetable jelly, is found in tragacanth, the roots of some orchids, as well as in carrageen and other seaweeds. It is allied to gum, but differs in swelling up and becoming glutinous when mixed with water. Another substance, called pectin, exists in the juice of the apple, pear, and other pulpy fruits. It is changed, by the action of alkalies, into pictic acid, which is found in many fruits and such succulent roots as carrots, turnips, beets, etc.

Oils, fats, and resins occur in cells of plants, or in special canals or glands, as products of assimilation. The oils are either fixed or volatile, the former being divided into drying, fatty, and solid, while the latter are distinguished according as they consist of carbon and hydrogen alone, or of these elements combined with oxygen or with sulphur. Resinous matter occurs in the form either of fluid balsams or of the various kinds of solid resin and pitch. In the rind of the orange and lemon glands of oil occur. Turpentine canals are met with in the woods of pines; and vittæ, or oil-canals, in the fruit of umbelliferous plants, such as the coriander. In the fleshy covering of the olive there are numerous oil cells. The fruit of the Guinea-palm yields a solid oil called palm-oil. The dotted appearance of the leaves of the orange, myrtle, eucalyptus, and St. John's wort depends upon the presence of numerous cells, or cavities, containing essential oil.

As allied to these secretions, I will also mention caoutchouc which, is found in the milky juice of plants, especially those belonging to the fig, spurge, and dogbane orders. The trees most prolific in this substance are siphonia elastica, urceolo elastica, and urostigma elasticum. Gutta-percha is the concrete milky juice of the taban plant (Isonandra gutta). Wax is also found in the tissues of plants, and it frequently occurs as a secretion on the stems of the wax palm and on the surface of the fruits, as in the bloom or glaucous secretion of the palm and candleberry myrtle. Crystals of lime salts occur in the interior of cells, and also in the cell-walls of plants. They consist of lime in connection with carbonic or oxalic acids, and are in many plants very abundant. In monocotyledons they usually assume the form of needle-like crystals, and are termed raphides; they consist of oxalate of lime. They are remarkably well seen in the banana. The squill bulb and the bulb of the onion exhibit raphidian cells, which are easily separated during the decay of the plants. The crystals are also arranged in a conglomerate form, as may be seen in the root of Turkey rhubarb, to which they impart grittiness; and in old-man cactus they constitute sixty or eighty per cent of the dried tissue. In a single cell of the poke (Phytolacca decandra) twenty to thirty crystals may be seen. In the epidermal cells of species of ficus, and other allied plants, prolongations inward of the cell-wall occur, at the extremity of which small crystals of carbonate of lime are deposited. To these the name of cystoliths has been applied. Siliceous matter occurs in the walls of cells, as in grasses and horsetails, and especially in diatomaceæ.

In connection with the epidermal appendages of plants, I should mention the fact that this eperdermis or skin is very thin in aquatic plants, while in aerial plants it is materially thicker, and in trees and shrubs this becomes the bark. In the epidermis are found stomata or breathing pores. These exist abundantly upon the stems and leaves of plants, and sometimes on parts of the flowers. They are absent from the root structures, though present on underground axial structures. The guard cells have a power of opening and closing these orifices. Their number varies from 200 to 160,000 or more in a square inch of surface. In the leaves of the white lily there are 60,000 in a square inch on the under surface, and 3,000 on the upper. On the leaves of the cherry laurel there are 90,000 on the lower surface and none on the upper.

Upon the epidermis of a great variety of plants are found certain appendages called hairs, scales, and prickles, denominated trichome. They are erect or oblique, or they lie parallel to the surface and are appressed. I will not detain you by entering into a minute consideration of them. Names are given to the surfaces of plants, according to the presence or absence of these hairs. The following are the most important: Glabrous, smooth, having no hairs; hairy or pilose, furnished with hairs; pubescent, covered with soft, short, downy hair; villous, having long, weak, and often oblique hairs; sericeous, covered with long, closely appressed hairs, with a silky lustre; hispid, covered with long, harsh, or stiff hairs, not appressed; hirsute, covered with long, tolerably distinct hairs, not harsh, not appressed; velvety, with a dense covering of short down; tomentose, covered with crisp, rather rigid, entangled hairs like cotton, which form a sort of felt; woolly, with long curled, and matted hairs, like wool; bearded or stupose, when hair occurs in small tufts, etc. Hairs serve as ducts through which the secretion of the glands is discharged. Such hairs are found in the nettle and are called stings. When the nettle is grasped with violence, the sting is crushed and hence no injury is done to the skin.

But enough for this time. I wish in my next to say something about the organs of plants, which I hope will not be wholly uninteresting. In the meantime take good care of yourselves and be happy.

Your watchful friend, LUCIFER,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Abbot and the Petition.

BY THERON C. LELAND. ARTICLE V.

Obscenity in the lowest rank of literature isn't Comstock's real distress at all, nor that of the people behind him, nor is its suppression their real object. That is only a blind, a decoy, "springes to catch woodcock;" and Mr. Abbot "talks like a green girl" when he gives that credit to the Comstock movement. Yelling after Ingersoll and the rest of us, "Don't fall into the trap!" he is the easiest and most innocent of dupes himself, and tumbles headlong into the Comstock pit. What Comstock is after is the Freethinking force of this country, as he and his confreres have many times openly avowed, and I personally heard that avowal in their last annual meeting here in New York. In the face, however, of this avowed purpose, Abbot, throughout this whole controversy, gives Comstock credit for honestly aiming at real obscenity in literature, and believes, or pretends to believe, that Comstock states the truth about the amount and extent of circulation of obscene matter. But we who have watched him and investigated his statement know that they are not true. He began that story about "tons of obscene matter" years ago, and trots out the same old "tons" every year since in his speeches, his compilations of statistics, and annual reports. He shakes the same old obscene shirt across the bloody chasm, and then proposes—what do you think he proposes? Not the suppression of obscenity at all, for that would suppress his trade and his excuse for being. He is bothered to death now to get new "tons," for those old ones so long played out, but which he is compelled to keep doing their veteran service. He proposes, I say, not to suppress obscenity, but to gobble up Freethinkers, physiologists, doctors, Spiritual mediums, Freelovers, anybody he can lay his hands on who happens to have any swag which he can bully the courts, the press, and public opinion into letting him drop into his own pocket. He gets his living by obscenity, and he distributes his bait in kind around where it will do the most good.

And this is the man whom Mr. Abbot, the high-toned Liberal, apologizes for and defends. This is the cause Mr. Abbot, the valiant soldier in the battle against God in the Constitution, espouses and makes one with his own. At the slightest far-off shimmer in the vista of years of this red rag of God in the Constitution, our Boston Bull paws dirt, whisks his fly-brush, locks horns, and begs all Liberals to make a league and come to the rescue; but when the devil gets into the post-office right before our eyes, here and now, and our ox gets gored, he shouts to all Liberals, "Hands off! Let him gore! Serves him right. He's no business to publish a Liberal paper and get four subscribers to my one."

I would be the last one to impute wrong motives to another. It is only to account for extraordinary conduct which injures others, or which throws odious consequences on others, that estimating or inquiring into the motives of another is justifiable at all. Mr. Abbot has himself to blame for placing himself in a position where the low motive of envy at the success of another is the most obvious one to explain his conduct. The first thought, and finally the only motive that can account for his otherwise unaccountable attack on Mr. Bennett while he was under arrest, struggling to get free, and calling on Liberals and friends to back him up with petitions and material aid, and account for The Index counterblast imploring Liberals to do no such thing, is the motive of envy at the succeesful rivalry of another. This motive of envy is in all men's mouths as accounting for Mr. Abbot's conduct, and I do but voice the general opinion when I give it expression.

Aside from remembering his brother in bonds, not as bound with him, but as wishing he might stay bound; aside from visiting him in prison in this over-the-left way, and the motive for it, there is also the general motive that he desires to stand well with the orthodox party. The smile and nod of recognition of the respectable righteous are dear beatitudes to Mr. Abbot; their bad opinion and censure are his hell; and he is vociferating with all the shriek he can command, and thrashing his arms wildly around his free-religious pulpit, imploring Liberals to be up to "trap"—trap is his favorite word; he is death on trap—beseeching the signers of the terrible petition to repent before it is everlastingly too late; repent, and flee the wrath of an orthodox frown; repent, and escape the hell of orthodox misrepresentation; repent, and be saved among the pious blest, where all good weak-kneed Liberals will immortal dwell, and where the gracious patronage and favor of the saints will descend upon us like a dove.

Mr. Abbot must be aware that he stands alone in the position he has taken and still maintains. In the first place, there are the 70,000 against him. Then all the correspondents of The Index, who have expressed themselves upon the subject at all, have taken ground against him. So, also, did one of The Index editorial contributors, Mr. Elizur Wright. Another editorial contributor, Mr. Frothingham, gave him a sort of quasi endorsement in brief diplomatic phrase, but went dead against both Abbot's and Comstock's positions in one of his sermons. One other editorial contributor—oh yes! There was one, the youngest, the latest born, in fact, the baby, Mr. A. W. Kelsey, in whom Mr. Abbot ought to have taken a world of pride, but somehow it seems he didn't. Kelsey endorsed Abbot in such an infantile, backhanded way that the poor, lone, lone editor, though sadly in need of support, had to snub and disown his endorser. Kelsey was willing to extend postal espionage to private letters, while Abbot draws the line on TRUTH SEEKERS and publications that are obscene in the eyes of Rev. Eldridge and Massachusetts orthodoxy.

I repeat that Abbot stands alone among Liberals in his advocacy of Comstock and apology for his works and ways. He alone dares to throw himself across the path of the 70,000 signers and lecture them for their "heedlessness," their obscenity, and their ignorance of "trap." Now, I know very well that standing alone in one's opinions or actions is not always proof of their unsoundness or indefensibility. I know that "to be in the right with two or three" is always noble—"the judgment of which one outweighs a whole theatre of others"—but what if you stand alone in the wrong? What is it to be in opposition to the spirit of the age without even the two or three to back you up? The prospect in such a case would not seem to be enchanting. Mr. Abbot now stands alone, not only opposed to his own correspondents, nearly all his own readers, nearly all the members of the League, the 70,000 signers, but he stands alone in the face of the gathering force evolving out of all the ages, growing ever stronger, till now, since he throws himself athwart its track, no locomotive crushing of a bull butting defiance will equal the besom of destruction with which he will be swept out of the way, and no prayers to the almighty Comstock will save him.

I have now gone through the main indictment which Mr. Abbot has seen fit to sue out of the—very far from supreme—court of his inner consciousness against the 70,000, and have shown its utter fallacy and falsity. I have finished all that seems needful of the personal criticism of the man, Abbot, or of answer to his personal views. I propose two or three more articles dealing with definitions of "obscenity," "immorality," how to suppress them and how not to do it. These following articles will be more of affirmation and statement of principles—less of negation and criticism.

If any readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER think I have handled Mr. Abbot with too little glove, let me remind them that he had the floor for six whole months, brandishing his immaculate flag and denouncing the 70,000 signers either as duped or depraved, before any one appeared to defend those signers as such.

Mr. Bennett had indeed kept up the defense of the petition, defense of himself, and incidentally of the petitioners, and had done good and effective work; but it might be said that he was interested personally and in other ways than for the establishment of the right. It was time that some layman in the order of Liberal Knighthood—one who had no motive whatever but his interest in freedom and progress—should state the true situation for the 70,000 and plead their cause. When this storm burst in December last, I was a subscriber and an interested reader of The Index, and an admirer of Mr. Abbot, though I have never met nor seen him personally. On the other hand I was not a subscriber nor a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and had but a passing acquaintance with Mr. Bennett. But the Comstock attack on him rallied around him a host of friends, new and old, as every victim of oppression always does; and, as a Liberal, I could not do otherwise than rank myself with these friends. Mr. Abbot might have done the same, and so not only have retained all his own adherents, but increased their number. But, to the astonishment of the whole Liberal world, he saw fit to side with Comstock, and so parted company with many a Liberal whose influence and support he will miss and may some time sadly need. As to my own influence, I know it is of the smallest; but, such as it is, he had those well known nine points, possession, in his favor; and if he had had the keen sense of the fisherman to know eel from blacksnake, or hadn't, as a hunter, gone off on the scent of a polecat, mistaking it for possum (his very dog would turn upon him for that), I would be with him now, and might be writing these articles and expending this brain force in his defense, or in promoting his enterprises, instead of the most disagreeable duty of removing himself as an obstacle out of the path of progress.

In what I have written I have but given blow for blow. The knocks received were of the unkindst, if not the hardest; and I have meant that mine in return should tell. I care nothing for Abbot, the individual, as I hope no one will care for me the moment I become recreant to the great cause of human progress. I care for the human race, and honor the individual who promotes the interests of the race. I revere the man who is loyal to its work; but when he turns, and rends, and undoes the structure which he had so laboriously built up, and that he had enlisted some of us in helping him to build, why, he becomes of no more account than so much avoirdupois of bone, muscle, and viscera, and we dump him with the garbage.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

Spectrum analysis has settled this long-vexed question; has shown us that certain nebulæ were not masses of distinct stars, but matter in a gaseous state, and has even enabled us to ascertain their elements.

Mr. Huggins, describing his first experiment on this head, in August, 1864, says: "I selected one of the luminaries in the class of nebulæ, which was very small, but relatively brilliant. Great was my astonishment when, on looking through the small glass of the spectrum apparatus, I discovered that its spectrum had no longer the appearance of a luminous colored band such as a star would have produced, and that in place of the continuous band there was nothing to be seen but three bright rays, isolated from each other."

This spectrum must, so far as it was possible to judge, have proceeded from a light emitted by matter in a gaseous state. The most brilliant of its rays was produced by a body analogous to nitrogen, or, as Mr. Huggins thinks, even more elementary than nitrogen, and which we have not as yet been able to analyze. The weakest of its rays corresponded with the green of hydrogen. The mean ray of the group was almost, but not quite, identical with the ray of barium.

In addition to these brilliant rays, there was a continuous spectrum, singularly faint, proceeding from a diffused light, which seems to correspond with the centre of the nebula. This is proof that it contains a nucleus, very small, but more brilliant than the rest of its mass.

Mr. Huggins has since analyzed the spectra of more than sixty nebulæ or stellar masses, which may be divided into two groups; the first comprising the nebulæ, which give a spectrum such as that just described, or, at all events, a spectrum comprising one or two of the three rays in question. Of the sixty which he examined, about a third belong to the class of gaseous bodies: the light of the remaining forty produces spectra of apparent continuity. The harmony between the results of spectroscopic and telescopic observations, in regard to what is common to both, is a proof of their accuracy; half of the nebulæ with a continuous spectrum have been shown to be stars, and in process of time another third will probably be added to the number. But Lord Rosse failed to ascertain this definitely concerning a single one of the gaseous nebulæ.

XII.

Mr. Huggins was the first to apply the spectrum analysis to the study, not of matter, but of the motion of the stars. If they possess any motion of relative importance, their rays must undergo a certain amount of displacement, and by this means these motions may be estimated. In respect to some stars, Sirius in particular, his researches have established the motion of these rays beyond all doubt.

He also applied this effective procedure of analysis to the observation of the comets, and arrived at the strange conclusion that the central part has a light of its own analogous to the flame of compound carburets, whereas the nebulosity emits only a light received from the Sun. This delicate distinction, says M. Faye, is of the highest importance in studying the physical constitution of these bodies. It may be added that the spectrum experiments conducted by Alexander Herschel have proved that sodium exists in a state of luminous vapor in the train of many aerolites.

The result of the spectrum studies goes, therefore, to prove that the stars only vary from each other, and from the Sun, in special and minor ways, and that there are no important and essential differences in their constitution. M. Faye, in one of his reports to the French Academy of Sciences, says: "Thus we see extended to all the stars of the universe that unity of composition which distinguishes our solar world and the aerolites; unity which is, however, compatible with many variations as singular as they are unlooked for."

These same results lend a great semblance of truth to the supposition that the stars have a function analogous to that of our Sun; and that they are like it, surrounded by planets which they keep in place by force of attraction, and which they illumine and vivify by their light and heat. So it may well be—and eminent astronomers have given such an opinion their sanction—that these distant regions are inhabited by beings intelligent like ourselves, capable of studying the harmony of creation, and of appreciating the powers of the universe.

CHAPTER III.

THE SUN.

I.

"This star among the stars," to use Arago's expression—"the light of the world," as Copernicus calls it, "the heart of the universe," in the language of Theon of Smyrna—we see shining like a luminous globe, incessantly darting in every direction its rays, which transmit with inconceivable rapidity both light and heat.

Most of the ancient philosophers looked upon it as a burning body, which lighted the world with the emanation of its substances. In modern days there prevail two opinions, which are set forth in the chapter on Light; one being that the Sun does, as a matter of fact, emit luminous matter emanating from its own disk; the other, that space is filled with a rarefied and elastic substance, which is called ether. This substance, by the vibratory motions which it transmits with great rapidity, produces to the eye the phenomenon of light, much in the same way as the vibrations of the air produce to the ear that of sound. This latter theory is the one now universally adopted.

If the Sun's surface is examined through the powerful instruments which science has at command, it will be found to present the irregular and undulating appearance of a stormy sea, covered with crevices and hillocks, and dotted over with spots of a more or less dark color. At times may be seen, particularly close to the edge of the spots, luminous masses, known as faculæ. To obtain a more complete knowledge of the Sun's structure, it must be examined through a powerful ocular glass, at a time when the atmosphere is perfectly still. Then it will be found that the surface is covered with a multitude of small grains, all of about the same dimensions, but varying very much in shape, though the majority of them are oval. A somewhat similar result is arrived at by examining through the microscope milk that has been standing some time, the globules of which have lost their regularity of shape. These grains sometimes unite in small groups, when they present a more brilliant appearance, while their oval shape has led to their being compared to grains of rice and willow leaves. The collections of these grains near the solar spots are somewhat different, for they seem to be longer, and to be joined to each other, perpendicularly to the edges of the penumbra, and look like straw motes of unequal length, or the thatch on a roof seen through the telescope; the Sun also seems to be dotted with spots, of various shapes and size, less brilliant than the rest of its disk. They are simply solutions of continuity in the solar photosphere caused by clouds composed of metallic vapors.

The solar spots generally look like round black patches, though it often happens that they are clustered in such a way as to form an irregular figure, with the central part, which is called the nucleus or umbra, black; the contour, which is mezzo-tinto, is termed the penumbra, the whitish spots being known as faculæ.

These spots were at one time supposed to be satellites revolving round the Sun, and, subsequently, to be clouds floating in its atmosphere, and even masses of scoriæ floating upon the sea of fire which constitutes its surface; or even mountains whose beetling flanks may have produced the phenomenon of the penumbra.

It is now about a century since Wilson (England) proved to demonstration that the spots were due to cavities of which he had been able to ascertain the precise depth; and he at the same time gave an exact idea as to the composition of the photosphere—that is to say, the luminous stratum which envelops the Sun.

A Synopsis of all Religious Beliefs.

BY E. L. SAXON.

To become conversant with the histories of all religions, and to be able to give such account of them as to run one within the other, as a string threads each separate pearl, requires no small amount of reading, and a laborious comparing of many books. There will be in this article little original, and only a brief synopsis of the forms of religious belief and how our own gospel came down to us, showing that the nations we call heathen and barbarian had each a religious system, to them as sacred and holy as our own, and whose ramifications underlie every tenet of ours, like the roots of some decayed, but still gigantic tree. Hindostan, or India, where first sprang to life a religion, adored a God called Brahma, so sacred they built no temple, and made no image of him. By a thought he created the world; was in all, and all would eventually be absorbed in him. This was afterward called, in translation by the Greeks, "Pantheism," meaning "God in all." They adored Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, built temples to them, and covered their walls with sculpture and hieroglyphic verses in a language of such remote antiquity that there remains no tradition of a people by whom it was originally spoken, making the pyramids of Egypt seem young. Their sacred books, the Vedas, with the exception of the Hebrew sacred writings, are all of the ancient writings that have come down to posterity in a state of preservation; those of Chaldea and Egypt are said to have utterly perished. Wherever the theories they contain may have originated, Hindostan is the place where the most ancient written records exist.

Their sacred books, the Vedas (meaning laws, and derived from a root, meaning light), they think were given by Brahma to the first man. These books are written in Sanscrit (meaning perfect). Scholars call it the most copious and expressive of all languages, and this proves it was used by a people far advanced in civilization, and with many ideas to express. The knowledge of it was confined to learned Brahmins, until in the last century it attracted the attention of European scholars. Their common and most generally read writings, are the Puranas. The code of Menu ranks, in antiquity, next to the Vedas, and to this day forms the civil policy of India. The following from the Vedas will give an idea of its spiritual portion: "There is one living and true God, everlasting, without parts or passions, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness, the maker and preserver of all things. We can only recognize him by his works, and nothing but the Supreme Being should be adored. Let my soul return to the immortal spirit of God, and my body return to dust. Thou only, O, Lord, art my refuge!"

They believe the world was created in six successive periods, man and woman formed last. Many of the traditions are similiar to our Bible stories. That of the serpent tempting the first pair, and Noah and the ark in the deluge, are very like. That of Christna, his incarnation and miracles, is a parallel with that of Christ, which story was written fourteen hundred years before Christ was born. They say their books, or copies of them, were carried into Egypt by a race of men called Yadvas.

When the mother of Christna is saluted by Siva and other angels before his birth, it is in these words: "In thy delivery, O favored among women, every nation of the earth shall have cause to exult."

Buddha Sakya was believed to be another incarnation of Vishnu. His sect of followers is the largest in India, and is followed in many other Asiatic nations. The number is computed at a hundred and fifty millions. No nation has ever exhibited such wonderful temples as Hindostan. Travelers all represent them as the most wonderful that ever have been seen in point of antiquity and grandeur, and in vast sculptured pillars and figures of elephants, lions, and men. No priests have ever maintained such power for a long series of centuries as the Brahmins. Missionaries have done little towards converting them, and a common maxim with them is, "Heaven is a place with many doors, and each can enter in his own way." They believe in a hell, or purification by fire; also that water cleanses and purifies the soul. In ancient days one wife only was allowed, now a man has as many as he chooses. Women are considered inferior to men, though less so than in some other Eastern nations. When they travel they carry the image of a serpent wreathed round a pole, and their temples are full of them in stone and metal.

Egypt is governed by a powerful priesthood, and its monuments tell of its great antiquity. Learned men say they came from that part of Ethiopia said to be on the banks of the Indus, or Industan. The points of resemblance between the two nations are too obvious to be overlooked, by even the most careless observer. Some scholars claim the greatest antiquity for Egypt, but with little probability, for Hindostan writings give an account of two emigrations from their country into Egypt at a remote period. Manetho wrote a history, while priest at Heliopolis, giving a history from the earliest time. He professes to have taken it from inscriptions engraved on stone pillars by Hermes. A few fragments of this history have come down to us, and have been proved in some respects true, by their hieroglyphic writings on monuments and papyrus. A papyrus now in Europe, of the date of Shopoo (called Cheops by Greeks), proved that alphabetical characters—on papyrus and written documents—were in existence when the pyramids were built, a thousand years before Moses was born. At El Karnac, the walls of a temple, from top to bottom, are covered with figures in religious processions. The ark is carried on poles on the shoulders of priests, cherubims with extended wings, branched candlesticks, etc. The finding of the Rosetta stone by the French army while in Egypt, which required the combined talent of Europe to understand, added another link in the chain of testimony for her antiquity.

The similarity of customs, priesthood, habits, inscriptions, and sculpture proves that one nation sprang from the other. Which claims the greater age let the learned decide. I seek to show that all religions sprang from one source. In both countries a powerful priesthood held the sacred books; in both, the religion of the priests was held from the people; both had a religious language differing from the vernacular tongue; in both the priests married; in neither was there a female priesthood; in both society was divided into castes, the sacerdotal and the highest; both believed that bathing in holy rivers conferred sanctity; both believed there was an immense reservoir over the firmament filled with water; both believed an element existed above the atmosphere, where gods and spirits breathe air as we do; both believed in one great God; the pyramid or triangle was a prescribed form for sacred buildings in both countries; both made similar offerings to their Gods. If the Egyptians still existed as a nation, we could see the books of Hermes, and perhaps find many other similarities. What we glean of her history and opinions is from those who were drawn thither in her palmy days as to a fountain of learning and wisdom. Josephus says Abraham went down thither to become auditor to the priests, and compare their religion with his own. We know he did not circumcise his son until after his return from Egypt, and his child was born of an Egyptian mother. Perhaps the act was performed at her request, for circumcision was an Egyptian ordinance, and Moses, when talking with God at the burning bush, says, "How then will Pharaoh hear me, who am of uncircumcised lips?"

Amun was their God, called by Greeks "Jupiter Ammon." Osiris, and Isis, his wife, are the most popular of the gods of Egypt. Priests were the only physicians, and they evidently understood magnetism well, as Solon says, "They cure by simply laying on of hands."

The Nile was sacred to them as the Ganges to Hindoos. Their oblations to the gods were meal, wine, turtle-doves, and young pigeons. This will be further noticed in the Jewish worship. On the 25th of December they hold a festival in honor of the birth of Horus.

The rite of "the mysteries," so celebrated, as afterwards taught by Pythagoras in Greece, was the most sacred of all worship, and there is little doubt it still, in some form, exists in all societies of any importance. The Masons have the all-seeing eye, the square and compass, the triangle, etc.

The Egyptians believed and taught that they were the first created people, and their laws were directly from God, "a system," says Diodorus Siculus, "that has been adopted by many other law-givers, who thus insure respect for their teachings." Their sacred books correspond in number with the Vedas, four, and, subdivided, made forty-two volumes. These were carried in procession, and honored above all else. They have been lost for fifteen hundred years.

Ah, when the collected knowledge of all ages perished at Alexandria, little did men dream how dark was the shadow cast over the long years to come. Our signs of the zodiac are remnants of Egyptian astrology. These signs were there represented by emblems, and finally became objects of worship. When the grand religion passed into shadowy dimness, dreary and empty indeed seemed the worship of bulls, cats, and monkeys.

When Alexander the Great conquered Egypt, three hundred and thirty-two years before Christ, he founded Alexandria, and, liberal in his great freedom of thought, invited thither men of all creeds and opinions, and, desiring to make it a commercial centre, it became the focus of trade, and brought the silent, unchanging East into connection with the ever-changing West. Soon in grandeur it was only surpassed by Rome, while in freedom of thought and commingling of opinions it surpassed it.

Two Egyptian kings followed Alexander, and, with unsurpassed liberality, founded a library and museum with an academy of learning. Ptolemy Soter, and Philadelphus, encouraged men to congregate here, and every effort was made to induce them. The library contained 700,000 volumes, and manuscripts innumerable were deposited here; here were a medical school and dissecting-rooms; here astronomy and philosophy were taught; men of different creeds compared them, studied religions, and under such influence a new set of teachers were formed, who carried to different countries the ideas they had received, and so mingled together the various forms of thought; each grafted on his own religion what suited him or left untouched what was displeasing. There is little doubt but that from this centre the myths of ages took wing to the uttermost parts of the globe. This library was pillaged by Christians during the time of Theophilus of Alexandria. The pillage was incited by constant feuds between the Christians and the worshipers of Egyptian gods. Theodosius the Great ruled then over the East, and he had been brought up a Christian.

The Chinese claim almost unlimited antiquity. A Jesuit missionary who has read hundreds of their volumes says they observed the motion of the heavenly bodies soon after our date of the deluge. They named successive days for the same seven planets that the Hindoos and Egyptians did. Unquestioning obedience to Church and State constitute their morality. The greatest name among their sages is Confucius. He claimed to write no books, only collected scattered fragments, and compiled the writings of those who had lived fifteen hundred years before him. The Chinese, too, believe in a supreme ruler, and in invisible spirit guardians. Confucius was born nearly six hundred years before Christ, and his maxim for a correct life was, "Do not to another what you would not he should do to you." They, too, have a tradition similiar to our story of the first man and woman, and the serpent, also of more than one deluge, an immaculate conception, etc. The religion is that of Buddha, and an offshoot called Lamaism. All their holy books are written in a language bearing a close resemblance to Sanscrit; they have ten commandments, in many respects similar to our own. Buddha in China is known as Fo. This religion spread from India into foreign countries with such rapidity that it came to be called "the Vanquisher," although it was uniformly peaceful in its progress.

It is said that eighty thousand followers of Buddha went forth from Hindostan into other lands, and the traditions of various countries are full of their miraculous power, benevolence, and holiness. This religion was never propagated by the sword; its votaries are computed at four hundred million, more than one-third of the human race.

A notice of Chaldea is necessary to understand much of Jewish history, and, after that of Greece and Rome, a more thorough understanding of our own can be given. I shall strive to sum it up in as brief a manner as possible to be understood.

Egyptians affirm that Chaldea was settled by a colony from their country, while the Chaldeans claim that Egypt was settled by their people. Chaldean literature is destroyed, and Babylon, being built of brick and bitumen, has left little to reckon historical dates from. Their boast of antiquity is like that of the Chinese, but the oldest records found by the Greeks who followed the army of Alexander extended back two thousand two hundred and thirty-four years before our era—one hundred and fourteen years after our received date of the flood. The similarity to Hindostan and Egypt, is proved by the little known concerning its religion and fragments of its grandeur. The ruins of Nineveh, after lying concealed two thousand four hundred years, have at last opened their treasures of obelisks and granites.

The sacred bull with wings and a human head; the sun, moon, and trident of Siva; the bull, the lion, the astronomical emblems; are all similar to those of Hindostan. The sexual emblems so common in both Egypt and Hindostan, are wanting here, but the tree of life with apples of immortality is found. They, too, believed in a Supreme Being and superior deities; they, too, believed the world was created in six successive periods. Their most important god was called Bell or Baal. When Babylon was conquered by Cyrus the Great, this temple was destroyed and robbed of its treasures.

Persia, though ancient to us, is modern compared with the nations mentioned. The Persians had neither temples nor altars. Their religion was simple; they offered prayers to the source of light, or to the deity they believed resided there. Zoroaster, their great religious teacher, has been by some believed to have lived six thousand years before the Christian era. Plato mentions it as the common opinion; Plutarch says it was only five hundred years before the Trojan war. The Persians say he came from some country east of them, and assign him a date more ancient than we do Moses.

Miraculous stories are told of him, but one thing is certain, all Asiatic nations agree that such a man lived, and that he was eminent for wisdom and knowledge of astronomy.

It was said he lived twenty years on a mountain, and one day fire came down from heaven upon it. The King of Persia and his court came out to see the sight, and worship the sacred flames. Zoroaster came down through the fire unharmed, bringing the sacred book of laws, that he said had been revealed by Ormuzd himself. This book is called Zend Avesta, meaning "Living Word." It was written in the Zend language, a dialect of the Sanscrit confined to the priests. He taught the supreme essence or "The Eternal," who pronounced the words, "Be it," and his resplendent abode sprang into light. He then created six resplendent spirits, one of which was Mithras; the radiant angel was called the Mediator. Ormuzd created the world in six successive periods. He first spread out the firmament with its orbs of light, etc., as in our Bible. The teachings of the Zend Avesta are to rely upon God, and he will send his spiritual prophets in time of need. It teaches the resurrection of the body, and that each be judged according to his works. The father and son, the mother and child, will, if one is good and the other wicked, be separated, one cast into a lake of fire, the other carried to regions of glory. But even Zoroaster thinks that passing through fire will eventually purify them.

It is taught that children should obey their parents, wives their husbands, to reverence old age, give freely to the poor, multiply the species, not to steal. To be envious or proud is a sin. These things are taught at great length.

As the religion passed from its simplicity, priests gained power, and exacted tithes—and almost worship—from the people. Their most splendid ceremonial was on the 25th of December, in honor of Mithras. They abhorred images, and clung with tenacity to the teachings of Zoroaster, through all chances and changes.

Sepher Toldoth Jeschu.

CHAPTER II.

And it came to pass that when Jeshu was come to Nobah, which is near Jerusalem, he said to them, Have ye not here a good and comely ass? And when they replied that one was at hand, he said, Bring him hither.

And a most beautiful ass being brought, he mounted upon him and went to Jerusalem.

As he entered the city all the people sallied out to meet him. And raising his voice he said to them, Concerning me the prophet Zacharias said, Behold thy king cometh to thee, just and having salvation, lowly and sitting upon an ass and a colt the foal of an ass.

These things being known, there was great weeping and rending of garments, and the devout men went and complained to the queen.

(She was Queen Helena, the wife of King Janneus mentioned above; she reigned after the death of her husband. She is otherwise called Oleina, and had a son Nunbasus, the king, otherwise called Hyrcanus, who was slain by his servant Herod.)*

The devout men said to the Queen, This fellow deserveth the worst punishment, for he is a seducer of men. Prithee, grant us the power, and we will take him in our snares.

The Queen answering, said, Call him hither that I may understand this case. But she thought to liberate him from their hands, because she was related to him by blood.

Now the wise men perceiving her design, said to her, Do not, O royal mistress, undertake to do this, lest thou shouldst become his abettor; for by his sorceries he leads men into error and crime.

At the same time they explained to her the whole matter of the ineffable name, and then added, It is for thee to impose punishment, for he deserveth the worst.

Then they narrated the history of Joseph Pandera, and attested that Jeshu was a bastard and the son of a separated woman.

At this the Queen said, I understand you; now bring him to me and let me hear what he saith, and see what he doeth; for everybody telleth me of the great miracles he performeth. The wise men replied, We will do as thou savest.

Therefore they sent for Jeshu and placed him before the Queen. Then thus the Queen spoke: I have heard that thou performest many wonderful miracles; now do one in my presence.

Jeshu replied, Whatever thou commandest I will do. Meanwhile I pray this one thing: that thou wilt not give me into the hands of these wicked men who have pronounced me a bastard. The Queen replied, Fear nothing.

Then Jeshu said, Bring hither a leper and I will heal him. And when a leper was brought he laid his hand upon him, and invoking the almighty name restored him to health, so that the flesh of his face became like that of a boy.

Furthermore Jeshu said, Bring hither a dead body. And a dead body being brought, he straightway put his hand upon it, and pronounced the name, and it revived and stood upon its feet.

Then said Jeshu, Esaias prophecied concerning me. Then shall the lame man leap as a hart, etc.

Then the Queen turning to the wise men said, How can ye affirm that this man is a sorcerer? Have I not seen him with my own eyes performing miracles like as the Son of God?

But the wise men answering, said, Let not the Queen speak thus, for most certainly this man is a sorcerer. But the Queen said, Get ye hence from my sight, and never again bring a like accusation before me.

Therefore the wise men left the presence of the Queen, sad at heart, and conferring one with another they said, We will show ourselves crafty, so that this fellow may fall into our hands.

Moreover a certain one of them said, If it seemeth good to you, let one of us also learn the name, and as he performeth the miracles, perchance we may take him.

The wise men approved of this device and said, Whoever shall learn the name and shall confound this fellow, to him shall be given a double reward in the world to come.

Forthwith a certain one of the wise men named Judah arose and said, If ye will answer for the supposed guilt of the offense by which I shall speak the almighty name, I will learn it, and peradventure God in his mercy and great goodness will bless me, and bring into my hands this bastard and son of a separated women.

Then all with one voice cried out, On us be the sin: do as thou hast proposed, and may thy work be crowned with success.

Therefore he also went into the Holy of Holies, and did the same that Jeshu had done.

Then going through the city he cried out, Where are they who report that this bastard is the Son of God? Am not I, who am only flesh and blood, able to do the things which Jeshu hath done?

The Queen and her chiefs having heard of this, Judah was brought before her, accompanied by the elders and wise men of Jerusalem.

But the Queen commanded Jeshu to be called, and said to him, Show us what thou hast lately done. And he began to perform his miracles before the people.

Then Judah spoke these words to the Queen and all the people: Nothing that this fellow doeth is wonderful to us. Let him build his nest among the stars and I will hurl him down.

Then Jeshu thus addressed the whole people: Have ye not been from the beginning, from the time when I first knew you, a stiff-necked people?

Judah answered, Is it not true that thou dost practice wickedness, thou bastard and son of a separated woman? Did not our master Moses say concerning thee, If thy brother, the son of thy mother, entice thee, saying, Let us, etc., thou shalt bring the man out, and stone him with stones that he die?

But the bastard answering, said, Did not Esaias prophecy concerning me? And are not these the words of my great forefather David concerning me: The Lord said unto me. Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee, etc.? And in like manner in another place he said, The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand.

And now I will ascend to my heavenly Father and will sit at his right hand, and ye shall behold it with your eyes. But thou, Judah, shalt not attain to this.

And now Jeshu uttered the almighty name, and there came a wind and lifted him up between heaven and earth.

Forthwith Judah invoked the same name, and the wind also suspended him between heaven and earth; and thus both soared round about through the air.

At the sight of these things all were astonished. But Judah again recited the name and seizing the wretch hurled him down to the earth.

Then Jeshu also invoked the name for the purpose of bringing Judah down, and thus they wrestled together.

But Judah seeing that his strength was not equal to that of Jeshu, moistened him with the sweat of his body, wherefore being rendered impure, they were both deprived of the use of the Shem Hamphoras until they were washed.

Then a death sentence was brought against Jeshu, and he was brought up to hear it. If thou wouldst be free, do the things which thou hast been wont to do hitherto.

But Jeshu, when he found himself unable to do them, raised his voice in lamentation, saying, David, my forefather, prophesied concerning me, saying, Yea, for thy sake we are killed all the day long, etc.

When his disciples and the wicked crowd that adhered to him saw these things, being exposed to the danger of death, they fought with the elders and the wise men of Jerusalem, and enabled Jeshu to escape from the city.

So Jeshu went speedily to Jordan; and when he had washed and purified himself, he declared again the name, and repeated his former miracles.

Moreover, he went and took two stones as big as millstones, and made them float upon the water, and seating himself on them he caught fishes before the multitude, which they then did eat.

When the report of this thing reached Jerusalem, all the wise and devout men began to weep, and to say, Who will dare to risk death by going and taking away from this bastard the almighty name? Lo, we pledge ourselves that he shall enjoy eternal happiness.

Then Judah offered himself to go; to whom the wise men said, Go and prosper.

Therefore Judah went in disguise, and mingled among the wicked fellows.

*The portion in parenthesis is probably an interpolation in whole or in part. The widow of Alexander Janneus was named Alexandra. She reigned nine years after the death of her husband. She had two sons named Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, both of whom reigned interruptedly after her, and Hyrcanus was killed by Herod the Great. The interpolator has confounded Queen Alexandria with Queen Helen of Adiabene who was succeeded by her son Monobasus. Helena governed a province of Assyria some 600 miles distant from Jerusalem. She embraced the Jewish faith, and visited Jerusalem about A. D. 45 (Jos. Ant. B. xx. Ch. 2).

CUZIN AMY'Z VEW.

From Punch.

Sceen—The nâborhûd ov Locksley Hall.

Children, leev me here a litl; dōn't disturb me I request.
For mama iz very tired, and fain wûd take a litl rest.
'Tiz the place, the same old place, thō lûking sumwhot pinchit and small.
Ah I 'tiz meny and meny a day since last I lûkt on Locksley Hall!
Then 'twoz in the spring ov life and luv—ah, Luv, the grate Haz-been!
Luv, which, like the yeer'z ōn spring, iz very nice—and very green!
In the spring the new French fashonz cum the female hart tu bles;
In the spring the very housmaid getz herself anuther dres;
In the spring we'r apt tu feel like children just let loos from scool;
In the spring a yung gerl'z fancy'z very apt tu play the fool.
On the moorland, by the wâterz, he woz rēaly very nice;
Ther woz no wun els at hand, and I—forgot mama'z advice.
He indulgd in rōzy rapturez, heevd the most sudjestiv siz,
Sed the very pretyest thingz about my lips and hâsel iz.
All hiz tauk woz most pōetic, all hiz sentimentz wer grand,
Tho hiz meening, I confes, I did not ālwayz understand.
So that when he popt the question, I did blush and hang my hed,
And,—wel, I dare say the rest woz prety much az he haz sed.
But I think that hiz abuse iz rēaly quite too aufuly wârm,
And tu make the mater public woz, I must mentain, bad form.
"Pupet" 's not a prety wurd, and how he runz Sir Rufus down!
Yet a man hoo'z not a pōet need not be a tipsy clown.
Pōet! that's the point presisely. Locksley cûd not comprehend
That a bard may be a bore e'en tu hiz mistres in the end.
Jēniusez are auful wuriz, fûl ov fansyz, fadz, and fits,
And a jēnius for a luver drivez a gerl out ov her witz.
Rapsodyz and rapturez ālwayz form a too excîting diet;
Ther ar mōmentz when a maiden, tho in luv, wûd fain be quiet.
Too hy-strung and too elastic woz poor Locksley'z nōrmal mood,
For a wûman duz not ālwayz wânt tu mone and gush and brood.
Solid fare and holesum fun, if pōets ōnly wud believe,
Are esenshalz in the life of e'en the softer slips ov Eve.
Yes, he called me shalo-harted, servil, fauls, and all the rest;
But if he had not so plāgd me—wel, no dout 'twoz for the best.
True, Sir Rufus iz not lively, but he lets me take my way,
And I doo not feel at prezent drawn tu "sympathize with clay."
Drag me down, indeed! We moov in quite the most exclusive set
In the country. Whot iz thare that I shûd specially regret?
Lockley's fâmus—yes, and maryd notwithstanding hiz fōrce curs,
Tu a dame with lots ov gōld and very litl taste for vers.
Nice tu be a Li m'z Lādy in Sosiety, no dout!
Not so nice tu smooth hiz mane at home when Leo iz put out.
Tauk ov tautrumz! Reed these linez he publisht after—wel, the jilt,
Piching intu poor mama, and charging me with nameless gilt!
Deer mama! I thought her hard—but I'm a muther now myself,
And I no whot uter nonsens iz the pōet's scorn of pelf.
"Old and formal,"—that's the way he pictures me. Extremely kiad!
Coz, if you cûd see me now, you mite a litl change your miad.
"Fâls" and "cōld" ar bad enuf, but "dowdy," that iz downrite rude;
Bardz, for all thare lofty tauk, are not a jentlmanly brood.
Thay've extremely tuchy tempers, and ar very apt tu say
Very nasty thingz indeed, if thay ar not allowed thare way.
"I hav hit en angry fansy." There I reāly think he'z right.
But you see that sort ov thing iz not wûman'z fancy quite.
'Twoz hiz "fansyz" bothered me; and all the stuf that folōz here
May be splendidly pōetic; I shûd call it simply queer.
"Airy navys, purpl piloiz, savage wimen," and the rest!
Why did he not wed a nēgres, if he thaut he'd like it best?
Or if, az he sez, he new hiz wurdz wer nonsens, I wûd ask,
Wherfore uter, pen, and print them? 'Twoz a most superfluus task!
"Wûman iz the leser man!" I hōld that fauls az it iz hard.
The most wûmanish ov creeturez surely iz an angry bard.
Yet, sumtimez, when, az at prezent, spring iz britening all the land,
Cumz that longing for the feeldz Sir Rufus cannot understand;
Cumz a gōstly sort ov dout if ee'n sosiety can giv
All, quite all, for which a wel-luvd wûman mite dezire tu liv;
Cumz a memory ov hiz vois, a recolecshon of hiz glance,
Thauts ov thingz which then had power tu make a maiden's pulsez dance;
Cumz—but I'm extremely stupid. Wel, I no if our deer Fan
Tak a fansy to a pōet, I shûd soon dismis the man.
Here she cumz! She'l wed, I hope, rich Vicount Vivian ere the fall.
She'd ne'er hav had that chance had I espouzd the Lord ov Locksley Hall!

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 47.

GREAT JEHOVAH: Are we not to conclude that thy Son was unable to know the character of Judas when he chose him for a disciple, or that knowing just what he was, Judas was necessary to carry out the scheme of salvation and redemption which thyself and thy son had previously devised in heaven?

Is it not a fact that the part that Judas played in the great drama was equally as important as any other part of it? Was it not necessary that Jesus should have been betrayed, and without it would the scheme have been complete? If that is so, should not praise and thanks be extended to Judas instead of curses and maledictions?

For the same reason did not Caiaphas, Pontius Pilate, and the Roman soldiers who crucified him also play a most important part? If they aided so much in carrying out thy heavenly purpose, should they not be revered as saints instead of their memory being loaded with opprobrium?

If the crucifixion was an essential part of the divine drama, which could not be omitted without the whole scheme of the world's salvation proving a failure, may we inquire whether it was thou who didst induce Judas, Pilate, and the soldiers to do what they did, or was it the devil who instigated them to do the deed?

If the devil did aid thee by using his influence in the grand business, is he not as much to be praised for the perfection of the plan of salvation as thy son or any other individual connected with it?

If one cog had been left out of the divine wheel, would not the entire machinery have proved a failure? Is not then each and every cog to be adored alike as the most lovable and praiseworthy of all devices and inventions?

Is it not a little singular that the accounts of the conduct and death of Judas should be so differently told by the two writers in thy holy book?

Does not Matthew say that when Judas felt condemned for the perfidious part he had played, he cast down at the feet of the chief priests the thirty pieces of silver which he had received for betraying Jesus, and immediately went out and hanged himself, while the writer of the Acts states it very differently, saying Judas bought a field with the money, whereupon he fell headlong and burst asunder in his midst, and all his bowels gushed out?

If it was true that he hanged himself, why did not the writer of the Acts say something about it? If it was not true, why did Mathew say it was true?

If it was true that he fell headlong and all his bowels gushed out, why did not Matthew say something about that?

Is it by any means a common circumstance when a person falls for his bowels to gush out? Was an instance of the kind ever known? If it was true of Judas, were not the integuments of his body extremely tender?

If both the statements are true, which event should have the precedence? Did he hang himself before his bowels gushed out, or afterwards?

Was not either mode of death sufficient to answer the purpose without resorting to the other?

As a man would hardly hang himself after his bowels had all gushed out, or his bowels would hardly gush out after he had been hanged, is it not a pity that such a wide divergence from the truth was made by one or both of thy writers?

Are people to be doomed to hell for not believing that Matthew and the Acts' writer both told the truth about that Judas episode? If they should think that one or both failed to tell the truth, shall they be condemned for it to eternal torture?

Does not Luke say that Jesus, before his crucifixion, was arrested by the chief priests and elders in person, and does not Matthew say the chief priests and elders remained with Caiaphas, the high priest, while they sent an armed multitude to arrest Jesus?

Does not Luke (xxii, 2), say the chief priests were afraid to arrest Jesus because of the people who were friendly to him? and does not Matthew say Pilate was afraid to release Jesus for fear of the people? (Matt. xxvii, 22, 23, and 25).

Does not Mark say he was crucified on Friday, and on the day of the Passover, and yet is it not true that the Passover, according to the established rule among the Jews, never came on Friday?

Is there not a discrepancy as to the place where Jesus was crucified? Does not Matthew say it was Golgotha, while Luke says it was Calvary?

Is there not a disagreement as to what were the last words of Jesus as he gave up the ghost? According to Mark, were they not, "My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" according to Luke, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit;" according to John, "It is finished," while Matthew does not say that he uttered any last words?

Does not John say the body of Jesus was embalmed after his crucifixion, while according to Mark and Luke it was not the case?

Is it not to be regretted that so many discrepancies and contradictions should exist in the book which thy followers declare that thou didst write?

Have not nearly all the various books constituting the Scriptures, at one time or another, been discarded or disbelieved by those who professed to be thy people?

Did not the sect of Pharisees among the Jews accept only the five books of Moses and reject all the prophets?

Did not the Marcionites in the early Christian centuries reject the books of Moses and the prophets, introducing other writings in their stead?

Did not the Marcionites also repudiate the Old Testament in its entirety as spurious and bad, and did they not neglect the four Gospels and the Epistles of St. Paul on the same plea?

Did not Carpocrates and his followers likewise reject the whole of the Old Testament, and also maintain that Jesus was only a man like other men?

Did not the Ebionites admit Matthew's Gospel, but neglect the three others, and also the Epistles of Paul?

Did not the Manicheans write a gospel of their own, and neglect the writings of the prophets and the apostles?

Did not the Etzaites put forth a certain book which they affirmed came from heaven, and did they not discard the books of the Scriptures?

Did not Origen, the early Christian Father, invent some rambling allegories and silly stories, calculated to bring discredit upon the Scriptures? Did he not go so far as to falsify and corrupt some of the principal points of doctrine?

Did not the Alogians attribute to the heretic Corinthus the Gospel and Apocalypse of St. John, and for this reason neglect them?

In short was not the authenticity and divinity of the books of the Bible knocked about, credited and discredited alternately, for several centuries before it was decided whichwere thy Word and which not?

Was it not true that within the first three Christian centuries many pagan notions, rites, and ceremonies were introduced into thy Church, and have they not been retained to the present time?

In fact, are not all the dogmas, rites, and ceremonies in the Christian Church of pagan origin?

We have asked about the Trinity, the idea of incarnation, of the virgin and child, and asked thee if not almost every pagan nation held to them. Is it not strictly true?

Is not the symbol of the cross far older than Christianity?

Were not monasteries built in the mountains of Asia centuries before the Christian era?

Is not the doctrine of devils and hell far older than Christianity?

Has not the doctrine of the immortality of the soul been taught for thousands of years?

Were not the rites of Baptism and the sacrament of the Eucharist believed in by the ancient pagans?

Did not the pagans have their saints and worship them long before Christians existed?

Didst thou approve of the persecutions which thy Church practiced and kept up for many centuries?

Didst thou approve of the operations of the Inquisition, the auto da fé, and the numerous modes of torture and death which thy Church practiced to portray thy love to the human family?

If thou didst not approve of this cruel persecution, and if it was thy will that they should not take place, why didst thou not interfere, and put an end to such outrageous conduct?

Would one not be justified in thinking that thou either didst not care for the sufferings which thy offspring were forced to endure, or that thou didst not have the power to lessen their wretchedness?

Are not millions of thy creatures left by thee to get along through this weary world the best way they can without the appearance any direct assistance from thy all-powerful hand?

Is it at all strange that human beings, when suffering the pangs of hunger, the agonies of sickness and disease, the cruelties inflicted by enemies, and the thousands of instances where wretchedness and unhappiness are visited upon them, and they look to thee for aid and succor, and they cry to thee in vain, should conclude that thou wast deaf or powerless, or indifferent to their sufferings?

Have those in the Christian faith, who claim that they are specially thy children and immediately under thy approving smiles, really any greater proofs of thy presence, of thy kindness and thy favor, than those who make no profession of being under thy protection, or of belonging to thy select number?

Is the claim true which thy Christian followers make when they assert that their system is divine, on the ground of its extensive prevalence over the world, and that more have believed in its doctrines than in other creeds?

Is not such a claim totally unfounded? Are there not as many Brahminists in the world as Christians; nearly as many Mohammedans, and three or four times as many Buddhists?

If the number of Christians proves their system to be divine, is not Buddhism supereminently divine?

Is not the claim, too, that Christianity has been the caus of civilization in the world an untruthful one? Did not southern Europe have a better state of civilization five centuries prior to the Christian era than it had for ten centuries subsequent to that time?

Was not superstition, bigotry, intolerance, darkness, persecution, and all the attending evils the rule in the Christian Church for a thousand years after it became a political power?

Did not civilization together with the arts and sciences come more from the unbelievers of Arabia than from a Christian source, and did not education and civilization come into vogue more in spite of the Church than by its help and good will?

Did not the leaders and rulers of the Church struggle for centuries to keep back education, mental liberty, and general intelligence, and has not the system, with its powerful priesthood, been the strongest barrier to overcome which they have ever met with?

Does not the very existence of intelligence, mental culture, and free schools for all classes have a stronger tendency to exterminate the mists and fogs of superstition and baseless creeds than any other known influences?

Does the sun shine any brighter, the rains fall any gentler, the breezes play any pleasanter upon those who believe in thee, in the divinity of thy son, and the infallibility of thy Scriptures than upon the believers in Brahma, Buddha, Allah, Mumbo Jumbo, or no God at all.

If a believer and an unbeliever have each a farm of good land side by side, the first praying to thee morning, noon, and night, and drawing down a long face whenever thy name is mentioned, the second making no prayers, and keeping a cheerful countenance, plowing deeply, cultivating thoroughly will not the unbeliever have equally as good crops, as much grass to the acre, and as much corn to put into his crib as the long-faced prayer maker and devout believer?

If two ships start together to cross the ocean, the one an old, leaky, rotten craft, but with a praying captain and a praying crew, the captain of the other ship a firm believer in the laws of nature and in the superiority of reason over superstition, but an unbeliever in revealed religion, supernaturalism, and special providences, with a crew of the same character, if a storm arises and a terrific gale drives the ships before it for twenty-four hours, will not the unbelievers, in the firm, staunch ship, be much safer than the praying band in the dilapidated old hulk?

Are the forces of nature, the action of the universe, the motions of the earth and the heavenly bodies, the fertility of the soil, the intensity of the sun's rays, the depth of rainfall, the fury of storms, the changes of climates, the ebbing and flowing of tides, affected even in the slightest degree by belief or disbelief in the Christian religion?

Can prayer and praise, long faces, and self-righteousness, have any more favorable effect upon thee than practical common sense and an intelligent reliance upon the laws of the universe, with a total disregard of fables, myths, and superstitions?

In view of the fact that the universe moves along regardless of opinions and creeds, and that even gods and redeemers make no apparent difference in the operations of nature or in the happiness and destiny of man, could not the superstitious belief in gods and demigods, in virgins and immaculate conceptions, in devils and demons, in hells and purgatories, with all that the creeds imply, be omitted or dropped without the slightest damage to any of the human race?

Has not god-making been an occupation that ignorant, superstitious man, led by a wily, interested priesthood, has kept up in the world far too long, and could they not now be dispensed with without the slightest damage to any party concerned?

Have not gods, religions, and creeds made a great deal of trouble for the human race, leading to wars, massacres, carnage, and bloodshed enough to saturate the entire earth with blood, or sufficient to make an ocean that would float every vessel in the world? Would it not have been far better for the human race had it had far less of gods, far less of devils and ghosts, but more of love and sympathy for the human family?

Is not man better employed in doing acts of kindness and good will to his fellow beings than in spending his hours, his days, and weeks in offering oblations and adoration to an unknown and incomprehensible God, located somewhere above the clouds?

Is it not about time that the world made a change, and devote far less effort in trying to find out what will please the gods, and more to finding out how to make those around him better and happier?

Are not science, education, and civilization, doing greater good in the world to-day than all the blind creeds, all the blind faith in all the personal gods that have ever held rule in the world?

Is it not about the best thing the men and women of the world can do to store their minds with useful knowledge, to become better and better acquainted with the laws of their being and of the universe around them, and drop, with as little delay as possible, all the religious creeds, all the rites and ceremonies, all the faith in priests and bibles, all the allegiance to myths and fables, that the race has indulged in for the last five thousand years?

Great Jehovah, possibly we owe thee an apology. We have detained thee and importuned thee now for a long time; but we trust we have not seriously offended thee. We greatly doubt if anything puny man can say will have a serious or unpleasant effect upon thee. We hope thou hast taken no offense at the plainness or persistence of our inquiries, for thou hast said thou wouldst be entreated of.

We have not put these questions to thee in a mere idle or irreverent spirit. The inquiries made have been upon such subjects as need light in the view of the sons of men.

We trust our desires are duly appreciated, and we would be glad to receive replies to our inquiries whenever thou canst make it convenient to vouchsafe such replies. The world needs far more light upon theological and natural subjects, and it behooves all to keep a spirit of inquiry and investigation. We trust thou wilt cast no impediments in the way of our increasing our knowledge.

On some future occasion we may address thee again, when we doubt not we will be accorded as patient a hearing as we have now been favored with.

Accept our thanks for the undisturbed state of mind thou hast evinced through the long interview we have troubled thee with. We have been pleased to know thou hast maintained an unruffled spirit toward us, and that thou hast shown no disposition to do us the slightest injury.

Hoping that light and knowledge and health and happiness may spread and increase among all of earth's children, and that all the gods and devils may retire to a state of happy rest and blissful quietude through all coming time, I reverently subscribe myself, Devoutly thine,

A. TRUTH SEEKER.

Three More Questions.

LEEDS, N. Y., June 5, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Allow me to express my thanks to you for your information accorded me in your issue of June 1st. If I am not taking up too much space in your paper, I would like to ask a few more questions.

1. I am led to infer from the tone of your remarks that although deistical in your belief, still you are not an Atheist. Now if you believe in a supreme being, and his omnipotence, how did you become possessed of that knowledge? Was it an idea of your own, that there existed such a being, or did you get your idea of God from the study of the Christian Bible?

2. You admit in a former number that religion existed before the Bible was written, and therefore the Bible was not necessary to establish a religion. Now, your doubts about the inspiration of that Bible, as I understand you, are the frequent contradictions which occur therein, and seemingly impossible miracles which are said to have taken place. I will admit that looked at without an eye of faith, they do appear very doubtful, still in the translation from the original Greek, the translators may have confounded the manuscripts, which, if read in their mother tongue would no doubt explain and make clear to us what now seems almost impossible.

3. Admitting that the Christian religion is as fallible as other religions seem to be, are not the believers in that religion as well satisfied and just as happy in their belief as they would be by sustaining Infidelity? And is it not a good maxim to let well enough alone?

A man most assuredly will live as good a life professing Christianity as he would Infidelity. And by living up to the former, he at death would acquire the benefits resulting from such a cause, whereas by adopting the latter he is irrevocably lost if the former is true. Hoping I do not intrude in my numerous questions, I remain most respectfully yours, WM. H. PINDAR.

REPLY.—1. We readily believe in everything that we are convinced has an existence. When proofs are placed before us of the existence of a God, we shall at once believe in him. Up to this time we have received no such proof, and consequently we are an unbeliever. We believe in the universe because we see it everywhere around us. Its material and its powers and forces are made apparent to us every hour of our lives. No man for a moment can doubt the existence of the universe. It is not so with God, whether he be called Brahm, Jupiter, Odin, or Mumbo Jumbo. Nobody has ever seen him, and nobody knows the first thing about him. What men think they know about him has come from what somebody told them, and that somebody obtained it from somebody else, and all were equally ignorant. So long as the forces of this universe are capable of performing all that is accomplished there seems to be no use for a God, and nothing for him to do. He is a redundancy, devised by ignorant, superstitious man, of which there appears to be not the slightest need. Our friend will be entirely justified in counting us an Atheist.

2. Yes, numerous religions existed in the world before the Jewish Bible was written, and to say the least, they were quite as good as the religion practiced by the believers of that book. The Bible, then, was not necessary to establish a religion, but only the special one founded upon it. Our doubts as to the inspiration of the Bible arise from a want of proof. It is not enough for us that somebody says it was written by the finger of God, or that he dictated it. Something more convincing is necessary. Before it can be accepted as the work of a God it must be shown superior to what man can accomplish. If gods can do no better than men, they are entitled to no higher credit. The Bible presents no evidence of being superior to human power, but, on the other hand, it is so full of errors and imperfections of many kinds that we are forced to the conclusion that it was produced by crude, ignorant, and unscientific minds. Some of its poetry does very well considering the age in which it was written, but it has been surpassed in later years. Its narratives, its history, its science, and its morals are very defective. We simply take it just as it is and accord no more credit to it than it deserves. It is unjust to apply the "eye of faith" or any other instrument to magnify it into something that it really is not. In many respects it has been surpassed by the bibles of other nations, some of which were written at an earlier date. If it is liable to be distorted and perverted by translators, transcribers, and printers it is another proof that it is not unlike other human productions. If God took the trouble to write it or to dictate it, it would seem but reasonable that he should look after it a little, and keep men from changing it and spoiling it.

3. All religions are fallible, all contain myths, fables, and superstitions which are held up to the world as divine truths. All religions are of human production. None has ever existed in the world superior to human origin. There is not in existence the slightest proof that a god ever had anything to do with any of them. Possibly Christians are about as well satisfied with their religion as other believers are with theirs. It is quite natural for every one to think his own a little the best; but on some accounts the Christian religion is not the happiest. It has the most angry and cruel God, the meanest and most malicious devil, and the hottest and most everlasting hell. There may be some religions worse than Christianity, but it is hard to find them. There are evidently some that have been better, far less tyrannical, bloodthirsty, and murderous. As truth is far better than falsehood, it is always greatly to be preferred. Even if truth is called Infidelity, it is greatly superior to superstition and blind delusion. There is no man happier in his belief than he who discards fables, mysticisms, and supernaturalisms, and accepts the truths of the universe and lives in obedience to its laws—who regards humanity as the highest intellect and who does all in his power to improve it.

It would be well were the first proposition in your last paragraph true. Unfortunately it is not. Christians in the parts—and that is where we should look—have not lead as good lives as the heathens or Infidels. Christianity has shed far more blood and taken for more life than all the other religions combined. It has made a hell here upon earth in every deed.

We fail to see where Christians have any advantage over Infidels. The belief that men and women are going to heaven upon the merits of another individual is a fallacious one, and in the sequel will undoubtedly prove so. The Infidel who depends upon his own good deeds and in living a good life occupies the safer ground, whether in life or at the hour of death. Infidels have far less fear of death and the devil than have Christians, and consequently they are happier. The greatest horror in the world is the continous dread of an unmerciful God, a torturing devil and an ever-yawning, ever-burning hell. These are the Christian's portion, and he is entirely welcome to them if he wants them. The Infidel has no use for anything of the kind.

We hope Mr. Pindar may be able to come out of the darkness of superstition and error into the broad sunlight of science, reason, and truth. Let him continue to inquire and to investigate; we will cheerfully try to know such questions as he may wish to ask.

Comstock and Abbot.

When the facts are kept in view that Comstock has been a great annoyance to many people, of at least average merit; that he has shown a morbid eagerness to arrest and tyrannize over his fellow-citizens whom he could reach with his power; that he obtained in a surreptitious manner, by intrigue and undue influence from the Young Men's Christian Association, the enactment of unconstitutional and oppressive laws for which there was not the slightest necessity; that he has resorted to the most detestable duplicity, intrigue, and falsehood to seduce unsuspecting persons into the commission of a crime or a violation of his own laws that he might be able to destroy them; that he will descend to do what no honorable man would stoop to, and that his Society for the Suppression of Vice sustains him in his disgraceful occupation it is indeed a wonder how the cultured editor of a high-toned Liberal journal is able to approve of him, of the laws he caused to be enacted or of any portion of his villainous course. It seems, however, to be so, and that he is willing to load with obloquy the seventy thousand honest persons who asked that the Comstock laws should be removed from the statutes of our country or be so modified as not to be destructive of the dearest rights of American citizens.

To assure our readers that those laws were wholly uncalled for, and that there was no necessity for them, it is only necessary to repeat that the previously-existing laws were fully adequate to the suppression of obscene publications. It was under the old laws and altogether before the Comstock laws of 1873, that all the vile books were seized and withdrawn from the market, and none others of the kind have since been thrown upon it. It only required a slight effort and slight vigilance to remove from circulation all that kind of vileness and to prevent men from engaging in its production.

There is just about as much need for enacting a law that men shall not jump off the earth into open space and drop behind, while the orb speeds on its way at the rate of 60,000 miles an hour, as to enact those called the Comstock laws. If the previous laws were capable of affording all the protection, and of using all the surveillance necessary, where was the necessity of passing other laws, where the necessity of converting the U. S. Courts into an American Inquisition, and where the justice and honesty in denouncing those who asked that such laws be set aside? What possible virtue is there in keeping useless, redundant laws upon our statute books? All that is needed is such laws as are necessary, and more than that is an evil? Every citizen in the country certainly has the right to ask for the repeal of useless and mischievous laws without being denounced therefor.

Comstock has recently asserted over his own name in several of the dailies, as well as in private conversation, that he acts by the direct approval of a committee of his Society, and that he makes no arrests except by their orders. It follows, then, that his society is responsible for his recent visit to the house of prostitution, 224 Greene street, accompanied by five other men, one of whom was his companion in holiness, Joseph A. Britton, and some of the others members of his society, when by offering a considerable sum of money he induced three of the frail inmates to expose their nakedness to the six men, and all that he might drag them off to prison and add a little to his fame and prestige. This is either the case or Comstock has been guilty of the basest falsehood. His Christian society can take which horn of the dilemma they prefer. Some of our friends are anxious to know whether Mr. Abbot approves of this last act of Comstock. We can hardly think he does. We cannot think he deems such conduct respectable, though, upon logical grounds, if he approves of Comstock's laws and acts in one instance, it would seem that he also ought to favor his acts in another. The question may arise in Mr. Abbot's mind how much Mr. Comstock's conduct on Greene street ought to be "modified," or whether it should be "totally repealed." We are inclined to think the cultured editor will come to the decision that he has not added materially to his reputation by championing Comstock's laws or acts!

Close of the First Half of Vol. V.

This number completes the first half of the present volume, and we take this occasion to say to those who are a year or so in arrears, and who seem to think that they are under no obligation to pay for the paper we have so long and so patiently been sending them, that we are now compelled to take their names from our list. We do this with great reluctance, for it is almost painful even under instructions to erase the name of one who has been reading the paper for a long time, but we are compelled to this course. We cannot continue to send the paper week after week, month after month, and year after year, unless we are paid for it. Every page, every column, and even every line costs us money, and every ounce of the paper upon which it is printed, has to be paid for. If friends continue to take it, but decline to pay their arrears, even when invited to do so, they are helping to crush the paper to the earth, and if all should do as some do, it would take but a very short time to bring us to the dust. It is the little remittances which come in day by day that keep us in action, and enable us to issue the struggling TRUTH SEEKER. If these are shut off, we must stop.

May we not once more ask those in arrears to remit us the amount due up to date, and inform us whether they wish the paper longer or not? We have resolved to struggle on and do the best we can, and we only hope the friends of the cause of truth will not suffer our efforts to fail.

We are still anxious to receive the names of new patrons. We are still sending the paper to new subscribers three months for fifty cents. Regular price, $3.00 per year, or 25 cents per month. Let new names flow in, and let those in arrears "square up."

The Champions of the Church.

After months of hard toil and close application, with the expenditure of a good deal of money, this volume, of over eleven hundred pages, is at length completed; and now we would be glad to place a copy of it in the library or on the centre table of every patron of our paper. It is the largest and finest book yet issued by us, and is really cheap at the low price of $3.00, post paid. We have not received as many orders for it as we should have done; but now, that the work is completed, we hope the orders may come in more lively. Every order we receive brings a smile to our countenance, because we know every patron will receive his full money's worth. Over eighty pages are given to the character and career of the Christian persecutor, Anthony Comstock. How many are willing to make us smile?

WE HAVE at length brought to a close our "Interrogatories to Jehovah. We have not received very clear responses to our numerous inquiries, and probably it is quite as well that we all now take a rest. A book of over 250 pages, containing all these interrogatories, will be issued in a few days, when we will be able to fill the orders already received for the volume, and it will bring happiness to us to receive a thousand more orders. Price, in paper covers, 50 cts; cloth 75 cts., postage paid. Cheap as dirt! Who does not want a copy of the "Interrogatories to Jehovah"?

AS WE go to press, Dr. Sara B. Chase has caused the necessary processes to be issued and served for the arrest of Anthony Comstock for damages sustained by her from his unwarranted interference with her business. She proposes to test the question whether he has the right to enter her house and take her person and property without the shadow of right, and whether he can take it upon himself to rummage and ransack her property and effects without a search-warrant or the shadow of right or justification. We hope that justice may be done.

COL BUNDY, the genial editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, recently paid a visit to our city and honored us with several calls. We were truly glad to see his smiling face, and hope his days may be long in the land.

Religion not History.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

"Whereas there is among you envying and strife and divisions, are you not carnal?" asks the apostle Paul in our received version. No doubt, envy belongs to a low, a carnal state, if that were his meaning; but zeal is his very word, and elsewhere he says that it is good to be zealous in a good cause. The Sinaitic version omits divisions, yet the idea is undoubtedly implied by the context. Let us again ask, "Whence come zealous strife and schisms in religion?" Is it always from the baser part of man? Accumulated and undoubted facts point to a widely different cause, which was not imagined by the apostles. Strife and division are inevitable when men confound History with Religion. When this is done, strife arises not only among unspiritual men, but among the noblest saints; because in history it is a very arduous task to discover truth, and very few men are competent for it, or ever were. Religious character gives no aid whatever. Only in long time, by much collective experience and combined efforts, do men make a moderate progress towards discriminating in history truth from fiction, or certain from uncertain statements; and a majority of men are slow to discover incongruities in narratives presented to us as historical. Few indeed are aware how difficult the task is apt to be, when the facts alleged concern distant ages and foreign countries; and how many precautions are needed for truth. What the earliest philosophic historian among the Greeks complained of is still prevalent; men are "very un-painstaking" in their research of truth in history. The simplicity which is amiable in children, who readily accept as true whatever they are told, and never criticise it, is predominant with the vast mass of adults. Moreover men, like children, love wonderful stories, and most reluctantly unlearn belief of marvels which they have been taught from childhood, whether in Roman or in Hebrew history. Sharp disputes among learned professors abound, and are not likely to be settled, concerning the early Greek and Roman tales, and the trustworthiness of their vouchers. Of necessity similar doubts, similar disputes and strifes, arise concerning Hebrew narratives. The Greek Hercules and most of his wonderful exploits used to be received with unhesitating belief; but modern experience of human credulity regards every deed distinctly ascribed to Hercules as highly doubtful, and at most admits that there was probably in the royal family of Mycenæ a man of great strength, whom the king feared, and therefore sent into dangerous enterprises in hope of destroying him. Nay, we find that critics like Aristotle preceded us in like incredulity, even doubting whether Orpheus ever existed. Keen divisions of opinion concerning alleged distant events are a natural and necessary result, so long as men differ in acuteness, in specific knowledge, and in experience of the world and of literature. While we are in strife about Theseus and Romulus, it surely is very unreasonable to suppose that piety can guide us and reconcile us concerning Moses or Samuel or St. Peter. Men cannot be divided into two classes, as pious and impious, by investigating what they believe, or what opinions they form, concerning historical statements. Religion is concerned with the permanent, unchangeable relations of God to the human race. As God remains ever the same, and the nature of man is not changed, religion cannot change with human events, any more than physiology. Great teachers may arise in either, and by their aid the knowledge of either may have advanced; but the teachers do not alter the human body, or the relations of God to man, whatever light they cast on them. Euclid and Archimedes may have sharpened and extended geometry, but neither their lives nor their agency can form an essential part of the science of geometry. So if Jehoiada or Isaiah and divers unknown Psalmists advanced spiritual religion in Jerusalem, their history does not any the more enter into religion; nor can it ever be a test of piety to know or care for their history. No historical events, however true, can possibly constitute a part of religion, so as to make the belief of them vital to religious character.

To this we must expect the reply, that an inspired and infallible narrative has been granted to us (in the Four Gospels) concerning Jesus of Nazareth; and that faith consists in believing it without criticism, or at least in believing the miraculous core of the narrative after criticism; and that the rejecting of divine testimony is an impiety. Let us try to examine this question to the bottom. What reason can be assigned for ascribing to four (or, with the Acts of the Apostles, five) books of narrative such a divine origination or oversight, that they can deserve the grandiloquent title, Divine Testimony?

No thoughtful man ought to listen a moment to the argument that our acceptance of the four gospels as a unique and infallible guide ought to rest, not on criticism and detailed examination, but on the testimony of the Catholic Church. For that argument presupposes that either a miscellaneous multitude called the Church, or a select portion of it known also as Doctors, has a divine right and ability to guarantee to us that the four gospels are divinely written, and therefore true. But when we ask how we are to know that the Church has or had any such right and ability, we are gravely referred to the four gospels as proving it. And how proving it? Why (it seems), Matthew says, "Hear the Church;" and John says that "when the Comforter shall come, he shall teach you all things." Now if these quotations or any others were at all to the point, if even they defined the Church, and the four gospels made it all clear, it is still obvious to reply, that to rest the authority of the four gospels or other scriptures on the Church, and the authority of the Church on the four gospels or these same scriptures, is a style of argument of which a child could hardly be guilty; which an untutored peasant would see to be ridiculous. Archdeacon Paley was far too sensible a man to encumber his Evidences of Christianity with such trash.

Nor only so, but when we ask proof of the fact, that the Church has pronounced these narratives to be miraculously written and infallibly true, we are referred, as the earliest authority, to a Christian bishop called Irenæus, who belongs to the latter half of the second century. This Irenæus was a diligent collector of apostolic traditions, and is much relied on as a prime witness to the canon of Holy Writ, which excluded various gospels as false, and admitted four as divine. The Rev. Dr. Conyers Middleton instructively* lays before us specimens of the absurdities which this Father and Pillar of the Church propounds as sacred truth. It is here chiefly to the purpose to quote Irenæus's reasons why there are four gospels and only four. "It is impossible," he says, "that there could have been more or less than four. For there are four climates, and four cardinal winds, and the Church is spread over the whole earth; but the gospel is the pillar and foundation of the Church, and its breath of life. The Church therefore was to have four pillars, blowing immortality from every quarter, and giving life to men, etc." Enough of such wisdom.

But a little earlier than Irenæus, Justin the Martyr wrote under the Antonines his controversial works, which are accounted a valuable testimony concerning the gospels. Yet, often as he quotes or seems to quote them, he never names them apart, nor shows himself aware that they come from four writers (a matter so cardinal with Irenæus), but vaguely refers to them by the title, "Memorials of the Apostles;" so that when he seems to quote rather inaccurately (say) from our Matthew, we cannot be sure but that he is quoting from some other of the many narratives to which our Luke alludes; perhaps from the preaching of Peter, or the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Even if our four gospels certainly had a separate existence before Justin, we have no security whatever that they did not receive additions and changes even after the death of Justin. Indeed there are special verses and passages which strongly savor of later interpolation, even in Matthew; but to digress on this topic would be out of place. Here it must be observed that the canon of the New Testament now received in Protestant churches is not identical with that of these "Fathers" of the Church. Justin insists strongly on the divine authority of two books called the Sibyl and Hystaspes, in which he is followed by other Fathers; while learned Protestant divines of our most "orthodox" school treat these books as certainly forgeries of the Christians. The gospel called the Preaching of Peter (says the learned Dr. Conyers Middleton) is often cited as genuine by Clement (of Alexandria), by Origen, and other Fathers. The "Shepherd" of Hermas was widely current as Holy Scripture, so was the epistle of Barnabas; books which we now justly despise; which indeed the moral sentiment of the Churches at length rejected.

Moreover, to those who accept the epistles of Paul as genuine, it ought to be manifest and unquestionable that during the whole career of Paul not only were no narratives of the life and teachings of Jesus written, but they were not searched after as important or desirable. In all these epistles, numerous as they are and various their topics, we do not find that Paul himself knew or cared to know any details concerning the moral precepts of Jesus or concerning his human life. Once, indeed, he cites a ceremonial ordinance, the institution of the Lord's supper; and the knowledge of this he professes to have received "from the Lord," not from any of the eleven human witnesses. He even tells the Galatians that he purposely kept aloof from the apostles (who alone could give him historical information on these matters), lest he should compromise the independence of his apostleship, and owe something to them. Nor does he ever recommend his converts to learn from the Jerusalem teachers any details concerning the human Jesus. What is more, he never cites† any moral precepts of Jesus, even when it would aid and confirm his own argument. From all this it is clear, that Paul, nearly as much as the present writer, was possessed with a sense that history could not be religion. Matters of contemporary, notoriety, such as that Jesus lived, was crucified and died, he probably would not reckon as history, and certainly did not allow that their belief rested on erudition. With miracles wrought by Jesus he betrays no acquaintance whatever. Those great miracles wrought upon Jesus—the Resurrection and Ascension—Paul of course did not refer to the domain of history, but believed in them partly from internal vision, when he was caught up into the third heaven and heard unspeakable words, partly by his own exposition of the Hebrew Scriptures. Thus he was quite independent of history. When he presses as a practical argument, "Even Christ pleased not himself," he proceeds to show us the source of his knowledge, viz., not testimony of the men who had watched the conduct of Jesus, but his own interpretation of Psalm lxix, 9. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

*Middleton's Free Inquiry, pp. 44–54.

†That is, never in Paul's own epistles; though in the narrative of Acts xx. 35, Paul is represented as quoting words of Jesus; beautiful words indeed: "It is more blessed to give than to receive." It is the more remarkable that these words do not appear in any of the four gospels.

MR. TRUESDELL'S REPLY TO HIS CRITICS.

In economic science it is not to be expected that all persons will draw precisely the same conclusions even from the same acknowledged facts; therefore as just and fair criticism should be accepted by all economists as a friendly aid to them in arriving at the exact truth. But when one writer essays to destoy the logic of another regardless of preponderating historical evidence against him, it would seem to the casual reader a wanton waste of time to reply. The question of our national finances, however, at this particular epoch when the wildest schemes of inflation are rife among the people, is of such importance that it behooves every true citizen who has any practical idea of political economy to contribute his mite of experience or historical information towards exposing the mischief of an irredeemable currency, this most deadly of all political evils that can befall a nation.

With this apology for trespassing further upon the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will now consider the article appearing in the 23d number over the signature of J. R. Parks.

It is a little singular that a man of Mr. Parks' apparent intelligence should attempt to support the doctrine of inflation by referring to the people of ancient Sparta. The Spartans were anything but good financiers; they were emphatically a warlike race, despising commerce and all other elevating pursuits; nearly all of their boasted gains were plundered from other tribes at the point of the sword. Under the iron rule of Lycurgus, it is true, they were enabled for a time to maintain in circulation a token money of comparatively little intrinsic worth, but how long did this last? Only so long as their warriors were successful in the battle fields. When their armies failed their iron money failed also. According to the New American Cyclopedia they were a mere handful of people, "from the era of the Persian war, when Herodotus estimated their number at 8,000, to the time of Agis IV., when they had dwindled down to 700, of whom 100 alone possessed most of the landed property of the State."

It is passing strange that any intelligent person should attempt to sustain the theory of a paper monetary standard by referring to France when her entire financial history points to the opposite conclusion. Let those who are unacquainted with this subject read the history of John Law's wild financial schemes in France from 1716 to 1726, which finally made bankrupt the whole nation, leaving the great bulk of real property in the hands of a few individuals while the masses were reduced to beggary. Still later, in the year 1789, the French government again abandoned her coin standard, issuing an irredeemable paper currency, the famous assignat, which was proclaimed by law a full legal tender for all debts both public and private. The 1,200,000,000 francs in assignats of the first issue were quoted at the Bourse in Paris at 90 per cent of their nominal value until 1792, when they began to rapidly decline. Three years later the volume of outstanding notes had increased to over 5,000,000 000 francs, while their purchasing power had declined to one fifth the value represented. From this point the decline was so rapid that the price of assignats soon ceased to be quoted at the Bourse, and the rich property owners repudiated them entirely. In 1796, nearly the whole volume of worthless paper promises were found in the hands of the laboring class, who were forced through their poverty to accept assignats to the last, while a few individuals who had unloaded the burdens upon the unsuspecting poor were in possession of all of the real wealth of the nation.

This is the history of inflation the world over. The rich men are invariably made richer, while the deluded poor are cruelly defrauded of what little they already possess.

If the early financial history of France does not prove consoling to the irredeemable currency advocates, surely her present condition will not comfort them. To-day she stands without a rival in financial prosperity, and why? Because she holds more specie in her vaults, as compared to her paper circulation, and more specie per capita, than any other nation on the globe.

A glance at the latest official statement of her public debt must reveal the fact to the wildest inflationist that the bulwarks of her great financial power lies in the four hundred million dollars of coin and bullion in the government coffers.

If any nation ever based their paper circulation upon a coin reserve, it is France. From the year 1868, when the Bank of France held 983,000,000 francs in coin, to the present time, her coin and bullion reserve has steadily increased in amount, except in 1872 and 1873, during war with Germany, when about 250,000,000 francs were withdrawn.

In March, 1874, the bank held 1,028,000,000 francs in coin; in 1875 this had been increased to 1,530,000,000; in 1876 to 1,875,000,000; and in 1877 the coin reserve of the Bank of France exceeded 2,000,000,000 francs.

The latest official statement of the public debt of France, May 31, 1878, shows that the entire paper currency circulating in France to-day amounts to 2,307,000,000 francs, against 2,508,000,000 in May 31, 1877, showing a contraction of the currency in one year of 201,000,000 francs, while their coin and bullion reserve has increased to 2,090,000,000 francs—over ninety per cent of their immediate liabilities.

What an exhibit this is in comparison with our own government finances! In January, 1878, according to official report of the Secretary of the Treasury, our government paper currency (not including over $300,000,000 in national bank notes) was $370,000,000, with less than $140,000,000 of specie in the vaults of the treasury, or about thirty per cent of immediate liabilities.

A recapitulation of the financial condition of the two nations, shows our entire paper circulation, including national bank notes and fractional currency, over fifteen dollars per capita, sustained by thirty per cent of the amount in specie, while France has a paper circulation of only ten dollars and eighty-five cents per capita,* sustained by more than ninety per cent in coin and bullion.

Another striking illustration of the evil effects of an imaginary monetary standard is presented in the history of Russia. In 1769, the government tried to force an irredeemable paper currency upon her people. The first issue of 200,000,000 rubles in assignations were maintained by the government for a short time at par with the silver ruble; but as the volume of these assignations increased, their purchasing power declined, all commodities advanced to a fabulous price until, in 1789, the silver ruble sold on the exchange for four rubles in paper money, and the leading merchants in St. Petersburg and other large cities in Russia refused to longer accept assignations in payment for goods. "Paul I. was so enraged that he threatened to erect a gallows on the exchange for the special benefit of all who refused paper currency;" but all efforts to sustain the price of assignations proved unavailing. The great merchants and principal land holders throughout the empire, quietly folded their arms and refused to part with their goods or estates except for coin or its equivalent. A few years later the government effected a loan, issuing "bills of credit," based upon the standard of the old silver ruble, and the assignations were finally redeemed at the rate of 350 rubles in paper to 100 rubles in coin.

The great loss entailed upon the people by this repudiation of over seventy per cent of the entire paper currency of the country fell principally upon the poor, who were least able to bear it. Thus the history of inflation was again repeated, a few rich men were made richer, but the masses were left poorer than before.

Austria has had a still more serious experience with irredeemable paper money than Russia. In 1797 the government issued 75,000,000 florins in legal tender currency. The volume of these irredeemable paper promises increased as their value diminished until 1811, when the quantity in circulation amounted to 1,060,000 000 florins worth but ten per cent of the value represented. Upon this subject Mr. Dudley P. Baily, Jr., an eminent statistican, writes: "By an imperial patent issued on the 20th of February, 1811, and published March 15th, the paper money was reduced to one fifth of its nominal value, at which rate it was withdrawn and exchanged for new redemption notes, called the Vienna value paper money. Of these the government promised that only enough should be issued to redeem the bank notes, but subsequently, pressed by fresh necessities, it evaded the promise by issuing anticipation notes, so called because they were issued in anticipation of taxes, but essentially like the redemption notes except in name. The necessities of the government carried the issue of anticipation notes up to 466,533,088 florins at the beginning of 1816, besides 212,159,750 florins of redemption notes, making the total of Vienna paper money at that date 678,692,838 florins. This was again reduced to two fifths of its nominal value, thus making two State bankrupteies within a period of five years."

The financial history of many other nations might be referred to in proof of the fact that inflation is always dangerous to commercial prosperity—that an irredeemable paper currency invariably leads to repudiation, bankruptcy, and financial ruin to the masses.

Yes, What is Money?

I see by your paper of June 15th, that Mr. Van Horn is still inclined to worship the "golden calf," but he thinks us visionary who are desirous of imitating Francis' example of providing plenty of money for doing the business of the country, as it is often termed. I am willing to suppose that Mr. Van Horn is entirely sincere in the views he has presented therein, and I hope he will credit me with the honor of being equally so. This is a fight between capital and labor. The money power has for twelve long years been encroaching on the rights of labor by means of refunding acts, resolutions, etc., procuring legislation, acts of legislation, unfriendly to the interests of labor, etc. Now we propose to regain what we have lost, not by bribes and perfidy, but by that still small voice, the ballot in the hands of the American citizen. We do not propose to repudiate anything, but we do propose to restore to labor at least enough of its rights to secure a living. Mr. Van Horn is very solicitous to know if he can get a gold dollar for a government piece of paper with a figure 1 on it. I think he can, after we have got the most of the people cured of idolatry I think it will be in the market for sale like good steel. He seems to dread that the greenback dollar, or fiat dollar, without a gold dollar to back it, will be a myth. Let me palliate your fears by stating that every other form of paper promise to pay has been the same when confidence has been lost. But can confidence affect this fiat money? It cannot fail till the government is dissolved, because we are all interested to the country.

He says if we could always swap dollars for gold and silver ones, all would be well. But pray tell me, Mr. Van Horn, why would you want to swap? why would any man want to swap if the fiat dollar will buy the necessaries of life and pay your debts? I hope you do not want to worship them because they have played such a prominent part in oppressing the laborer for the benefit of the rich! You do not think of taking our money to Europe to buy goods, do you? You cannot do that. The money of the U. S. ceases to be money whenever it is taken out of our boundaries. If you take our coin to any other country it ceases to be money, and becomes bullion, scrap, and is worth just its bullion value. But if our fiat money will buy flour and meat, it will buy exchange on London, Paris, or Berlin, and that will be all you need in those countries to buy goods with.

Mr. G. B. De Bernardi, of Independence, Mo., has shown that money is not a representative of value, but only a system of bookkeeping, and you must recollect that the Spartans were more prosperous when Lycurgus, to get rid of that intrinsic value idea, made their money of iron. But we have discovered that paper is better than iron to make money out of. Mr. Van Horn says, "If France has more money per capita than this country has, and others claim and point to it and to her great prosperity as a result of it, we must concede that it consists greatly of gold and silver," for she has less paper money per capita than we [this is a mistake] have. I answer, She has obtained her gold by making money plenty enough, so that every citizen in the Republic could find work, and she has worked for the world.

Now, if we would make money plenty enough to bring the rate of interest below that of France, we can beat her prosperity. We are certain to manufacture, and consume, and regain our prosperity whenever we get the interest on money low enough. Don't forget it. J. R. Parks.

Reform—Spelling and Otherwise.

Editor of The Truth Seeker, Dear Sir: The intelligent face of Benjamin Franklin, that so gracefully adorns the title-page of The Truth Seeker, brings to my mind the fact that he was not a man of one idea. He had an expanded and well-balanced intellect. Although the father of electricity, he found time to investigate other fields of knowledge. His gathered wisdom and wise sayings still gleam with brightness, although the author of "Poor Richard" no longer lives in the body. I am pleased to see The Truth Seeker moving forward in its search for truth in the different avenues of life. If it failed to do so, it would belie its noble name and disgrace the grand man whose face graces its pages. Think not that I have been a silent, unthinking spectator these years since I first met you in New York; although I have been engaged for about three years in another field of reform—trying to invent and improve a practical system of writing which will enable future generations to express their thoughts and acquire an education with far less labor than our present long-hand, with its unscientific orthography. As you undoubtedly know, Franklin developed a scheme for improving our bad orthography, and said that spelling reform, "sooner or later, must come." I hope that face will inspire you to aid in carrying forward his unfinished work. In looking over the excellent matter which fills your columns, I behold that it is clothed in the same antique orthographical dress of the days of the youthful Benjamin. I seem to see a slight twinkle of dissatisfaction in the expression of his penetrating eye that says in effect: "This old fogyism is too slow for even conservatives. I gave you electricity to use in medical, mechanical, chemical, and scientific fields of research, and you have applied it well. Your thoughts are transmitted with the rapidity of lightning; the sounds of your voice are familiar to distant parts of the country, and even foreign lands; the electric pen now enables you to dress your thoughts with dexterity and skill; but one thing is lacking still—a sensible sound dress for your language; and just another turn of that 'key' will draw the electricity from the clouds which will awaken you to the necessity of putting on a respectable, chaste, becoming dress for your words. May Anthony Comstock, that useful (nothing was made in vain) member of Christian society, have you all arrested and incarcerated for such 'licentious obscenity' against the laws of natural phonetics. Truth grants no license for such burlesques on common decency as are found in the manner of spelling now in use."

Brother Bennett, you are on the right track. Pay no heed to bigots, whether they are called Christians, Mohammedans, Buddhists, Spiritualists, Materialists, Freethinkers, Infidels, or any other name, who seek to suppress your thought on any subject whatever. All who stop their paper for such a reason are no friends to humanity in the widest, grandest sense. The spirit of these men, intensified, burned Michael Servetus, one of the grandest characters of any age. His moral, unyielding nature has seldom been surpassed. The doctrine of love is what the world needs most now. "Let us love one another."

I am highly pleased to see you drive the axe to the root of Comstockism. Keep it at work until the whole barren tree has been thoroughly uprooted. There is no sort of use dodging this question any longer. I was also pleased to see you circulate a petition for the abolition of the infernal obscenity laws as now interpreted by Comstock. I was sorry to find that the petition was worded in such a way that I could not sign it conscientiously. The clause asserting that the signers were faithful subjects of the government could not, of course, receive the signature of a person who did not believe in the right of delegated governments to employ force to retain a citizen who desired to withdraw his allegiance. The abolition of all human laws and governments is one of the inevitable facts of the coming future. The inherent laws of love, charity, justice, and self control in every soul will yet be the levers which will form a state of society that shall abolish human governments of force. The thoughtful observer will notice that the tendency of all human growth is to enlarge the liberty of the individual and restrict the powers of the ruler or government. Hence the constant turmoil about the abolition or modification of old laws and customs.

When I look around on all sides of the great school of Mother and Father Nature, I see no "obscenity" laws or customs. Everything is quite natural and scientific. Chemistry is the school which teaches us that the law of elective affinities and attractions are the methods nature makes use of in all her organic formations, either animate or inanimate. If I take muriatic acid and mix it according to the chemical formula with common soda, it will produce an apparently new element—common salt. The union of the acid and soda gives a new formation. There is nothing "obscene" about this beautiful experiment. These were the kind of experiments going forward on this earth before the advent of organic life. The grains, trees, and grasses are all produced by the union of the male and female elements, thus producing a new organic formation. The birds of the air, the fish of the sea, the animals of the land, are constantly using their reproductive forces. They do not act as though they had ever heard of Comstock or the "obscenity" laws. We witness the cooing of the doves, and never think of "obscenity." We never think of attributing "obscenity" to any of the attitudes, actions, exposures, or nudities of vegetable or animal reproductive acts. We recognize them as the beautiful manifestations of Mother and Father Nature. This world would be nothing without this law of inherent chemical or sexual affinities. It could not have existence without these natural laws.

When we look at man, the highest organic being on earth, we find that his material existence depends upon the same laws of reproduction as all other organized life below him. The same beautiful, pure, chaste, holy, natural, spiritual, and chemical processes are necessary for the right population of earth. The possession of organs or forces are the insignia of nature that they were intended to be used in harmony with her elective laws of chemical attraction. To man, a higher development of reason, intellect, and spirituality is given. This implies that these forces should be used in all the strength, delicacy, and refinement of thought and action which they are capable of producing. It would be a self contradiction to assume that the natural organs of man or woman are "obscene." The "obscenity" laws are wholly a product of the conventionalities of human society.

For man to create artificial customs or laws which interfere with the exercise of any organ of the mind or body is an arbitrary interference with the inalienable natural rights of the individual. Those who consider any act of life as being in any manner whatever "obscene" are unbalanced characters or have not outgrown the effects of conventional barbarism. There is not an "obscene" article, object, action, or word in any normal manifestation of life. Those who are squeamish, and see "obscenity" on every hand, are fit subjects for the moral instruction and discipline of a reformatory home. What the world will yet need is the abolition of all "obscenity" laws. Let Comstock go to a reform house for moral instruction in the great chemical law of affinities until he can look upon any acts of life without the thought coming up in his mind that they are "obscene." He is the diseased criminal that needs instruction far more than his poor victims. Every right-minded, kindly-disposed, unselfish person will naturally respect the opinions and feelings of others to a certain extent, so long as they do not enforce them arbitrarily upon others.

We will tolerate no interference with our religious, political, or scientific opinions. We must enlarge the standard, and insist upon the doctrine of no interference with our opinions on any subject whatever! Whose business is it if we have social opinions different from the average human being? Is not our thought dependent upon our organism and stage of growth?

If an artist chooses to paint or chisel duplicates of the nudities in sculpture or painting of the old masters, the world smiles. If another artist chooses to take his subjects from nude living models, the world frowns. The world needs instruction until it can reverentially look upon any painting from life. The doctors are permitted to have live and dead subjects to experiment upon in the interest of science. Who thinks that they are obscene? The whole race needs the same knowledge and instruction as the doctors. They ought to be able to be their own doctors in the majority of cases. How can they unless the anatomy of their bodies is illustrated by proper physiological paintings and drawings? The moral status of the world is low on the science of generation. Let us do our little towards bringing the people to the standpoint where they will gladly maintain a Liberal press which falters not in expressing thought on any subject calculated to uplift our common humanity.

I am in favor of free discussion on any subject whatever. And may the day be hastened when our entire secular, scientific, political, and religious press can proudly stand on this platform. We are fettered slaves to the exploded conventionalities of the past ages of barbarism. When our galling suffering becomes unendurable, we will rise with the might of right, and assert our natural right to utter any thought the human intellect is capable of conceiving. Until that happy time comes, I remain yours in the traces in some avenue of life. John Brown Smith.

Letters from Friends.

NOTES FROM THE LECTURE FIELD.

BY DR. J. L. YORK.

IONIA, MICH.

DEAR BENNETT: Since I wrote you last I have been constantly engaged, with hardly time to take a long breath, and have now more calls than I can fill up to August 20th, at which time I hope to start for the Watkins Convention, where I hope to grasp the hand of D. M. Bennett and many other true workers in the cause of human freedom. For if there is anything in this world worthy of admiration and true regard, it is a man who dares speak the honest convictions of his mind.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is a grand success, and meets fully the wants of advanced Liberal minds everywhere, for truth is eternal and always will win. God bless you, Brother Bennett! Keep your face to the enemy, and your eye on their guns. I am only sorry that instead of these five names inclosed for THE TRUTH SEEKER I could not send you twenty. The cry is "Hard times!"

Freethought, of the Spiritualistic and common-sense type, is growing steadily in this State. My audiences, in every instance, have been large and enthusiastic.

During the last two months I have attended many large gatherings of our people in various parts of the State, grove-meetings being the order of the day.

The Paw Paw Convention last month was a grand, good meeting. I gave five lectures prior to the convention, and closed with a two-days convention, at which we were assisted by Mrs. Sheppard and others.

Our thanks are due to E. Warner, Bro. Burdick, and others, for willing hearts and ready hands to help us in stirring the waters of superstition and giving the gospel of nature.

My next appointment found me in Detroit, the most beautiful city in Michigan. It seems almost like my own home, San Jose, the garden city of California—the streets so wide and so nicely shaded. Our thanks are due to Wm. Sanborn, the president of the society, as also Mrs. Dr. Spinney, at whose home I was made glad and happy.

The 1st and 2d of June I held a grove-meeting at Otisco, with a large attendance, and such a happy, truly happy, people you will hardly find except within the ranks of Liberals.

My next appointment found me at Rockford, where I had given two full courses of lectures during the past winter. This was their regular quarterly meeting, and a host of warm friends met me there. This is the oldest Liberal society in Michigan. They own a fine large hall, and, what is better, they fill it full of bright, thinking people. Our thanks are due to Bros. Whitney, Dockery, and Youngs, as also to the singers, who contributed largely to the interest of the occasion.

Next, agreeable to engagement, I attended the regular yearly meeting at Sturgis, held on the 14th, 15th, and 16th inst. This great gathering, under the management of J. G. Wait and Bro. Gardner, veterans in the cause, did credit to the people of Sturgis for efficiency and kindness in entertaining the large number of strangers, who, at the appointed time, flocked in, like doves to the windows, from all parts of the State, as well as from adjoining States.

The meeting, by common consent, was one of the happiest ever held at Sturgis, and to me it was highly gratifying to meet so many earnest people all ablaze with good feeling, and also so many workers in the lecture field, of whom I may mention C. B. Lynn, a polished blade in the cause of truth; Mrs. Persall, an honored worker in this State, full of kind and tender feelings, pre-eminently practical, and full of good things; G. B. Stebbins, of Detroit, a library in one volume, a genial, kindly man, full of sunshine; Bro. Thomas, recently from Minnesota, an earnest, efficient speaker; also, Bro. Stewart, well known and appreciated in this field of labor.

The meeting throughout was marked for kindness, consideration, and good order, and every one seemed sorry only when the parting hour arrived, on Monday, the fourth day of the meeting, at a reunion at nine A. M., when the last good-byes were said, and the great crowd separated, to carry with them somewhat of hopes revived and more of earnest purpose, and a spirit of labor and helpfulness in the year to come.

I like the people of Michigan; they are generous and whole-souled. I could wish they were not so depressed financially, but hope the coming crop, which was never so promising before, will lift them out into better times. But the country is unsettled in every phase of its life. The political pot begins to boil, and the nation's party yet to be is organizing everywhere; and with an increasing want of confidence in both Church and State, the people are pervaded with a deep spirit of unrest. It is a good omen to feel the evils that afflict us, but it wants a clear head and an honest heart to battle intelligently in times like these.

The people now want bread, not religion. The people now want labor, and a just proportion of its product, as the only means of life, physical or moral.

It is an insane policy which has long been tried—asking men to be good and come to Jesus without first providing the means of physical life. Bread, a good house, clean clothes, and good food make good morals easy to reach. Without these, religion is a hollow sham.

What the people want now is wise legislation, not claptrap, which, like religion, has done nought but build churches, thereby increasing the burdens of our people, casting dust in their eyes, hiding the true issues of life and the true remedy for our evils. Give us now a political and religious policy which, instead of promising to keep the people out of hell after death, will tend to keep hell out of the people here and now by furnishing better physical—hence better moral—conditions for them.

Friends of free thought, free religion, free State, and free school, don't forget the Watkins Glen meeting, which promises to be the largest gathering of Liberals ever convened in this country; and, that the moral effect of this meeting may be felt throught the entire country, let every freeman come to the front.

FRIEND BENNETT: Ever since I heard of the unwarranted apprehension of Mrs. Sara B. Chase by Comstock, I have been aching to say something that would rouse an enthusiasm in her cause, but words seem so powerless and feeble to convey the half that should be said that I hardly know how to approach the subject in a way to do it justice.

There are so few women who care to be anything save domestic drudges, wives, mothers, housekeepers, or slaves of fashion, that when one does step forth from the charmed ring, with a resolution to be a helper in the ranks of reformers and educators, it is the duty of every man and woman who has the best interests of society at heart to sustain, aid, and support her in her efforts, and especially when she takes up the pen, and gives her voice to an unpopular cause, and endeavors to teach human beings the first great lesson of life—how to properly care for their bodies, how to be healthy, strong, vigorous, and consequently happy. The glorious blessing of health has been the theme of the poet and the philosopher in all ages, but hitherto few, save the medical fraternity, have been allowed to read and study about all parts of the body; and as a natural result of this system of mock modesty, ignorance reigns rampant among us, and sickness, imbecility, insanity, and a long train of evils follow in its course. And for simply selling a cleansing, purifying instrument (a female syringe), this noble martyr, a doctor of medicine who knows how necessary it is that woman should keep herself clean and healthy, has been arrested, insulted, slandered, and disgraced, her business prospects ruined, and her fair fame blasted by foul calumny. A new law is needed on our statute books, a law that should recompense, as far as possible, all who are thus arrested and punished when guiltless of all offense. Not one of us, however careful or virtuous we may be, is, or can be sure of never falling under unjust suspicions. Hundreds of thousands have been deprived of life unjustly, and many after suffering years of imprisonment have been pronounced guiltless and set free, but no remuneration is ever made to them for what they unjustly endured.

The law has pronounced Mrs. Chase guiltless of offense, but it does not, nor can it place her back where she was. It does not restore her fame or her property prospects. And that is what is now demanded of us as individuals. What the law is powerless to do in its present state of development, we who profess to be pioneers in the field of thought should do. We must talk up, agitate the subject, and help those who shoulder our burdens. It is for you and me, my friends, that Mrs. Chase has suffered all this indignity, just as did our good brother Bennett before her. Even as the true and noble hearts rallied en masse to his assistance, should they now rally to hers, and with the added stimulus of a manly chivalry, for is she not a woman, oppressed and down-trodden? Yet undaunted and unflinching she bravely continues her labors. Every believer in woman's equality, in the need of woman's pure, true, and motherly element in the formation of a nobler, higher era of human development and sounder social system, should rally to the aid of this champion, who is endeavoring to do so much that we all realize needs doing.

If you are not taking her paper, The Physiologist, subscribe for it at once, and I will guarantee that you will get your money's worth besides doing your duty in a good cause. And all who can should send in their means to aid her in her endeavors to prosecute Anthony Comstock, a man who holds an office no good man would accept, and who uses his power for mean, selfish, ignoble purposes. In prosecuting this agent of the Y. M. C. A., she will have the whole of that great body to fight, and her victory will be the victory of all who believe in free speech and free deeds. Subscriptions may be addressed at once to Sara B. Chase, M. D., 56 West 33d St., N. Y.

Respectfully and earnestly,

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CLARION, Co., IOWA, June 19, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: From the interest I take in reading your correspondence department, I also am tempted to give you a thought or so of my own, which you can treat as you please without insulting the writer. I was born in the year following our last struggle, as a nation, for independence. My father participated in that struggle. And who knows but the triumphant feelings inspired by the result had somewhat to do with my love of freedom manifested in after life. I was launched into life without my consent, at a time I had not chosen, with an organization I did not make, among the hills of Vermont, with surroundings ready made. And, as near as I can determine, from that day to this, all the manifestations from this life of mine have been but the result of conditions I did not make. Yes, says one, but you might have done differently if you had so chosen to do; but could I choose to do differently without a stronger motive than the one that actuated me? Yes, I could if I would, but the trouble was, I couldn't "would." Now, if this proposition is correct, why am I blamed for anything I may do? The censured act was the legitimate result of a previous cause, which, in turn, is but the result of a cause or causes still back of it, and so on, back, back indefinitely. Where, then, shall we fasten responsibility? These thoughts were suggested by the bitter epithets used by some of your correspondents. To be sure, they have a right to use them. They are truthfully manifesting their own personality, the same as I am doing, and I like your paper all the better for giving free expression to every shade of thought. I am as much interested in the extreme views of C. L. James, T. C. Leland, Elvira Wheelock, and others, as I am of more conservative expressions, and doubt not but if mankind were generally developed to a similar plane, their theory would be a practical one. We must philosophize more over human actions, and discourage this personal censure, and so outgrow it. This we surely must do before peace and harmony can take the place of discord.

Yours sincerely,

H. BROOKS.

MOBERLY, MO., June 21, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: As my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER expires the last of this month, I inclose $1 in part pay for another six months. I fear I will soon be compelled to say, Stop my paper! I am getting old, and so afflicted with the rheumatism that I am scarcely able to do anything. I served in the Mexican war, and I did think Congress would give me a small pension, but no prospect for that this Congress. Liberalism is gradually on the increase in Moberly. It was announced in February last that B. F. Underwood would deliver three lectures here in March, and oh, what a commotion it created among the clergy. They commenced preaching to prejudice the minds of the people against going to hear him speak. I went to hear one clergyman expose Infidelity, and about all he did was to recite the old tale, the recantations of Paine and Voltaire, and finally wound up by saying what little good there was in Infidelity was borrowed from Christianity.

Well, Underwood delivered his lecture, and shook up the dry bones of old theology; he attacked the three pillars of the Christian faith, miracle, prophecy, and precept, and showed the weakness thereof. He left a challenge when here, but I think they would have let it pass unnoticed were it not that the Infidels tantalize and urge them on. Yet they say he falsified history. I tell them to bring their man and prove that he did. They (the Campbellite church) are making some effort to get a man, but they can't decide who to get. Some think Burgess is the man, and some think Braden, while others think Wilks can demolish Underwood and give the death blow to Infidelity. Before the church had recovered from the paralytic shock received from Underwood, Jamieson came here and organized a Liberal club with twenty members. Then last week we had the ex-clergyman, J. R. Baker, and he gave four lectures; his subject on last Sunday evening being, "Is the universe governed by God, or by fixed laws?" and he just naturally took that blessed old doctrine, special providence, all to pieces. He never left them a pin to hang on, or a straw to catch at.

A few evenings ago I went to hear a Rev. prove the existence of a God, and he proved it to the satisfaction of his church, but there are few persons who know that there are two sides to that subject. The next day I copied THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 8, a part of Underwood's lecture on Christianity and Materialism, and sent it to said clergyman and asked him to read it from his pulpit, and also to comment on it, and that I would be glad to hear him. But that is the last of it! Oh, how they do dread that man Underwood, and well they may. But I think or hope we will have a debate here this summer. It will bring out many persons who would not go to hear a Liberal speak, and they will come, thinking to witness the last dying groans of Infidelity. Friend Bennett, I would like to ask you are there any of Celsus' writings extant? I heard a clergyman say a few days since that some of his writings were used in the colleges; but according to your book, "Sages and Thinkers," there are none of his writings extant except what we get from Origen. I told him I thought he was mistaken, but he insisted on it. Please give me the information. Yours fraternally,

H. W. JOHNSON.

WHERE ARE WE?

WORCESTER, MASS., June 14, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Is Freethought run mad? The town of Princeton lies some miles north of here, and is, moreover, quite elevated geographically, and yet our friend Heywood's Word is scarcely clear, it gives a quite uncertain sound to us dwellers in the lower regions; for not until very recently have we become aware what its editor was driving at. A week or two ago, Mr. Abbot of The Index undertook to define Heywood's position on the obscenity question, and as it now appears, has done it correctly.

Since then, the June number of the The Word has appeared and puts the editor of that monthly journal of "reform" before the world in the position of one dashing his foot against a stone. The Battle-Axe, with its review of his "Cupid's Yokes" had scarcely got digested by its eight hundred readers, when out comes Heywood and claims further to voice "liberty" in "demanding the unconditional repeal of all State and National laws against obscenity." This mouthpiece of liberty then sits himself down and presumes to interpret "liberty" for THE TRUTH SEEKER. His language is, "Bate no jot of your just and timely demand for entire repeal of the obscenity law." Brother Bennett, when I read that in your last, and recollected the argument you had sustained in your replies to Abbot, and saw that you uttered no disclaimer, I felt like exclaiming "He passed shot for shot with the enemy, and won the day, to be betrayed by a friend at last."

But I have been but a poor reader of your noble journal, if you have ever demanded the "unconditional repeal" of obscenity laws! But so Heywood commits you, and unless you repudiate, I do not see but Abbot stands vindicated in all he has said. You will do well to print Mr. Heywood's editorial note (third column, second page) from which I have made the quotation. It is time we understood what this man is up to. If they (the Heywoods) are unsafe teachers in an age notoriously full of false cries of "reform," it is well to know it.

The Battle-Axe review is now accessible, let the people read it along with "Cupid's Yokes." Let the light shine. Let us find out where are we. I boldly affirm that "Cupid's Yokes" is more the enemy of "sound morality and intelligent purity" (which its author claims to cherish) than "Fanny Hill." Where are we?

A. BRIGGS DAVIS, editor Worcester Battle-Axe.

REMARKS.—We have but a word to say in reply to brother Davis' remarks. We are by no means in favor of obscenity, and think that whatever is calculated to excite the passions should not be allowed circulation. Still, we are in favor of the repeal of the Comstock laws. There was no necessity for them; we had laws enough before to meet all cases that might arise; the pernicious laws did not rid the country of obscene publications, and under them nothing has been done to equal what had been accomplished before they existed, and they have been used only to persecute and harass many excellent people. So far as "Cupid's Yokes" is concerned we have looked through it, but never read it consecutively. We cannot think Mr. Heywood meant to transcend the laws of propriety—or that he has merited heavy fines or imprisonment. Man's liberty is too sacred a thing to be taken away for slight accusations. We believe Mr. Heywood to be as honest as most men, and that he has the right to promulgate his honest convictions. Those who do not admire his arguments and his style can easily avoid them. Those who appreciate his reasoning and his logic certainly have the right to peruse them. We are opposed to the imprisonment of any man for telling what he believes. We would hope that every Freethinker and every Liberal will use discretion and not overstep the bounds of propriety.—[ED. T. S.]

MICHIGAN, June 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It seems as though the times were ominous; that a revolution in social and political affairs were among the inevitables of this age and generation. Only a few days ago we Liberals felt to take courage, as you announced in THE TRUTH SEEKER that the committee to whom was referred the petition for the repeal of the odious Comstock laws (which are a disgrace to the intelligence of the so-called free American people) had reported favorably for the repeal or modification of those laws. We felt encouraged on reading the announcement, but lo and behold, the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of the 15th inst. knocks the good news all into pi. It is very evident to the common observer that old straight-laced theology and bigoted intolerance are making a wonderful struggle to keep on their feet in their dying hour; for I think they intend to die game, and on their feet at that. Let a person place him or herself, and that innocently, too, in any position, with no intention of wrong to anybody, and if an opportunity offers for old Theology to do so, she will apply the thumb-screws until she squeezes the good name and reputation, if not the very existence, out of him who dares to differ with them in thought; and especially if he or she dares to express a disbelief in the existence of their God.

To illustrate: My attention has just been called to a proceeding that I find in the journal of proceedings of the last Session of the Grand Lodge of this jurisdiction, I. O. O. F., held in Grand Rapids last February. It seems that one of the subordinates of this jurisdiction had preferred charges against one of its members on a number of specifications, the most important of which was his disbelief in a God, and the one on which he was finally expelled from the lodge and order. The case was carried to the Grand Lodge on appeal; and they referred it to a special committee of three; and that committee consisted of three past grand masters of the order. Two of them have been for years noted journalists, editors of papers, and the third one a Universalist clergyman, a man of large philanthrophy, who has the reputation of giving largely his time and fortune to benefit humanity, and yet this intelligent trio reported to confirm the action of the subordinate in expelling a member because he could not believe in their God, or a God. Oh, consistency thou art a jewel! As though a man could believe just what he had a mind to, or what he pleased. No doubt when the expelled member joined the fraternity he was a believer, or at least gave a tacit assent to some kind of a God. But suppose that he has outgrown the Christian God idea. Must he be ostracised, and disgraced, and turned out in the cold, simply because he cannot believe just as some other people do? Experience and observation induce with me an opinion that a very respectable portion of the members of that grand body and the order at large in these Western States, are not believers in the Christian's God, and if asked the question in a direct way, as was the expelled member, their answers might lead to similar results. For one I was surprised when I read the report of the three past grand masters to confirm the action of the Lodge below; it lessened these gentlemen in my estimation very much in regard to their mental caliber; and I felt like saying, Shame! shame, gentlemen! How came you to believe in the Christian's God, or even a God at all, except as you had it instilled into your minds from your infancy up to manhood; a part of your mental growth and development; and that too, perhaps, without giving the subject a passing thought whether the God idea was a myth or something tangible?

"O wad some power the giftie gie us,
To see oursels as ithers see us."

FILLMORE CITY, UTAH, June 17, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: Most noble champion of liberty, I, like some puny spectator in an ancient amphitheatre, can only sit and admire the earnest combatants in the arena. I long to rush into the great contest and valiantly stand, or fall, if necessary, for human liberty. But alas! without money or talent, I am weaponless and defenseless. Fight on, noble brother, and may you be spared to see the hydra-headed and bloodthirsty monster sink into oblivion in the cesspool of ignorance from whence it came. Inclosed please find one dollar for the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion." Yours fraternally, HIRAM H. ELDERIDGE.

WAGONDA, KANSAS, June 10, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: My short note to THE TRUTH SEEKER has brought me some letters, and I see Dr. Hull has noticed it in the paper also. He says it is not an isolated case, that many persons have felt pains and itching on amputated limbs. Now, this does not touch the case in the least. I have seen plenty of them, but if a million had occurred, and not one explained, of what use is the argument? Let me repeat it once more: The foot died, and was separated without a knife, the lower and middle third we amputated. Thirty years after when the mind is called to the case, the feeling occurs, and not otherwise, and yet, of course, both parts are dead, while only the one divided by the knife has any feeling. The correspondent lost sight of the main question at issue, which is, why do not the nerves of the foot that died from natural causes feel mental impulse now as well as that which was killed by the knife? One correspondent claims it as a proof of a spiritual body. If this is so, there must be somewhere in space a five-year old foot waiting to be joined to a full-grown one at some time in the future, which seems to me a very poor and useless appendage, and, if I have a voice in the matter, I shall reject it; but perhaps spirits are all of one size. Can any one tell that? Then, what is that spirit foot doing all these years? has any one seen it? If so, please report, but pray don't give me any more demonstration on anatomy. I have been there. GEO. W. CHAPMAN.

KNIGHTSTOWN, IND., June 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: I take the privilege of writing the Dale seduction case for your paper. Stranger as I am to you, I have been a regular contributor to the various public journals of the Hoosier State for seventeen years. But I have no privilege of giving expression to views antagonistic to orthodoxy. With your permission I should be pleased to occasionally favor you with a letter whenever any sensation occurs. If my version of the Dale affair meets your approbation, you are at liberty to publish it; if not I shall take it as no offense. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, its editor, and to all its contributors. With respects I am, yours for truth, W. H. BEARD.

NEWCASTLE, IND., June 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Knowing with what avidity our Christian friends gobble up every dark reflection on the characters of those who do not accept what they presume to be "the truth as it is in Jesus," I deem it but an act of justice to indulge in a mild retaliation. I believe the world has been humbugged long enough by a class of would-be pious instructors—men who claim to be skilled in the deep, grand mysteries of so-called holy writ. But the truth of the poet's words, "One by one the links are breaking," is being truly verified. One by one the distinguished clergymen of the land are falling victims to their baser passions, thus throwing a shadow of gloom over the great cause which they claim gives light, joy, and eternal happiness to a world of suffering, sin, and sorrow. Believing that the character of every minister who brings disgrace on his profession ought to be held up to public view; and knowing the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is not averse to this opinion, I take the liberty of presenting the facts, as I have gathered them, concerning a recent sensation in our midst, in which the Rev. L. L. Dale is the central figure, to the readers of your paper, and to the world. More than fifteen years ago I knew Mr. Dale; he was then in the zenith of his political glory. He was widely known as a minister and stump orator; was rather an active politician. He finally became editor of a Democratic newspaper, whose columns glowed with the political rottenness and corruption characteristic of the man.

Mr. Dale, it must be acknowledged, is a man of some ability. He can preach "Christ, and him Crucified," with as much power and pathos, and brush as many pious tears from his eyes as any minister in this region. At present he fills the important position of elder in the Campbellite Church, and is travelling in various portions of the State, for the sole purpose, he says, of "gathering sinners into the fold." During one of his rambles in a neighboring county, he dropped into the house of one Mr. Newbry, a friend and brother in the church. The parents were absent, and two daughters, aged respectively twelve and sixteen years, were the only inmates who came to greet this man of God. The Rev. gentleman exposed himself in such a disgraceful manner, and made such imprudent insinuations that the elder of the girls fled to the house of a neighbor, leaving her sister, a mere child, in the hands of this wolf in sheep's clothing. The result was, the child was robbed of her virtue, of all that makes a woman a gem of loveliness and beauty. And thus was the confidence of fond parents betrayed, under whose hospitable roof this fiend in human form so often found shelter and repose.

On account of the high esteem in which Mr. Dale's family are held by the citizens of Newcastle, the matter was kept quiet until Mr. D.'s return, when the generous editor of the Courier tendered him space in which to vindicate his character. The reverend gentleman failed to come to time, but at the same time bitterly denied the charges preferred against him, thus adding the crime of falsehood to his darker villainies. At present the "man of Christ" is "out on the ocean sailing," while his estimable family are alone in their suffering and sorrow. The above facts are given as I learned them from near neighbors and friends of the family, whose truth and veracity I have no right to question.

Very truly yours, W. H. BEARD.

FLORENCE, IOWA, June 17, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Mr. Leland's last article upon "Mr. Abbot and the Petition," is an excellent exposition of the circumstances which must flow from Mr. Abbot's action in the matter of the Comstock's laws. As a worker in the Liberal League cause, I must agree with Mr. Leland, that here was the opportunity for that organization to show the stuff of which it was made. The Liberal League, as the organization which has made a special work of the secularization of the State, should, through its officers, have given forth no uncertain sound upon this vital question. The friends of physiological education must rally to the defense of our imperilled liberties. Arrests of those who are engaged in the sale of "Fruits of Philosophy," "Sexual Physiology," and other works of that nature as well as those who are selling "Cupid's Yokes," and similar pamphlets, continue with alarming frequency. The conviction of Edward Truelove and the case of Mrs. Besant in England, and the arrest and conviction of several parties in this country for the sale of "Cupid's Yokes," "Fruits of Philosophy," etc., show plainly that the battle of freedom is not yet over, either here or in England, and it behooves all Liberals to come to the fore and battle in the common cause. Let us discuss this question calmly, dispassionately, and without indulging in personalities, yet earnestly and with the firm determination to carry the fight to the bitter end, and until victory shall crown the cause of right. Won't your correspondents please give us a rest on Bro. Sturm. The gentleman certainly had the right to stop his paper, if it did not suit him, or if it did. As a Materialist I hope all such will support THE TRUTH SEEKER, for it is a host in itself, but I must defend the right of any one to stop a paper, which, for any cause, he does not like. Your Missouri contributor, "A. R. C.," seems to be in a bad way. No doubt Mrs. Wheelock and Mr. Leland will set the gentleman right, but I cannot but remark that he seems to have made a great mistake some way. Because Mrs. Wheelock spoke for the natural purity of sex and sex manifestations is no reason why "A. R. C." should try to prove that she wanted us all to throw aside our garments. Our climate would have something to say in that matter. The lady's argument was undoubtedly sound. That last paragraph of "A. R. C's" is rich. Such analogies! But I will leave him to the tender mercies of those whom he has attacked. Yours for natural virtue, E. C. WALKER.

Pope Joan a Myth.

BY WILLIAM EMMETTE COLEMAN.

Quite an extended biography of the so-called Pope Joan appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER not long since, in which the truth of the narratives relative to the occupancy of the papal see by this suppositious female pontiff was vigorously advocated. In the interest of truth, and in justice to your many readers, I crave permission to submit a few facts throwing quite a different light upon this now thoroughly ventilated and definitely settled subject of the existence or non-existence of the famed popess.

A short time since, the truth or falsity of the stories concerning Pope Joan being under consideration in The Boston Investigator, Mrs. Margaret Chappellsmith published therein a series of papers thereupon, critically analytical of the whole subject in all its details, explanatory of the origin and growth of the presumed historical statements involving Joan's personal history, and scrutinizingly testing the entire circle of evidence brought to bear in sustentation of the truth of her existence and pontificate. Mrs. Chappellsmith demonstrated unanswerably the complete unreliability of the whole story; that not the slightest foundation of fact existed upon which to rest the claims of her actual being; the various narratives of her supposed life and adventures being, one and all, individual fabrications, manufactured out of whole cloth. The evidence presented by Mrs. C. in proof of the non-existence of the woman-pope—which it is scarcely necessary here to produce in detail—all scholars are familiar with, whether Protestant, Catholic, or Infidel; and it is now a well-ascertained and universally acknowledged fact with historians, literati, and scientists, that no such person as Pope Joan ever lived.

In Baring Gould's "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages" a chapter is devoted to Pope Joan, and the undeniably mythical nature of the stories told about her conclusively demonstrated. In Brewer's "Dictionary of Phrase and Fable" we are told that it has been shown that no such person ever occupied the papal chair, and that Pope Joan was annihilated by the Protestants, Blondel and Bayle. In Sheltin's "Historical Finger-post," Pope Joan is classed under the heading of "Romance, Legend, Imaginary, and Mysterious Personages," and concerning her it says: "The prevailing belief is that Pope Joan was a merely fictitious character invented for the purpose of controversy." Beeton's "Dictionary of Biography" calls her a "fictitious character," and remarks, "The whole of the ridiculous story, however, is now abandoned as fabulous by Catholics as well as Protestants."

Zell's Cyclopedia styles her a "famous mythical personage," and says that the "strange tale" of her life and pontificate "was overthrown by a French Protestant minister named Blondel, who, in the interest of truth, published, in 1647, an 'Eclaircissement de la Question.' His view of the falsity of the story, supported by Bayle, Leibnitz, Eckhardt, and others, has prevailed, and the mythical nature of the female pope is now generally admitted."

Johnson's Cyclopedia speaks of Joan as a "fabulous personage," and says "the fable is utterly without historical foundation, its fictitious character having been first conclusively demonstrated by David Blondel, a Protestant, in 1690." Appleton's Cyclopedia—not the latest and Catholico-expurgated edition, but the original edition of twenty years ago—designates her as a "fictitious personage," and informs us that "it is now generally admitted that no such person as Pope Joan ever existed, and that the immediate successor of Leo IV. was Benedict III." Chamber's Cyclopedia speaks precisely to the same purport—the general recognition of the stories of Joan as purely fabulous and unworthy of credence.

We thus have the concurrent testimony of all the standard authorities of the present day testifying in unison to the mythical and fabulous character of the narratives of the pseudo-pope, Joan; and I think all unprejudiced minds will bear me out in the truth of the statement heading this article—Pope Joan a myth.

The League.—The Watkins Meeting.

DEAR BENNETT: I am asked and written to, "What about the Liberal League? Are you and Bennett going to abandon the League because of Abbot's defection?" Answering for myself, I say no. The League is organization, or, at least, the nucleus of it; and organization is what the Liberal world most urgently needs. Organization implies leaders; and, of all movements in the world of opinion, a Liberal organization needs to be most wisely and consistently led. Also, of all individuals to be ranked into organization, Liberals are the very worst material for would-be leaders to attempt to trifle with. Accustomed to think for themselves, they judge of leaders as they do of any other subject of investigation, and they resent every effort to lead them wrong. They are not like pietists, to be owned, nor like politicians, to be traded off or sold. The Liberal League holds its own organization, order, and progress in its own hands, and it will not suffer long under an eclipse. If one leader proves unequal to its requirements, another will be found to take up his neglected work.

Aside from this matter of the impartial freedom of the mails, the objects aimed at by the League, complete separation of Church and State, the taxing of Church property, depietizing the public schools, etc., are objects desired by every Liberal.

So let all Liberals, wherever possible, organize leagues and prepare for active, practical, energetic work. Even if the friends of Comstock are now in the majority in the League, which we cannot think possible, it cannot long be so, since it is the nature of tyrants, when they are invested with a little brief authority, to almost certainly abuse it. We can, therefore, confidently rely on Comstock continually doing something to abridge the freedom of the press, disgust his friends and defenders, and finally open the eyes of the most persistently blind.

Whatever happens, then, we say, push on the League.

Now let me tell your readers another thing. There is going to be a meeting of Liberals—the largest ever assembled in America—at Watkins, head of Seneca Lake, N. Y. Great preparations are making for this meeting. Mr. H. L. Green, Secretary of the Liberal League, and prince of organizers, is alive and active in the work, seeing to all the details, getting reduced fares from R. R. companies, corresponding with speakers and doing all those acts and things requisite to complete success. The Wolcott meeting of Liberals last year was an interesting and important affair. The gathering of more than two thousand people at Waterloo, on the first two days of this month, was another great occasion; but it is intended to make the Watkins meetings, to be held on the 22d, 23d, 24th, and 25th of August next, the most interesting assemblage, and the most striking demonstration of Liberal power and enthusiasm of any yet held. All TRUTH SEEKER readers who are intending to "go somewhere" this summer, are invited, and will do well to arrange to go to Watkins on that interesting occasion. T. C. L.

Lecture by Mrs. Saxon.

A large and select company of ladies and gentlemen gathered at Odd Fellows' Hall last night to hear Mrs. E. L. Saxon on the "Progress and Culture of Woman Throughout the Ages." The object was to show the superior moral grandeur of woman's nature, and to signalize its capacity for unlimited intellectual development. The treatment of the subject involved a consideration of the great women of history, whose achievements were reviewed to prove the native strength and subtle industry of the female mind. Coming down to present times the lecturer appealed against the mental slavery put upon the sex, and argued for a more practical and larger education which would enable women to rightly use their God-given powers in the avenues of thought to which they might be called by natural selection. Mrs. Saxon has given this subject very earnest study, and, without being an enthusiast, is strongly fixed in the conviction that the duty of the times is to render woman a helpmeet to man instead of a hopeless dependant. There was much research in the lecture, in which also was displayed a goodly fund of humor. In a literary sense it proved a most acceptable treat, the style being terse and scholarly and brilliant. The audience listened attentively throughout, and with great interest—missing none of the many good points—and greatly enjoyed the humorous illustrations with which the lecture abounded.—N. O. Picayune.

Preachers and Lawyers, Tobacco and Rum.

Rid of preachers and lawyers, tobacco and rum,
The end of all wickedness surely would come.
Both preachers and lawyers, those kings of misrule,
Would school-teacher Science have placed in her school.

Tobacco and rum with all ease we'd abate,
If no lawyers there were baneful laws to create;
Tobacco we'd banish, the drunkard reform,
If the preachers to virtue and truth would conform.

These preachers and lawyers they ever agree,
Bad laws and false dogmas the people can see;
To instruct the dear people no efforts are made;
Both preachers and lawyers the mind would enslave.

Let truth to the minds of the masses be taught,
Just laws be enacted, and good rule be sought;
Then preachers and lawyers Dame Science would rule,
Could earn honest livings by teaching your school.

But then they must labor with justice and truth,
Else not be entrusted to teach the dear youth,
At present, we see the reform is so great
That preachers and lawyers must be left to their fate.

To truth or to justice they ne'er have been wed;
By self, not by justice, they always are led.
In this they agree, on earth they would dwell,
Disown their own father and not go to hell.

"The Darwins."

"Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker: I wish you would stop my part of that Gol-Darned silly storry. If the Liberals can't get up a better storry, they better sell out.

"For my part I would rather have an orthodox lie.

"A Reader of The Truth Seeker."

Dear Mr. Bennett: If the friend who wrote the above note had given name and address, I might have responded privately; but as it is, I must, perforce, make my apologies for the silliness contained in "The Darwins" through the columns of the paper in which it appears.

In the first place I would inform Mr. Anonymous (it is not Mrs. or Miss, I am sure, for no lady would be apt to show such a want of "culture" when addressing a stranger) that "The Darwins" is not intended to be anything more than a series of sketches, or life-pictures, descriptive of every-day, common-place existence as the writer has found it during her fifty years' pleasant sojourn on this earthly ball. Lights and shadows, joys and sorrows, hopes and fears, alternating, make by their continuous changes, variety, excitement, and anticipation, which give zest and enthusiasm to all that live.

I do not claim to be a scholar, nor to be able to concoct long, intricate, bewildering plots; but simply write of things as they are, and try to put Liberal ideas in readable shape by weaving them into a story.

It is said that a person who has no enemies is of little worth; and a story that calls forth no adverse criticism may be of the same ilk. Now, as the note is the first condemnatory epistle that has come to my knowledge, I presume I ought to be very grateful to thee for it. Perhaps thee will do the readers of The Truth Seeker the great favor of getting up a better "storry" or tell some "orthodox lie" to interest them, and thus make up in part for the "silliness" of Thine for truth, Elmina D. Slenker.

P. S. For the benefit of the carping critic I give a few extracts from private letters, showing the other side:

"I have read the two instalments of 'The Darwin' story, and you may take my word for it that it bids fair to beat all that has preceded it. The good points WILL burst out, like a rose from the bud."

"Port Hope, Can. William Sisson."

"How well we do like your story! The beauty of your stories is that you put richly cultivated intellects into your pets, and make every one admire them for their erudition as well as love them for innate purity. 'The Darwins' is fascinatingly interesting.

"West Amboy, N. Y. Jennie Leete.

"I like 'The Darwins' ever so much.

"Texas. Edith Montrose."

"Your articles and stories constitute one of the very best features of The Truth Seeker. L. W. C.

"Winsted, Conn."

"It is more interesting than any of the New York Ledger stories.

"Penn. Mrs. Phillips."

"Sorry 'The Darwins' missed in the last issue of The Truth Seeker; hope they will come out all right next time.

"South Carolina. R. M. Casey."

"We all like 'The Darwins.'

"Paterson, N. J. John Warr."

Singing at the Watkin's Convention.

It is very desirable that we have a fine body of singers at the Watkin's Convention. Where can we get them? Is the Hutchinson family still in the field as vocalists? If they are, I am confident they would be pleased to entertain the Convention with their songs as the members are all liberal in their views. Will some friend inform me where a letter will reach them? And are there not other good singers who will give their services to the Convention? I am sure the Convention would be pleased to contribute a reasonable compensation for good vocal and instrumental music. Where shall we get it?

H. L. Green.

P. S. From letters I am receiving daily I am confident this will be a gathering of thousands. H. L. G.

The Ten Commandments.

In Exodus (xx, 3-17) are given what we call the Ten Commandments. They are repeated by Moses (Deut v, 7 21). In Deuteronomy (v, 22) Moses tells what he failed to tell us in Exodus, that these are the words written by God on two tables of stone and delivered unto him.

The first mention we have of two tables of stone occurs in Exodus (xxxi, 18), where they are called, "Two tables of testimony, tables of stone, written with the finger of God." The next account we have of these two stone tables occurs in Exodus xxxii, 19, where we are told Moses got angry and broke them at the foot of the mountain. The next account we have of them is in Exodus xxxiv, 1-28, which is the first place in which we are told what was written on them.

The Lord told Moses to hew out two tables of stone, like unto the first which he had broken, and bring them up with him unto the mount; and the Lord promised to write upon these the words that were in the first tables. Moses did as he was commanded, and the Lord delivered unto him the Ten Commandments, the words of the covenant, and commanded Moses to write them upon the two tables of stone, which Moses did. These commandments are given in verses 12-26, and are as follows:

"Take heed to thyself lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee. But ye shall destroy their altars, break down their images and cut down their groves; for thou shalt worship no other God, for the Lord whose name is Jealous is a jealous God, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee and thou eat of his sacrifice, and thou take of their daughters unto thy sons, and their daughters go a-whoring after their gods and make thy sons go a-whoring after their gods.

2. Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.

3. The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep. Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread, as I commanded thee, in the time of the month Abib; for in the month Abib thou camest out from Egypt.

4. All that openeth the matrix is mine; and every firstling among thy cattle, whether ox or sheep, that is male. But the firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb, and if thou redeem him not, then thou shalt break his neck. All the first born of thy sons thou shalt redeem, and none shall appear before me empty.

5. Six days shalt thou work, but on the seventh day thou shalt rest; in earing-time and in harvest thou shalt rest.

6. And thou shalt observe the feast of weeks, of the first fruits of wheat-harvest and the feast of ingathering at the year's end.

7. Thrice in the year shall all your men-children appear before the Lord God, the God of Israel; for I will cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders; neither shall any man desire thy land when thou shalt go up to appear before the Lord thy God thrice in the year.

8. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leaven; neither shall the sacrifice of the feast of the passover be left unto the morning.

9. The first of the first fruits of thy land thou shalt bring unto the house of the Lord thy God.

10. Thou shalt not seethe the kid in his mother's milk."

In the 27th verse Moses continues: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words; for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel. . . . Verse 28. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the Ten Commandments.

The above are the Ten Commandments which, according to the 34th chapter of Exodus were written upon the two tables of stone, and according to the first verse they are the same words that were written on the first tables.

But in Deut. v. 7-21, Moses gives the Ten Commandments which we Gentiles generally acknowledge, and which we so often see placed conspicuously in churches. In the 22nd verse Moses says: "These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly in the mount, out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice; and he added no more. And he wrote them in two tables of stone and delivered them unto me."

From the above it is evident that the Lord gave unto Moses two sets of ten commandments, and that he wrote each set on two tables of stone. It is also evident that the set given in Exodus 34 was written on the two tables of stone that were broken, and re-written on other two tables.

The writer of Exodus seems not to have known that the set given Exodus 20th was written upon tables of stone. It is hardly likely, therefore, that Moses wrote the book of Exodus, as he could not have neglected to mention so important a fact, especially as he was obliged to lug these stone tables down the mountain in his other hand.

The Lord had these commandments written (most likely engraven as on modern tombstones) on tables of stone as the most durable method he could devise. But we see how easily it is for the Lord to be mi-taken. Had the Ten Commandments not been preserved longer than the stones on which they were written, they would not have been known for the last two thousand years; and men would have been allowed to steal and murder and break the Sabbath, and seethe kids in their mother's milk, all this time; and what a fearful world it would have been!

But, how singular it is that none of all these six tables of stone can be found now! Why don't Layard, or Schleiman, or some other antiquarian go and dig about the foot of Mount Sinai? He would be sure to find the fragments of the first two tables just where Moses broke them; and they would be a rare prize for a curiosity-hunter. The fragments could be fixed together now with modern cement, so as to be nearly as good as new.

The other four tables are probably in Jerusalem, as Layard failed to find them in Babylon, but the fragments of the first two tables would be better worth hunting for, as they were written upon by the finger of God. The others were only the work of Moses. M.

Rationalism.

In a recent address Mr. Frothingham alluded to the difference in the faiths of the rationalist and the believer in the popular theology, and concluded by saying that "the rationalist knows what he can and what he cannot do. He does what he can, and leaves the rest undone." The tendency of the discourse, if we do not mistake it, as reported, was to show that, other things being equal, the rationalist was more sensible than the Christian, because he did not undertake the infinitely difficult task of explaining the moral and physical discrepancies in the universe.

People who lean toward Christianity, who have a tendency to believe in the religious theory imbibed from their parents, will naturally ask which is the better off, the rationalist or the Christian. The latter believes in a God of infinite goodness and mercy, and is obliged to reconcile this belief with the unspeakable misery there is and always has been in the world, so far as the mind of man has been able to explore. He believes that Christ is at the same time the Son of and identical with this God, and is obliged to reconcile the assimilation of a human and finite with a divine and infinite nature. He believes that there is a heaven, where the good will live in perfect bliss forever, and he may or may not believe that there is a hell, where the lost will suffer forever—for the tendency of modern theology seems to be to do away with this old notion of hell. But the Christian, if he believe merely in a heaven of supreme and endless bliss, is obliged to reconcile this with the possession of a free will by erring creatures, and the pain and misery which often result to sentient beings simply from the operation of the laws of nature and by no fault of their own.

The rationalist is cut off at a blow from all these unhappy necessities. He is not called upon to explain or reconcile any of the apparent contradictions. He simply knows that he is here, that some inscrutable power has brought him here, and that sooner or later he will go hence—where, if anywhere, he does not know. He intends here to be guided by reason and to let the future take care of itself. He gives himself no concern for the future, because he sees that no concern he can give himself can possibly ward off its terrors, if there be any, or accelerate its possibly approaching blessings. His satisfaction comes not in avoiding imaginary punishment nor in laboring to secure suppositious happiness, but in doing the duty of the hour and in accepting only what his reason sanctions.—Telegram.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

Dear Friend Bennett: I received the Bennett-Teed discussion, all bound up in a neat, pretty volume of a 150 pages. I value this last addition to my Truth Seeker library more especially for the eight letters of thy own which it contains, and which are written in the plain, argumentative, inimitable, and common sense style that all lovers and admirers of The Truth Seeker have so well learned to appreciate and enjoy.

But even the "Teedious" letters of Cyrus Romulus are well worth a perusal, presenting as they do a new phase of the old Christian mythology done up in a new shape and form. A little metaphysical and obscure perhaps, but then it is a well known fact that many people have a reverence for what they cannot comprehend. Like the old Scotch lady, who, when asked one Sabbath if she understood the discourse, answered indignantly, "Had I had the presumption."

But if Teed is not exactly clear and plain, Bennett is enough to more than make it up. Mr. Slenker when especially pleased with some wide-awake, sharp thing or humorously good-natured article or criticism of said Bennett, often paraphrases the old poet thus:

"Read Bennett once, and you can read no more.
For all books else appear so mean, so poor;
Verse will seem prose—but still persist to read.
And Bennett's will be all the books you need."

KIDDER'S

SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents, which will be forwarded, post-paid, to any address on receipt of price. K. P. KIDDER.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

Gems of Thought.

EVERY man is his own greatest dupe.—W. R. Alger.

IF thou art a master, be sometimes blind; if a servant, sometimes deaf.—Fuller.

THE individual soul should seek for an intimate union with the soul of the universe.—Novalis.

THE man who melts with social sympathy, though not allied, is better than a thousand kinsmen of more worth.—Euripides.

IF you would be pungent, be brief; for it is with words as with sunbeams, the more they are condensed, the deeper they burn.—Saxe.

A TRUE man never frets about his place in the world, but just slides into it by the gravitation of his nature, and swings there as easily as a star.—Chapin.

WE all dread a bodily paralysis, and would make use of every contrivance to avoid it, but none of us is troubled about a paralyis of the soul.—Epictetus.

TO KNOW a man, observe how he wins his object, rather than how he loses it; for when we fail, our pride supports us; when we succeed, it betrays us.—Colton.

DO YOU want to know the man against whom you have most reason to guard yourself? Your looking-glass will give you a very fair likeness of his face.—Whately.

If you wish success in life, make perseverance your bosom friend, experience your wise counsellor, caution your elder brother, and hope your guardian genius.—Addison.

THERE is nothing in this bad world like sympathy; it is so becoming to the soul and face, sets to soft music the harmonious sigh, and robes sweet friendship in a Brussels lace.—Byron.

WHEN you doubt between words, use the plainest, the commonest, the most idiomatic. Eschew fine words as you would rouge; love simple ones as you would native roses on your cheek.—Hare.

IT is not the man who is beside himself, but he who is cool and collected, who is master of his countenance, of his voice, of his actions, of his gestures, of every part of his play, who can work upon others at his pleasure.—Diderot.

THE great highroad of human welfare lies along the old highway of steadfast well-doing; and they who are the most persistent, and work in the truest spirit, will invariably be the most successful. Success treads on the heels of every right effort.—Smiles.

AFTER all, let a man take what pains he may to hush it down, a human soul is an awful, ghostly, unquiet possession for a bad man to have. Who knows the metes and bounds of it? Who knows all its awful perhapses—those shudderings and tremblings, which it can no more live down than it can outlive its own eternity.—Mrs. Stowe.

WHERE are Shakspere's imagination, Bacon's learning, Galileo's dream? Where is the sweet fancy of Sidney, the airy spirit of Fletcher, and Milton's thought severe? Methinks such things should not die and dissipate, when a hair can live for centuries, and a brick of Egypt will last three thousand years. I am content to believe that the mind of man survives, somehow or other, his clay.—Barry Cornwall.

GRACEFUL, particularly in youth, is the tear of sympathy, and the heart that melts at the tale of woe; we should not permit ease and indulgence to contract our affections, and wrap us up in a selfish enjoyment. But we should accustom ourselves to think of the distresses of human life, of the solitary cottage, the dying parent, and the weeping orphan. Nor ought we ever to sport with pain and distress in any of our amusements, or treat even the meanest insect with wanton cruelty.—Blair.

SOME authors write nonsense in a clear style, and others sense in an obscure one; some can reason without being able to persuade, and others can persuade without being able to reason; some dive so deep that they descend into darkness, and others soar so high that they give us no light; and some, in a vain attempt to be cutting and dry, give us only that which is cut and dried. We should labor, therefore, to treat with ease of things that are difficult; with familiarity of things that are novel; and with perspicuity of things that are profound.—Colton.

NO PERSON can believe in a good God and in a literal hell. A good being would instantly put out all the fires and teach the wicked how to become virtuous and blest. A being who could create men, knowing that even one in ten millions would go to such a hell, is himself worse than a quintillion of devils all combined in one. It is a grand and magnificent relief to the Infidel mind to feel and know that this glorious old universe is not the offspring of, or controlled by, such a malignant, diabolical, flagitous fiend as the awful doctrine of hell-fire implies.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

IT is a truly sublime spectacle when in the stillness of the night, in an unclouded sky, the stars, like the world's choir, rise and set, and as it were divide existence into two portions; the one belonging to the earthly, is silent in the perfect stillness of the night; while the other alone comes forth in sublimity, pomp, and majesty. Viewed in this light, the starry heavens truly exercise a moral influence over us; and who can readily stray into the paths of immortality if he has been accustomed to live amidst such thoughts and feelings, and frequently to dwell upon them? How are we entranced by the simple splendors of this wonderful drama of nature!—Humboldt.

Odds and Ends.

DISORDERLY—The weather.

VESTED right—Pull it down.

MORNING rappers—Milkmen.

A SWEET rascal—A sugar beet.

AN optical delusion—Glass eye.

DESPERATE game—A stag at bay

A CELEBRATED case—A printer's.

MEMBERS of the ton—Coal dealers.

How to get along in this world—Walk.

REGISTED manuscript—Notes at protest.

To open a dead lock—Use a skeleton key.

WHAT beats a good wife? A bad husband.

TRAMPS say, "There is arrest for the weary."

To what port is a man in love bound?—Havre.

A VERY bad Judge—The man who tries his friends.

THE more suits at law, the less suits go on your back.

ORANGE peel is said to make excellent slippers (on a sidewalk).

How may a man always become four handed?—By doubling his fists.

"Lawks!" exclaimed Mrs. Partington, "what monsters those master builders must be. I am told that some of 'em have as many as a hundred hands."

"JENNIE, what makes you such a bad girl?" "Well, mamma, God sent you just the best children he could find, and if they don't suit you I can't help it."

A STROLLING theatrical company was at the dinner-table. A waiter approached one of the members, and said: "Soup?" "No, sir," replied the guest, "I am one of the musicians."

A CHRONIC growler, who lived in a boarding-house, kept the landlady in a state of torment all through the holidays by always remarking, at meal-time, "Things are getting tough, I tell you."

"QUITE correct, my dear; the natives of South Africa do not require clothes to keep them warm, because they are Hottentots; don't you see? Coolies are a different sort of people altogether. So are the people of Chili."

"WHO was the doubting disciple?" asked the Sunday-school teacher. "Peter," promptly replied the smart bad boy. "No, Thomas," said the teacher. "Then what do people always say Petered out for?" asked the smart bad boy.

"DIDN'T you guarantee that that horse wouldn't shy before the discharge of a cannon?" said a cavalry officer to a horse-dealer. "Yes, I did, and I'll stick to it," replied the dealer, "he never shies until after the cannon is fired."

DENTIST to old lady about purchasing some false teeth.—"For mastication, my dear madam, they can only be surpassed by nature herself." Old lady.—"O, laws, doctor! I don't care nothing about the mastication if I can only chaw with 'em."

A WICKED Connecticut man being recently taken ill, and believing he was about to die, told a neighbor that he felt the need of preparation for the next world, and would like to see some proper person in regard to it. Immediately the feeling friend sent for a fire insurance agent.

WORDS.

BELLE—"Mamma, what do the angels have for dinner?"

Mamma—"Angels are spirits, dear, and have no need of dinner."

Belle (thoughtfully)—"Then I suppose, Mamma, they have an egg with their tea—Judy.

HE had proposed to her, and now with fear and trembling waited for her answer. "Only one word," he said, "if but to keep alive the fires of hope within my bosom." She looked at him tenderly, nay, lovingly, and her lips moved in accents that went to the depth of his soul. She had asked him how much he earned a week.

"A POW'FUL SKEERY TIME."

Old Jefferson Jones was smoking his pipe,
And Jim was on his knee;
The father gave his mouth a wipe,
And kissed his darling wee.

"A story yer wants, an' I'll be boun!"
Cried lively Jefferson Jones;
"Now speak up quick, an' then git down,
Fur Dad mus' rest his bones."

The old man straight was brought to taw,
His boy spoke up and out.
"Well, Dad," said he, "that great big waw—
South and North—what was't about?"

Old Jefferson scratched his grizzly head,
And gazed into the fire,
Then tilted his chair against the bed,
And mentally tuned his lyre.

"Speak Dad," the eager urchin cried,
"An' tell me all the story—
Describe the waw—its pawmp an' pride,
An' all its other ga-lory."

"Waal, boy," said Jones, "we fit an' fout,
An' fout an' fit like crime,
An' the waw—it wus, beyon' a doubt,
A pow'ful skeery time."

The veteran paused, and closed his eyes—
Anon there came a snore;
"But Dad," spoke Jim in blank surprise,
"Ain't there a little more?"

"Waal, yaas," old Jones replied, "the waw,
In story and in rhyme.
Soun's mighty gran', but we uns say,
A pow'ful skeery time!"

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 27. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, July 6, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

PERE HYACINTHE, who is lecturing in Paris, draws small and inferior audiences. His popularity is a thing of the past.

BEER and music will not mix in Boston, where all attempts to establish such gardens as are fashionable in most other cities have failed.

IN one of the freedmen's schools a lad was to receive a prize banner for reciting the Ten Commandments. He advanced to the platform, and the Superintendent asked him his name. His reply was, "Well, sah, mas'r calls me Cap'n, but my maiden name's Moses." The school smiled.

MR. MONGIARDINO, an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Buenos Ayres, has been stoned to death for selling Bibles. Will not our good Bible Society take warning by this evident display of special providence? If God did not want that man stoned, would he have been stoned?

SOME of the churches in Yonkers ring their bells half an hour after the other churches have begun services. Yonkers is excited about it. The late bell-ringers say that the other churches begin half an hour too early. Perhaps they will keep on this holy ringing until they wring each others' necks.

DEACON BOSTWICK was missed on Sunday from his accustomed pew in a Detroit church, and in the afternoon he was absent from the Sunday-school, of which he was Superintendent. The reason was that his stealings from his employer, after being continued nine years, and amounting to $15,000, had at last been discovered, and he had fled from the city.

A BOY who had a taste for menageries was naughty, one day, and to frighten him his mother told him the story of the wicked boys of Bethel, who cried out to the prophet, "Go up, thou baldhead," and were destroyed by forty-two bears. Soon after the boy stole out in the street and waited for a bald-headed man. When one came along he cried out boldly, "Go up, thou baldhead! Now bring on your bears."

THREE judges of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania recently addressed one Bible anniversary at Harrisburg, Pa. They are said to be good judges of Biblical truth. Possibly it is a good arrangement for our judges and lawyers to become expounders of divine law as well as civil law. If they could only take the entire business in hand and attend to it, thereby releasing nearly 70,000 preachers, it would save the country at least $100,000,000 yearly.

THERE was a bit of sharpshooting the other evening in a Methodist church in Tennessee. The pastor, who served in the war as a Union soldier, suffered in a battle the loss of an eye. He was speaking in prayer-meeting on the glories of heaven, and an ex-Confederate chimed in, saying, "Yes, brother, there will be no one-eyed saints in glory." The pastor replied: "That's so; for there will be no rebels there to shoot their eyes out." There was no response of "Glory hallelujah" on the part of the ex-Confederate.

THE Danish Government has published a small book of statistics. The total population of the kingdom exceeds 2,000,000, of whom 1,959,000 live in Denmark proper, 72,000 in Iceland, 9,800 in Greenland, and 37,500 in the West Indian colonies. The population of Copenhagen and its suburbs is about 250,000. The average duration of life in Denmark is fifty years, while in England it is forty-five, in France thirty-two, and in Italy only thirty; but the number of suicides is large, and increases every year, the majority being by hanging.

A MAN who is now a leading Hartford clergyman was in 1846 a student at the Academy of Wilbraham, Mass. He loved a village maiden and she loved him. But finding that he was not "a believer in the Lord," her conscience quickened, and with tears in her eyes, she sent him word that she must give him up, and then married a commonplace fellow who had joined the Church. Within the last few months the wife has got a divorce from her husband and is living in reduced circumstances, and her rejected lover is one of the ablest pastors in the State.

BISHOP PENNICK writes from Cape Palmas, Africa, concerning the proposed emigration to that land of 150,000 colored people from America, that it will take one hundred and fifty years to put them there. If the bishop were to see the state of things among the disappointed darkeys of South Carolina, now that they have heard of the disastrous voyage of the Azor to Liberia, he would soon make up his mind that it would take about 10,000 years to move 150,000 of them. The fact is that they had better stay and sing hallelujah where they have been brought up than hurry away to fill graves in unhealthy Liberia.

A GOOD SNAKE STORY.—Young Newton dropped into our office yesterday, says a Covington (Ky.) paper, and gave us the particulars of a difficulty he witnessed between a large rattlesnake and a cat. The snake was trying to get through a fence on Duell Bush's plantation, when a large cat, supposed to belong to Thomas Petty, made an attack upon the serpent. After the cat had caught the snake with its teeth and drew it back, it looked as if it was dead. The cat immediately began to eat the reptile, and at the first entrance of the cat's teeth in the snake's flesh it revived, and struck the cat in the mouth, causing instant death. After this the snake swallowed the cat and endeavored to travel. Young Newton then killed the snake and cut it open, finding the cat, supposed to be instantly killed, and was astounded to see it crawl out and devour the dead snake.

THE Presbyterian says that pork is cheaper to-day than it has been for thirty years. The Presbyterian Banner says, "Horse and mule shoes continue quiet and unchanged." The National Baptist says: "The brother who gives a bond or subscription to any institution which has for its object advancement of Christ's cause, and fails to pay when payment is possible, is guilty of the sin of Ananias and Sapphira." The Congregationalist wants to know whether anybody prays for editors. The Methodist remarks that "there are a large number of our subscribers who have not paid up and from whom we have not heard." The Alliance has discovered that the failure of the Woman's Hotel enterprise was owing "to the efforts of the exceedingly witty but painfully narrow-minded paragraphers of the press;" and the Independent pleasantly suggests that Rev. Justin D. Fulton, D.D., "had better allow his corpse to stay buried," instead of digging it up to diffuse an unpleasant flavor.

"A BLASPHEMER ROOTED TO THE EARTH.—A lady from near Sugar Valley, Ga., says that a man was plowing in the field a week or so ago, during which he uttered the wish that God would have to plow in the heat of the sun as he was forced to do. Immediately upon uttering these words he stopped still, as if turned to stone, and it is positively asserted that he was rooted to the spot, and that two horses failed to pull him away. He was still there when last heard from." The foregoing item is going the rounds of the Christian press, and is evidently intended to frighten Infidels; but Infidels are not frightened by such scarecrows. They only laugh at them. What a God for sensible people to worship! Yet there are sensible people who worship this monstrous conception of Deity. If a man had the power to take such vindictive revenge for so trifling an offense, and should use that power as this Sugar Valley God has used it, he would be regarded as a mean, contemptible, vile, despicable, base, malignant wretch for doing such a dirty, infamous, damnable, deed; and he would be immediately taken out and lynched by his justice-loving neighbors.

THE NEGRO CREATED BEFORE ADAM.—Prof. Alexander Winchell of Syracuse University has reprinted in pamphlet form, with the title, Adamites and Pre-Adamites, an essay originally published by him in the Northern Christian Advocate, designed to show that the negro race was in existence on this globe long before the time of Adam. He favors, also, reforming the popularly received chronology, and would place the creation described in Genesis 10,500 years before the birth of Abraham, or 14,378 years before the present era. At the same time he would bring down the stone and lake-dwelling ages to within a period of not more than 6,000 years ago. In this way, he thinks, the Biblical record can be made to agree with the established facts of modern ethnological, philological, and geological research. Some special interest attaches to his views, because the publication of them has led to his dismissal from the Vanderbilt University, at Nashville, Tenn., where, in addition to his Syracuse professorship, he held the chair of historical geology and zoology. In spite of his earnest protestation of orthodoxy, the President of the University insisted that he was an evolutionist, and an enemy of "the plan of redemption," and he had to go. The tone in which Dr. Winchell speaks of those theologians who would set up their peculiar interpretation of the Bible against scientific truth, is anything but respectful, and partially accounts for the loss of his professorship at Vanderbilt University. He classes them with "men who also hold the opinion that witches ride broomsticks through the air, and that the stars were created two days before Adam, though some of them are so distant that their light has been a hundred thousand years in reaching us." He says, again: "A faith that has had to surrender the geocentric theory, and the denial of antipodes, and of the high geological antiquity of the world, should have learned to discriminate between religious faiths and scientific opinions." With his conclusion none, however, can find fault. "Every theory must be subjected to appropriate tests. If it stands, it becomes a new revelation of God's mind; if it falls, our trepidation over the supposed consequences becomes ridiculous."

THIS is the way Gail Hamilton concludes a vigorous review of Rev. James Freeman Clarke in the N. Y. Tribune. Very notable is the contrast she draws between that Rev. and Colonel Ingersoll: "Confidence," says Mr. Clark, making the regulation shy at Burke, "'Confidence,' says Burke, 'is a plant of slow growth.'" "Dunces and common politicians," "indecorous, vulgar, and malignant Senators," have hitherto supposed it was Pitt who made the remark, and have not plumed themselves on their erudition by that token; but since the elegant accuracy of Mr. Clarke's superior scholarship has transferred it to Mr. Burke, palsied be the hand that would claim it for any Pitt! Confidence in clergymen is a plant of impossible growth, so long as they trample it down, rough-shod. It is but another battle—a mere skirmish indeed, in the old war of authority against reason. Truer to his cloth than to his creed, the Rev. James Freeman Clarke rises in his pulpit to fulminate anathemas against opinions. With snap-judgment he makes up his clerical mind on financial and political questions which have divided the wise and the good in financial and political circles the world over—I might almost say the world through—drags them instantly into the domain of morals, and denounces as dishonest, cowardly, malignant, indecorous, and vulgar, all those who do not agree with him. It is such utterances as these of Mr. Clarke's—Pharisaical, arrogant, ignorant, yet self-satisfied—that makes Massachusetts, with all her benevolence and beneficence, her intellectual power and her ancient honor, hated and hateful. It is because there is another Massachusetts than this; it is because her hillsides and her valleys nourish another blood, that we can look without shame for the present at her past, without foreboding to her future. Is there any of this red blood in the pulpit—red and real, leaping and warm, true to truth and brave for truth? Why then do the clergy present to the world the astonishing spectable of a band of watchmen on the walls of Zion occupying themselves with sending spent balls into the political camp, while a vigilant and powerful enemy is undermining their own? Is it a time for false, feeble, futile diatribes against Congressmen, when that Philistine of Philistines, that Goliah of Gath, the infidel Ingersoll, looms up on Boston Heights at his own sweet will, with his horrible stature of six cubits and a span, with his greaves of brass and his staff like a weaver's beam, walking up and down in open day, deriding and defying the armies of Israel, drawing after him deserters by the hundred and by the thousand; while David and all the striplings and all the men of war chatter along the brooks, and fill their bags with smooth stones and sling them around at random with much harm to each other, and scowl savagely over at Goliath, but never so much as move in his direction, let alone hitting him in the forehead?

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

As Rose spoke she unfolded a large, closely-written sheet and read as follows:

"MY DEAR, DARLING, TRUE FRIEND: I have apparently acted shabbily towards you in not fulfilling my agreement to be at your wedding according to promise, but I know your kind heart will pardon me when you hear my sad story. I must tell my troubles to some one, or I shall die. I will make a clean breast of it to you, and you shall then advise me what to do. When we made our compact you little thought I was already engaged to be married, or that when I was talking to you of finding a good pious man to love, that I had already made my selection. It was really a fact, dear Rose, but I did not dare let you suspect it, for he had expressly enjoined it upon me that I should not let any one know that he was anything more than a commonplace acquaintance of mine. We rarely met at that time save at parties, public gatherings, or at church, so it was easy to keep our secret. But I am ahead of my story, and will go back and tell you who this he was. You remember the young Methodist preacher who was on this circuit when you left for Virginia? Well, he had been my lover, and we were engaged before you moved from here; but no one knew it save our two selves. He often met me when I would be walking out, and sometimes waited on me home from a party or evening meeting, just as he did lots of the other young ladies, who were all proud of the attention of the smart young preacher. Whenever he was alone with me he was very loving and affectionate, and told me I was the only girl he ever saw whom he felt as if he could really love and care for. But in the presence of others he was cold, indifferent, and generally devoted to some one else; to blind people, he said, and I was only too ready to believe him. You remember the night we all took a boat-ride in the new boat, and Lulu fell out and came near drowning? Well, he went home with me that night, and, as it was late when we got there, all were in bed, and we sat on the porch till nearly daybreak; and then it was that he first told me he loved me; but added that his uncle was determined he should marry a protegee of his own, and would disinherit him unless he seemed to fall in with his desires; but that he was on his death-bed, and that as soon as he died he would then be his own master and heir to large property, and I should be made a real lady and be able to dress in silks and wear diamonds, also, if I wished. Soon after you left here, he commenced coming to see me once or twice a week, at eleven o'clock at night, when all the house, save myself, would be wrapped in slumber. My bed-room door opens on a back porch, and I would slip quietly out, and we would spend several hours in the sweet dalliance that lovers always enjoy so well. I grew to love him with that passionate worship that only a young, lonely, love-stricken girl can experience, who has never before let her heart go out towards one of the opposite sex. I thought him the perfect embodiment of all manly perfections, and pure, holy, and sinless as the angels above. When he preached, I listened with all my heart in my eyes. I knew, in my inmost mind, that no other man had ever spoken such eloquent, earnest, and all-convincing words. I am certain that he could not have advanced any dogma, however absurd, that I should not have at once accepted as God's own truths; that he was divinely inspired, I never once doubted; or that he had higher and holier truths revealed to him from the pure fountain of all truths than any other man had ever received. Handsome as Apollo's own self, agreeable, winning, and really talented besides, he had everything in his favor. I never, during our whole acquaintance, missed hearing a single one of his sermons; and, as I learned to love him more and more each day, so did each succeeding sermon seem more and more as if uttered especially for me, they embodied so many of the ideas, sentiments, and very expressions of our dear, sweet talks that I felt that I was in his mind as he wrote, and as he preached them; and this delicate, subtle flattery was very precious to me, and I fed upon it till I was perfectly intoxicated with love and bliss unutterable.

"I no longer wonder, in view of my dear-bought experience, that preachers have so many lovers and admirers among women. They have the very best chance in the world to work upon our feelings and ingratiate themselves into our affections, both by preaching in public and counseling in private. They are always objects of veneration, reverence, and respect to all around them, for are they not mouthpieces of the Almighty himself? a sort of railway between heaven and earth, bringing, to a sin-cursed world, messages of love, mercy, and hope?

"Well, to make a long story short, he pleaded, coaxed, and persuaded. I loved, worshiped, adored, and fell. He promised marriage as soon as he was free to do as he wished, and called our love a pure, sacred, and holy thing; and told me that, as he was a preacher, he could legally marry himself, and actually went through a sort of ceremony to that effect, and my conscience was, therefore, at rest, though I still feared and dreaded the world should discover our intimacy and think evil of us. I tried not to hope his uncle's days might be shortened, yet I now know that I did hope and long for him to die; and, if wishes are prayers, I was guilty of praying for his death, so that our marriage might be legally acknowledged and we might be together always and forever, and I might claim my idol, with a proud exultation, before God and man, as my own.

"At last he was called to another circuit, and I was in despair at the idea of separation and at the thought of being left in my situation to battle with loneliness and the dread of what might happen should my secret be discovered prematurely, for I was to become a mother in a few months. He said he would come for me in two weeks, as his uncle could not live many days longer; so I resigned myself to the fiat of the inevitable, and saw him ride off, proudly watching him as he bowed his farewells at each house he passed, till a bend in the road hid him from my view.

"One, two, three weeks passed, and no letter from him. I was almost crazy with anxiety and suspense, fearing he was ill, or, perhaps, dead. At last a letter came. The hand was disguised, but I knew too well the dear and loved characters to be deceived. I hurried to my room, locked the door, and tore it open. How I ever read it I cannot tell, but I did read every word before I stopped, even to shed a tear. He began by telling me at once that all was over between us; that our marriage was only a farce, and I had been a goose to think it could be anything else; that his uncle was dead, and he had married the sweetheart of his boyhood, whom he had always loved and intended to marry as soon as he got his inheritence; that she was a lady, and beautiful as an angel; a poetess, and worth fifty thousand dollars in her own right. He said he had never really loved me, but that he was pleased with my pretty face and girlish innocence, and my society had served to while away a dull year; and, to cover any disappointment, he sent me five hundred dollars. He said that money would heal all wounds, and I could go to some obscure place, get rid of my child, and come back none the worse for our little intrigue. He even sent me some medicine, with directions how to use it, that it might produce an abortion. It was the coldest, cruelest, and most heartless letter I ever read; and, passionately as I had loved him, I felt every spark of affection die out before I reached the end of the street. It was simply signed 'A.,' which was the middle letter of his initials; and inclosed was a blue ribbon that he had once playfully taken from my neck and tied in his button hole. There was nothing to betray the writer in it at all, should a stranger see it; but, even had there been, he need not have feared I should ever make use of it. I felt no desire for revenge—no jealousy of her who had become his wife. I did not care even to send him one word in return. I only felt that he was a mean, contemptible hypocrite, a villainous scoundrel, and a heartless wretch. I had loved an ideal. I despised the real. I remembered, even at that moment of calm despair, how I had often sang for him the lines of Moore:

"'I know not, I ask not, if guilt's in thy heart,
I know that I love thee whatever thou art'

"But now I knew the lines were not the utterance of a pure and noble soul—of one that could only love the pure, the true, and the really beautiful. 'Whatever thou art!' Could I ever love such a detestable hypocrite and would-be murderer as this vile man had proved to be? No! a thousand times no! I might pity him, I might even aid and assist him in his need, or care for him in sickness, but love, respect, or affection I could never more feel for him.

"I pass over the trial of confessing my condition to my friends, and of my expulsion from Church; suffice it to say I refused to reveal to any one the name of my false lover, whose identity has never even been suspected, so careful had he been to cover all his tracks as he went along. The money he sent I felt I had a right to, and at once put four hundred and fifty dollars of it on interest, retaining the other fifty to pay my expenses through child-birth. My babe is a little girl, and is three weeks old to-day. I want to name her Rose, but fear you would feel it a disgrace to have the poor little 'come-by-chance' called after you, so I only call her 'baby' as yet. Perhaps you wonder why I did not leave home, as he advised me to, even if I decided to let my child live. Well, I have, as you know, always believed in being just what I am. I never deceived or tried to seem aught but what I was, and, if I did wrong, I faced it boldly. I think those that have nothing hidden are, by far, the happiest people, for they are never afraid of being found out or talked about. True, I did consent to and aid in keeping our love secret, but not because I cared or wished to hide it. I did it, as I have said before, for his sake and at his command. But live a whole life of deception I never will. I did not betray my lover's name, because it could do no possible good. He is married, and will probably deceive no more innocent girls; and for his wife's sake, if for nothing else, I will be silent.

Please burn this when read, or, at least, let no one see it who will be apt to make mischief from it. I send you my best wishes, and rejoice in your happiness.

Yours as ever (if you will),

"TENNESSEE."

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

We may well ask, What do our so-called "educated" circles, who think so much of the high civilization of the 19th century, known of these most important biological facts, of these indispensable foundations for understanding their own organism? How much do our speculative philosophers and theologians know about them, who fancy they can arrive at an understanding of the human organism by mere guesswork or divine inspiration? What indeed do the majority of naturalists, not excepting the majority of the so-called "zoologists" (including the entomologists!), know about them?

SIMILARITY OF MAN'S AND DOG'S EMBRYO.

The answer to this question tells much to the shame of the persons above indicated, and we must confess, willingly or unwillingly, that these invaluable facts of human ontogeny are, even at the present day, utterly unknown to most people, or are in no way valued as they deserve to be. It is in the face of such a condition of things as this that we see clearly upon what a wrong and one-sided road the much vaunted culture of the 19th century still moves. Ignorance and superstition are the foundations upon which most men construct their conception of their own organism and its relation to the totality of things; and these palpable facts of the history of development, which might throw the light of truth upon them, are ignored. It is true these facts are not calculated to excite approval among those who assume a thorough difference between man and the rest of nature, and who will not acknowledge the animal origin of the human race. That origin must be a very unpleasant truth to members of the ruling and privileged castes in those nations among which there exists an hereditary division of social classes, in consequence of false ideas about the laws of inheritance. It is well known that, even in our day, in many civilized countries the idea of hereditary grades of rank goes so far, that, for example, the aristocracy imagine themselves to be of a nature totally different from that of ordinary citizens, and nobles who commit a disgraceful offense are punished by being expelled from the caste of nobles, and thrust down among the pariahs of "vulgar citizens." What are these nobles to think of the noble blood which flows in their privileged veins, when they learn that all human embryos, those of nobles as well as commoners, during the first two months of development, are scarcely distinguishable from the tailed embryos of dogs and other mammals?

As the object of these pages is solely to further the general knowledge of natural truths, and to spread, in wider circles, a natural conception of the relations of man to the rest of nature, I shall be justified if I do not pay any regard to the widely spread prejudice in favor of an exceptional and privileged position for man in creation, and simply give here the embryological facts from which the reader will be able to draw conclusions affirming the groundlessness of those prejudices. I wish all the more to entreat him to reflect carefully upon these facts of ontogeny, as it is my firm conviction that a general knowledge of them can only promote the intellectual advance, and thereby the mental perfecting, of the human race.

Amidst all the infinitely rich and interesting material which lies before us in the ontogeny of vertebrate animals, that is, in the history of their individual development, I shall here confine myself to showing some of those facts which are of the greatest importance to the Theory of Descent in general, as well as in its special application to man. Man is at the beginning of his individual existence a simple egg, a single little cell, just the same as every animal organism which originates by sexual generation. The human egg is essentially the same as that of all other mammals, and cannot be distinguished from the egg of the higher mammals. Not only the form and structure, but even the size of the egg in most mammals is the same as in man, namely, about the 120th part of an inch in diameter, so that the egg under favorable circumstances, with the naked eye, can just be perceived as a small speck. The differences which really exist between the eggs of different mammals and that of man do not consist in the form, but in the chemical mixture, in the molecular composition of the albuminous combination of carbon, of which the egg essentially consists. These minute individual differences of all eggs, which depend upon indirect or potential adaptation (and especially upon the law of individual adaptation), are indeed not directly perceptible to the exceedingly imperfect sense of man, but are cognizable through indirect means, as the primary causes of the difference of all individuals.

THE HUMAN EGG.

The human egg is, like that of all other mammals, a small globular bladder, which contains all the constituent parts of a simple organic cell. The most essential parts of it are the mucous cell substance, or the protoplasm, which in an egg is called the "yolk," and the cell-kernel, or nucleus, surrounded by it, which is here called by the special name of the "germinal vesicle." The latter is a deli-oate, clear, glassy globule of albumen, of about 1-600th part of an inch in diameter, and surrounds a still smaller sharply-marked, rounded granule, the kernel-speck, or the nucleolus of the cell (in the egg it is called the "germinal spot"). The outside of the globular egg cell of a mammal is surrounded by a thick pellucid membrane, the cell-membrane, or yolk-membrane, which here bears the special name of zona pellucida. The eggs of many lower animals (for example, of many Medusæ) differ from this in being naked cells, as the outer covering, or cell-membrane, is wanting.

As soon as the egg (ovulum) of the mammal has attained its full maturity, it leaves the ovary of the female, in which it originates, and passes into the oviduct, and through this narrow passage into the wider pouch or womb (uterus). If, meanwhile, the egg is fructified by the male seed (sperm), it develops itself in this pouch into an embryo, and does not leave it until perfectly developed and capable of coming into the world at birth as a young mammal.

The variations of form and transformations which the fructified egg must go through within the uterus before it assumes the form of the mammal are exceedingly remarkable, and proceed from the beginning in man in precisely the same way as in the other mammals. At first the fructified egg of the mammal acts as a single-celled organism which is about to propagate independently and increase itself; for example, an Amœba. In point of fact the simple egg-cell becomes two by the process of cell-division, which I have previously described. There arise from the single germinal spot (the small kernel speck of the original simple egg-cell) two new kernel-specks, and then in like manner, out of the germinal vesicle (the nucleus), two new cell-kernels. Then, and not until then, does the globular protoplasma first separate itself by an equatorial furrow into two halves, in such a manner that each half encloses one of the two kernels, together with its kernel-speck. Thus the simple egg-cell within the original cellular membrane has become two naked cells, each possessing its own kernel.

THE CLEAVAGE OF THE YOLK.

The same process of cell-division now repeats itself several times in succession. In this way, from two cells there arise four; from four, eight; from eight, sixteen; from sixteen, thirty-two, etc. Each time, the division of the kernel-speck precedes that of the kernel; this, again, precedes that of the cell-substance, or protoplasma. As the division of the latter always commences with the formation of a superficial annular furrow, or cleft, the whole process is usually called the furrowing of the egg, or yolk-cleavage, and the products of it, that is, the cells arising from the continued halving, are called the cleavage spheres. However, the whole process is nothing more than a simple, oft-repeated division of cells, and the products of it are actual, naked cells. Finally, through the continued division or "furrowing" of the mammal's egg, there arises a mulberry-shaped ball, which is composed of a great number of small spheres, naked cells, containing kernels. These cells are the materials out of which the body of the young mammal is constructed. Every one of us has once been such a simple mulberry-shaped ball, composed only of equi-formal cells.

The further development of the globular lump of cells which now represents the young body of the mammal, consists first in its changing into a globular bladder, as fluid accumulates within it. This bladder is called the germ-bladder (vesicula blastodermica). Its wall is at first composed of merely equi-formal cells. But soon, at one point on the wall, arises a disk-shaped thickening, as the cells here increase rapidly, and this thickening is now the foundation of the actual body of the germ or embryo, while the other parts of the germ-bladder serve only for its nutrition. The thickened disk, or foundation of the embryo, soon assumes an oblong, and then a fiddle-shaped form, in consequence of its right and left walls becoming convex. At this stage of development in the first form of their germ or embryo, not only all mammals, including man, but even all vertebrate animals in general — birds, reptiles, amphibious animals, and fishes — can either not be distinguished from one another at all, or only by very unessential differences, such as the arrangement of the egg-coverings. In all, the whole body consists of nothing but a quite simple, oblong, oval, or violin-shaped thin disc, which is composed of three closely-connected membranes or plates, lying one above another. Each of the three plates or layers of the germ consists simply of cells all exactly like one another; but each layer has a different function in the building up of the vertebrate animal body. Out of the upper or outer germ-layer arises solely the outer skin (epidermis), together with the central parts of the nervous system (spinal marrow and brain); out of the lower or inner layer arises only the inner delicate skin (epithelium) which lines the whole intestinal tube from the mouth to the anus, together with all the glands connected with it (lung, liver, salivary glands, etc.); out of the middle germ-layer lying between the two others arise all the other organs, muscles, bones, blood-vessels. Now, the processes by which the various and exceedingly complicated parts of the fully-formed body of vertebrate animals arise out of such simple material—out of the three germ-layers composed only of cells — are, in the first place, the repeated division, and consequently the increase of cells; in the second place, the division of labor or differentiation of these cells; and thirdly, the union of the variously developed or differentiated cells, for the formation of the different organs. Thus arises the gradual progress or perfecting which can be traced step by step in the development of the embryonic body. The simple embryonic cells, which are to constitute the body of the vertebrate animal, stand in the same relation to each other as citizens who wish to found a state. Some take to one occupation, others to another, and work together for the good of the whole. By this division of labor, or differentiation, and the perfecting (the organic progress) which is connected with it, it becomes possible for the whole state to accomplish undertakings which would have been impossible to the single individual. The whole body of the vertebrate animal, like every other many-celled organism, is a republican state of cells, and consequently it can accomplish organic functions which the individual cell, as a solitary individual (for example, an Amœba, or single-celled plant, could never perform.

Christianity and Materialism.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Materialism says, if there is another state of existence beyond our earthly life, it is reasonable to believe it will be entirely natural, and that we will be adapted to the conditions there, as we are to our surroundings here. If we do not exist after the dissolution of the body—and that we shall we think there is no proof—nothing awaits us worse than an everlasting rest, an eternal sleep, in which no vicissitude of earth, no event of time, shall disturb the quiet of our repose. The lightnings may flash and the thunders roll above us; the tramp of armies and the roar of battle may shake our graves; nay, the earthquake may swallow us, or the volcano bury us in ruins; the earth itself may be dissolved, and countless ages hence our bodies returned to their elements, to the great storehouse of matter, may enter into the formation of other worlds, and help make the forms of other beings who shall, like us, feel the consciousness of existence, the vigor of manhood, the joys of hope, the thrill of love, the decrepitude of age, and the pang of death, and like us, shall take their places in the great mausoleum of nature; yet to us all these things will be as though they were not. Is it a sad thought? We do not regret that we did not exist in the ages of the past. Why feel sad at the contemplation of unconsciousness in the ages to come? But as unpleasant as is this thought to those Rationalists who are accustomed to regard as probable a blissful immortality for all mankind, how pleasing the reflection of an eternal sleep in comparison with, or rather in contrast to, the expectation that while a few will be happy hereafter, the majority of our race will exist forever in excruciating and unremitting torment.

If the choice were offered him, who would not prefer the annihilation of all mankind to the unending existence of all on condition that one human being, even, only one, should suffer forever such agony as Christianity teaches is in reserve for the greater portion of mankind? We have all lost valued friends. We delight to keep their monuments whole, and their memories green. Many of them died unconverted, and even unbelieving. How sad would be the thought, if our affections would allow us to entertain it, that these friends are doomed to an eternity of torture. And should we on the morn of the resurrection find ourselves assigned to a place in heaven, would not the absence of our loved friends and a knowledge of their horrible fate make us unspeakably wretched? Would we not have to be changed to fiends before we could have a moment's unalloyed enjoyment? No wonder even Jonathan Edwards said: "We cannot but recoil from the idea of countless myriads of our fellow creatures being the victims of almighty wrath, while eternity rolls on. To our human sympathies the idea is terrible." No wonder poor Cowper was made insane by the thought of eternity. No wonder the pious and good Albert Barnes in view of the future exclaimed, "All looks dark, dark, dark." No good man can have a realizing conviction of the truth of Christianity and not be miserable. To be consistent, every Christian should be in a mad-house. "If men in general," says Leigh Hunt, "had ever seen a human being broiling in a real fire, writhing and groaning, men in general would fall on their knees to implore the quenching of hell fire, or would disbelieve its existence." Judge for yourselves, my readers, whether the thought of an unbroken everlasting sleep for all human kind, or such a future as Christianity teaches, is the more rational and ennobling.

Christianity teaches that man has received an objective revelation from God. The Bible is that alleged revelation. Centuries ago it was written in languages that were destined soon to be no longer spoken. For ages the custodians of this revelation were a narrow-minded, ignorant, exclusive people, a people that with all the light they obtained from their sacred oracles, were outstripped by the Pagan Greeks, who, by their unassisted genius were able to make their country the brightest spot on earth, and all succeeding ages their debtors, while the divinely chosen people had no taste for art, science, or philosophy, and were able to leave posterity no evidences of their wisdom or their greatness—save these oracles of which it is claimed God himself was the author. For another succession of centuries these Jewish Scriptures, together with the New Testament, were allowed to be in the hands of a Church which kept these writings in a dead language, and shut up all knowledge from the people, and whose most eminent saints deemed it a virtue to use deception and fraud whenever the interests of their religion required it (Mosheim's Ecc. Hist. vol. 1, p. 116), who not only suppressed these oracles, but corrupted them by additions, interpolations, and omissions, often to make them subserve their now selfish purposes.

Although this pretended revelation was completed, eighteen hundred years ago, it is still known to but a comparatively inconsiderable portion of mankind, while the portion that has received it is divided into hundreds of sects, all differing and wrangling about its meaning, respecting points which they generally hold are of the utmost importance to man. The advocates of this system are still disputing whether all men will exist forever, or whether the wicked will not be utterly destroyed; whether all will be saved or nearly all will be damned; whether Jesus Christ was God manifest in the flesh, or only the son of God; whether God is a triune God, or the doctrine of the Trinity is a false, heathen fancy; whether converts to the faith should be dipped into or sprinkled with water; whether Saturday or Sunday should be observed as sabbath; whether Christians destined to the same heaven, but differing as to baptism and other points, should coummune together, or one church should exclude from its sacramental feast the members of other churches; whether women should occupy the pulpit as teachers, or should be excluded therefrom; whether there is a personal devil, or he is only a figurative character; whether the destiny of human beings is fixed by election and predestination, or all have an equal chance; whether man goes to heaven or hell immediately after the death of the body, or remains unconscious till a general resurrection takes place; whether the body that dies will be raised, another body will be provided, or no body will be needed in the spiritual world. These and a hundred other questions are yet subjects of bitter controversy among the representatives of different sects.

Materialism does not admit that there is any evidence that man has received a divine revelation. We cannot think a being of infinite power and wisdom would reveal his purposes and wishes to an obscure people, and permit his revelation to be suppressed for centuries. We should suppose, too, that such a being would be able to make himself understood so that all honest people could find out what he meant to reveal. "What is worth doing is worth doing well." This very common remark applies to God—supposing his existence—as well as to man. If necessary for God to make a revelation to man, it seems to us it should have been written on the face of nature in characters not to be misunderstood, and which no man could add to, take from, or suppress. But any kind of an objective revelation, it appears to our carnal reason, implies a defect in the original constitution of man, supposes God made a mistake when he made man, which had to be remedied by an afterthought. Man is so constituted, the Materialist holds, that he has faculties and powers, by the exercise of which he can acquire knowledge and better his condition without any book revelation to guide him. The discipline and development of mind that result from his efforts to get knowledge are more valuable than his mere acquirements. Man has become what he is, we hold, by the use of his powers to better his condition. It is evident to us that all the wisdom in the Old Testament was learned by man's observation and experience. Man is more advanced now than formerly, and while he accepts what a larger experience and a more enlightened reason approve, he rejects as erroneous and foolish much that was cherished in ancient times. Observation, experience, and reason, and not a book revelation embodying the errors as well as the wisdom of the past, are the highest and best guides for man.

Christianity endorses the barbarisms of the Jews, teaches that God, through his divinely commissioned legislator, commanded fathers to stone to death their refractory sons, authorized slavery (Lev. xxv); provided for the support and perpetuation of polygamy (Deut. xxi, 15–17); gave the husband power to write a bill of divorce for the wife, without making any provision for divorce upon application of the woman (Deut. xxiv, 1); commanded Jewish soldiers to seize beautiful female captives, to make them their concubines, and to send them away when they no longer had any "delight in them" (Deut. xxi, 10–14); provided for the sale by a master of his own daughter to be a slave and concubine, (Ex. xxi, 7, 8); ordered captives of war to be put to death, men, women, and children together (Deut. xx, 10–16; Numb. xxi, 17, 18); stopped the sun and lengthened out the day to enable the freebooter Joshua to finish his infernal work of destruction; commanded the destruction of the Midianites, and told a brutal and sensual soldiery to keep for their own use the virgin daughters of fathers and mothers they had butchered on the gory battle field (Numb. xxi); ordered the Jew to kill his own brother, his own son, his own mother even, and the wife of his bosom, if they attempted to persuade him to worship after the manner of the heathens, (Deut. xiii, 6–9).

Definitions.—Obscenity.

BY THERON C. LELAND. ARTICLE VI.

Now let us go down to principles, and see what this quarrel is all about. The party that is justified by bottom-rock principles will win; the party condemned by those same principles will go under, no matter how many hoary old institutions and solemn respectabilities endorse it.

A few plain words concerning that part of our popular morals which relate to sex are now in order. It is a very practical question, is forced by the orthodox party into public prominence, and Liberals cannot, and ought not to, ignore it. The old Puritan asceticism is yet strong and living among us. The ancient—and it would almost seem undying—creed is, "It is a sin to be happy; it is godly to be miserable." The good things of this world, according to this black belief, are given to us to lure us to our destruction; and if we enjoy them we are sure of our "part in the lake which burneth," etc. A hearty laugh is a certain sign of conception in sin, and only a life-long doleful face can atone for birth in iniquity. This dark, earthward-tending spirit did seem of late years to be laid at rest. We looked upon it as an extinct volcano, and vigilance was lulled to sleep. But all of a sudden the old crater flares up into revived activity; and, before we were aware, we are involved in a new eruption of red-hot stones, flying ashes, and scorching lava. While Liberals have been reposing in fancied security, our great enemy, who goes about seeking and doing all manner of mischief, has managed quietly and stealthily to sow an awful tare in our post-office—and Anthony Comstock is the name of him. Working on the theory that man is totally depraved, and that all reference to sex is double-distilled total depravity, he has been able to bore and lobby among the members of a salary-grabbing Congress, and get a postal law enacted against carrying obscene matter in the U. S. mails. This, in itself, if it was an honest and impartial law, would not be the worst of evils; but the law leaves him and his pliant courts to be the judges of what is obscene, and is otherwise so elastic that the word obscene may be stretched to cover a scientific treatise on physiology, or even an editorial in a Liberal newspaper.

In view of these considerations, let us see if we cannot arrive at a scientific and reasonable definition of obscenity. There the word is in our language, and it ought to mean something, and that something definite. As the word is now used and legislated upon, it means everything, and consequently nothing. What does it rightly mean? Shall we define it according to the terms of science and the logic of things, or shall we go back to the old dictionary born of prudence, of bigotry, and untaught sentimentality? I know readers will prefer to hear what science says, and what physiology has to offer.

There are two classes of persons to be considered in making such a definition—ripe and unripe human beings—youths and adults. What would be obscene for children might not be for adults, and vice versa. With reference, then, to young persons, science would say that anything is obscene that would tend to a premature excitement of the sex nature, or that would cause a too early development or awakening of the passions relating to sex. Such premature development might lead to disease of body or derangement of mind, or both; is every way to be deprecated, and should be carefully guarded against. The one remedy as far as children are concerned is the watchful care of parents, physicians, and teachers; and right education at the proper age as to the laws and functions of sex.

Obscenity, as applied to the conduct of adult persons, is excess or intemperance in sex relations. Conduct or relations of sex that cause disease are obscene. The mental, orderly, and temperate manifestations of sex in adults are healthy, appropriate, and not obscene.

As regards writing, printing, picturing, or as regards conversation or personal conduct, obscenity is the uncalled for, inappropriate, or mal-apropos presentation of sex subjects or ideas. In this latter sense it is quite equivalent to bad taste, the penalties for which are criticism and exclusion from polite society. In aggravated cases, like the tampering with children or the persistent urging of a supply where there is no demand, it would come to be a crime; and crime has its just modes and degrees of punishment. But men and women not being totally depraved, and sex in animated nature not being a huge mistake as ascetics teach and ecclesiastics preach, the due and orderly manifestations of sex between adult opposites are not obscene, and of all such manifestations and relations men and women themselves, aided perhaps by their medical advisers, are, and should be, permitted to be the sole and only judges. At all events, Anthony Comstock cannot be recommended as just the daintiest and most discreet gentleman the United States could appoint to regulate such delicate affairs, and the United States mail is not the proper instrument to grapple with any difficulties that may arise. There are other remedies a long way short of so dangerous a power as that.

The foregoing definitions will rule out as not obscene very much that pious moralists denounce as sin, and on the other hand include much, even many atrocities which those same pietists protect with their consent or sanction. On their definition of obscenity, it is a vice prevalent everywhere, and one of the commonest things in the world. While obscenity is running at a fearful rate in every farmer's pig and poultry yard, among the doves in their cotes, the birds in the trees, and flies on the wall, in the divorce trials in courts, and in the reports thereof in the newspapers, the talk in every group of men and boys, and the vilest kind of it in the haunts of the fallen in all cities—while all this is running at the bung the Comstock crowd are wresting the mails of a whole nation to save a few driblets of it at the spigot. That is the usual sense of pious people and the legislators, I know; but is it good sense? There especially is prostitution prevailing everywhere, almost as common as marriage. That is the real genuine article of obscenity—no sham or semblance or mistake about that. There it is luring young men and maidens into its maelstrom every day. What is a book, an instrument, or a picture compared to that mass of organized and active obscenity? Do you weep when you but behold Cæsar's vesture wounded? Here is himself in all his distressed realism. Will you make laws against the holes in his coat and leave his corrupted self to dissipate in the wind and poison all the region inhabitants? If the Church cared one copper for real sin, or came anywhere near making good her pretensions, she would be able to substitute prostitution with an opposite good. She has the means and the organization to do it, and so is responsible for a nuisance she is able to, but does not, abate. Whenever she talks to me about obscenity in the United States mails, I rub her nose in that feculence and point out to her that there is a sick patient who needs a physician—we letter writers, journal readers, and patrons of the mail who are whole and well do not, or at least not one of the quack Comstock kind of physicians.

The active Liberals of the country, the Freethinking writers and speakers, I am sure have as much love of decency and purity, and as much hatred of all that is inherently, essentially obscene as have the people whose life is guided by creeds. Good taste, correct manners, and the social proprieties are not matters of creed or faith anywhere, and all classes are essentially agreed upon them; but when a straight-jacket is drawn suddenly, and the general harmony and quiet are disturbed by a demand to strip, and encase ourselves in the new and unwonted garment, why, you see, some of us object that we have outgrown all that, and the scanty raiment would not become us. We would join the Society for the Suppression of Vice to-morrow and contribute our share, or, at all events, speaking for myself, I would, if they would pursue methods that common sense would suggest if there were no United States, nor Washington, nor a Post-Office Department to lean upon. Hav'n't we such a thing as a policeman about us, or a town constable? Have municipal regulations all been repealed and local and State Courts abolished, that we have to go to Washington and import this one and only official of his kind in all the Republic to bring actions against editors and citizens of New York and Massachusetts for the wholly local offense of obscenity? The Comstock Church is mainly a Brooklyn institution supported by Brooklyn priests and patriarchs? Havn't we arrived at rather a pretty pass when the U. S. Post-office Department intervenes to foist a Brooklyn official upon Massachusetts to teach her people virtue?

The promoters of this backward movement certainly cannot have reflected upon the consequences to which all this interference of the great General Government in municipal and local morals leads. From the way that encroachments are stealthily creeping in, we will ere long have a U. S. agent in every town to revive and reinforce the long-departed old Blue Laws, and kissing on Sunday, of wives and otherwise, will be once more a criminal and forbidden luxury.

Or, if we must have a censorship regulated by United States law, then let us have a standard, a metrical measure, a conductor's punch, a steam guage, or something that will indicate to a Liberal editor how much obscenity to the square inch his literary boiler will bear. The Comstock knave is more absolute than the one who troubled Falstaff. We must speak by the card and write in view of an obscenometer. Wanted an inventor to construct one immediately. Measurements and specifications may be taken from Shakspere, Byron, Burns, Tristram Shandy, Montaigne's Essays, Hudibras, Bishop Percy's collection of ancient ballads, and last—but not least—from the Bible. These works stand on our library shelves, accessible without restriction to young and old of both sexes, and they can be ordered of any publisher and sent to the address of any purchaser through the mails. The Liberal writers of to-day will readily submit to the average register of the amount of obscenity in these works, and be perfectly certain of never approaching the limit. Even Mr. Heywood has never exceeded it. What the Liberals claim is equal laws and fair play for all sides. That is all we ask; and I hope the thinking people of the country will examine this question thoroughly, and see if they cannot plant their feet firmly upon the ground of impartial freedom of the United States mails. There is a hard struggle impending over the question, we are only at the beginning of it; and all hands had better be prepared to throw the weight of their opinions and influence upon the right side of it.

[From The Index editorial columns.]

Law Against Indecent Literature.

The position of the editor of The Index in regard to the law against the circulation of obscene literature through the mails is, in my opinion, just and judicious. The law of 1873 should be so modified that under it none but dealers in really indecent books and pictures, such as corrupt and ruin our youth, such as are unqualifiedly condemned by all pure men and women everywhere, irrespective of beliefs on religious, social, and scientific subjects, can be prosecuted and punished.

This is the position I took at the Congress of the National Liberal League, July 1876; and as chairman of the committee on resolutions, I submitted at the last session of that congress the following resolution, which after a few minutes' discussion was adopted by the League:

Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men, for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate, in thought or language, the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

The danger presupposed by this resolution was no imaginary danger, as subsequent events have shown. There is no doubt in my mind that the circulation of obscene literature should be prohibited by law, and that its transmission through the mails should be prohibited by Congress, which alone has authority vested in it to make laws and regulations pertaining to the postal system of the country. The absolute repeal of the present law against the circulation of filthy books and pictures through the mails would be welcomed by hundreds of depraved wretches, whom it would help, by enabling them with but little danger to carry on their infamous business; while the advantages that would accrue would be secured just as effectually by a modification of the law, such as is contemplated in the resolution adopted by the National Liberal League and insisted on by the editor of The Index.

No doubt the thousands who signed the petition that was sent to Congress asking primarily for the repeal of the law of 1873 did so with the best of motives, believing that the law under which Mr. Bennett was arrested, and others quite as innocent of circulating obscene literature, had been fined and imprisoned, ought to be repealed at once, to prevent the possibility of similar outrages on personal liberty in the future. In their honest indignation at the attempt made to suppress freedom of speech under the pretence of suppressing obscenity—an indignation that I felt as strongly, perhaps, as any of those who signed the petition—they failed to consider fully, I believe, that the repeal of the law would facilitate and encourage the spread of a disgusting moral leprosy, and that "Comstockism" would be abollshed quite as effectually by a radical modification of the law as by its total repeal, while the former would leave its good features untouched and its good results unimpaired. I know, since the subject has been discussed, that the almost universal view among Liberals is that we should petition for the modification, and not for the repeal, of the law. I suggest that another petition, carefully and judiciously worded, indicating the defects, and asking for a radical modification of the existing law, be put into circulation. It could be published at and sent from the office of every Liberal journal in the United States. A hundred thousand names, or even twice that number, could be obtained before the end of the present year. B. F. UNDERWOOD.

The reason that I say the petition calls primarily for repeal is this: The petition says, "That whenever publications, pictures, articles, acts or exhibitions, directly tending to produce crime or pauperism, are wantonly exposed to the public, or obtruded upon individuals, the several States and territories have provided, or may be safely left to provide, suitable remedies."

This implies that the United States should not attempt to provide remedies against the circulation of obscene literature through the mails; and since the U. S. Government only can make laws pertaining to the transmission of literature through the mails, the petition really calls for repeal, even though the words "repealed or materially modified" follow. Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

The dimensions of the spots vary very much, some being mere black spots known as pores, others having a surface much larger than that of the earth, some few being four or five times larger than the surface of our globe. The spots are not equally distributed all over the disc. There are not many in the immediate vicinity of the equator, and next to none in the latitudes exceeding 35 or 40 degrees, but they are much more abundant in the two symmetrical zones comprised between 10 and 30 degrees of latitude.

Their number is also very variable; sometimes there are so many of them that in a single observation one can ascertain the zones which usually contain them. In 1637 they were so numerous that the heat and brilliancy of the sun were perceptibly diminished, and history records many similar obfuscations brought about by the same cause. At other times they are so rare that a whole year passes away without one of them being seen. The phenomena which they present seem at times to have only a superficial influence, but, generally speaking, it extends to the depth of the solar body, which is often agitated and heaved up over a wide expanse, amounting occasionally to a quarter of the whole disc. Thus it is possible that these spots may be the outcome of a violent agitation amongst the matter of which the sun is composed. The most plausible hypothesis is that attributing them to the influence of the planets (of Jupiter, Venus, and Mercury, in particular), the attraction of which create regular tides on the solar globe and the great disturbances already mentioned.

III.

Father Secchi, whose opinions, the result of most careful observation, are shared by many astronomers, looks upon them merely as solutions of continuity in the stratum of mists or luminous vapors which form the photosphere. These clouds differ from ours in two respects, being composed not of vapor of water, but of the vapor of metallic substances, and, by reason of their elevated temperature, they are luminous of themselves, but are less brilliant than photosphere. So far as the external aspect goes, it is the completely identical; the Earth covered with clouds, would appear mammiform in structure like the Sun to any one placed at some distance from it, and the phenomenon has even been remarked from mountain summits, especially during a thunderstorm.

This theory, as Father Secchi points out, explains, without having recourse to fabulous rates of speed, the rapidity with which certain changes in the shape of the spots take place. The apparent displacement of a cloud may be understood without supposing that the substance has travereed the same space as the contour of the cloud, for it may be accounted for by a change of temperature, producing upon the one hand condensation, upon the other, dissolution of the vapor over a considerable surface. He puts the question as to the nature of the spots in this way: "Are they caused by an obscure substance, rising above the luminous substance, or is it not rather the luminous matter which penetrates into an obscure region?"

He goes on to point out that all the phenomena alluded to are only to be explained by the second hypothesis: that there exists in the spots a luminous substance which penetrates into a less brilliant region—call the clouds an obscure part if you will, but it is none the less true that the luminous part penetrates thither. The spots must contain a transparent substance, less brilliant than the photosphere, and of a gaseous character. Our atmosphere would appear the same to a spectator looking into it from outside, say from the Moon; the clouds lighted up by the Sun would seem brilliant, while he would see black spots at the points where the air was transarent.*

M. Faye, of the French Institute, has, on the other hand, propounded the hypothesis that the spots are whirlwinds caused by the unequal speed of the successive zones of the photosphere, the angular rotation of which diminishes in speed from the equator to the poles, and that their law of motion denotes at the same time their distribution over the solar surface. In a report read to the Académie des Sciences (Dec. 30, 1872) he says that this is naturally the case, because these spots are neither more nor less than whirlwinds engendered directly in the photosphere by the unequal speed of its parallels. In another memoir, he indicates a very curious similitude between solar and terrestrial cyclones, the laws of these two orders of phenomena seeming almost identical.

In reality, Father Secchi's theory is not incompatible with that of M. Faye, for the former, in reply to the argumehts quoted above, says: "The question as to whether the spots are whirlwinds is but of secondary importance, for, even admitting them to be so, the only cause by which they could be originated would be an eruption." †

IV.

The spots often change in shape and vanish after having appeared for a short time, or traverse the whole visible surface of the Sun, following a line oblique to the diurnal motion and the plane of the ecliptic, and reappearing in their original condition at the expiration of twelve or thirteen days.

The motion of these spots has revealed to us the remarkable phenomenon of the Sun's rotation upon itself.

Giordano Bruno, of Naples, author of a "Treatise upon the Universe," published in 1591, was the first to suspect this fact, which was definitely ascertained to be correct by Jean Fabricius, from whose memoir, published in 1611, I quote the following passage:—"I conceived the idea of attracting the Sun's rays through a very small aperture to a darkened chamber on to a sheet of white paper. I noticed that this spot (one which Fabricius had discovered in the Sun) had taken the shape of an elongated cloud. After an interruption of three days, caused by the bad weather, my observations showed me that the spot had made an oblique movement westward. I also noticed a smaller one close to the edge of the Sun, which in a few days reached its centre, and after that a third. The first of the three soon disappeared, and the others at an interval of two or three days. "I was apprehensive that they might not return, but at the end of ten days the first one reappeared in the east. It then became clear to me that these spots were accomplishing a revolution, and my opinion was confirmed by other persons to whom I pointed them out. I hesitated for some time to publish my observations, the accuracy of which seemed affected by the fact that these spots did not maintain the same distances from one another, and that they underwent a change of shape and speed. It was, therefore, all the more gratifying for me to remember that, as the spots are apparently on the actual body of the Sun, which is spherical and solid, they must necessarily diminish in size and slacken their speed as they reach his edges."

From a close observation of the spots it has been concluded that the Sun revolves upon itself in a period of about twenty-five days, and like the Earth from east to west. Scheiner puts the synodical, that is to say, the apparent revolution, in which the spot seems to an observer to return to the same point upon the disk, at twenty-seven days. This gives twenty-five days and a third for the duration of the sidereal revolution—that is to say, the time taken by a given point of the Sun to describe a complete circle. Thus, in place of observing the rotatory motion of the solar body itself, we are compelled to study that of its atmosphere, being, in fact, similarly placed to an astronomer who, to ascertain the rotatory motion of the Earth, had taken up his position in the Moon, with a cloud as his point of comparison. He would first of all have to study the atmospheric circulation and discover the laws by which it was governed—a task so difficult under such circumstances, as to be well-nigh impossible.

Editorial Notes.

E. H. Heywood.

We wish to say a few words in the interest of this greatly wronged man. On Tuesday, June 25th, for the crime of sending a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" through the mail, he was sentenced by Judge Clifford of the United States District Court, Boston, to two years' imprisonment at hard labor in Dedham jail and to pay a fine of one hundred dollars. It is one of the greatest outrages of the nineteenth century—a persecution for opinion's sake utterly at variance with every principle of American liberty. It is a wrong committed by a branch of the highest court of our country, and an act which ought to tingle with shame every American citizen. Has our Government indeed degenerated so low as to imprison an honest, intelligent citizen for expressing his true convictions? When the government of a nation has become so far lost to the principles of right and justice as that, it is time for it to close its career and give place to something better.

On the last page of this issue the reader will find a petition to the President of the United States for the pardon of this deeply injured man. We conjure every reader of these pages to act for this brother in bonds. Sever the petition from the page and attach it to blank paper and get as many men and women to sign it as possible. In due time instructions will be given as to whom to send the petitions, so that they may be duly and properly presented to the President. Let every person who has sympathy and kindness in his or her heart for a fellow-being under suffering take this case in hand at once. Friends, let us all try to do what we can to secure the release of Brother Heywood from prison.

The New York Liberal League

Held a very interesting meeting in Republican Hall, on Thirty-third street, on Wednesday evening the 19th ult. The attendance of ladies and gentleman was large, and good addresses were listened to. The first was a most excellent one from the president of the league, Cortlandt Palmer; the second by T. B. Wakeman, and the last by Rev. O. B. Frothingham, who was enthusiastically called out. The best of feeling prevailed in the audience, and several persons joined the league.

B. F. Underwood favored us with a call last Monday on his return from Elmira, where he delivered a lecture on Sunday. He is looking extremely well, and seems to be in fine health. We have had some occasion to think that he has, to some extent, sided against us in the big fight we have made with Comstock and Comstockism, and with those who have done all they could to injure us; but we, nevertheless, are glad to be able to say there is decidedly a fraternal feeling between us, and that our main efforts are in the same direction. We differ somewhat as to the legitimate powers of Congress as regards the opinions and morals of the people. We cannot think his position on that subject tenable, but we are sure he is honest and sincere. We feel so sure that the General Government has no right to interfere with individual opinion in moral, religious, or social subjects that we are, perhaps, a little impatient with those who oppose us. But quarreling is not our normal condition. We prefer to be on terms of peace and amity with all for whom we entertain respect. We are only too glad to bear record of the great good Mr. Underwood has accomplished.

W. S. Bell has returned home to New Bedford to rest through the hot season. He called upon us as he passed through the city on his homeward trip from the West. He has been lecturing in western New York, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. He reports an awakened interest in Freethought and general inquiry. There is a growing desire for Liberal lecturers and an increasing wish to know what grounds unbelievers have for discarding the fables, myths, and superstitions of theology. He says his labors in the moral vineyard have been well received. He proposes to attend the Watkins Convention in the latter part of August, after which he will resume his regular labors in the Liberal lecture field.

W. F. Jamieson has just closed a successful course of five lectures before the Liberal Club of Ottawa, Kansas. The subject of his discourses were: "Common Sense vs. Orthodox Christianity," "Antiquity of Man," "Evolution," "Science Against the Bible," and "Thomas Paine." No building in Ottawa was large enough to contain the concourse of people that flocked to hear him in Forest Park, on Sunday afternoon, June 23d. He will lecture at DeSoto, Kansas, Sunday, July 14th, Gardner, July 21st, Sabetha, July 25th, 26th, 27th, and 28th. His address is Box 1250, Kansas City, Mo.

Our visit to Newark was a very pleasant one. A goodly number of the Liberal League and of the citizens attended to listen to our remarks, and a spirit of unity and harmony seemed to prevail. Our subject was, "The Bible in our Public Schools." A very humorous paper was read by Mr. Williams of Newark. It purported to give the details of a meeting of scientists in Paris, and abounded with good hits. Mr. Charles Orchardson of this city closed by giving a portion of his lecture upon "The Follies of the Current Faith." The Liberal League of Newark is a young organization, but is in a promising condition. We return our warmest thanks to Bro. John Cooke and his excellent wife for the hospitalities extended to us. We shall be glad to visit Newark again.

Mrs. Carlotta Frances Roddey called at our office a few days ago, and presented us with one of her pamphlets narrating the great wrongs she has endured from the hands of her husband, Gen. P. D. Roddey, formerly of Alabama, and his accomplices, who caused her to be arrested on a false charge and thrust into the Tombs prison where she was retained seven weeks, and where she would undoubtedly have died had not the kind-hearted warden, Mr. Quinn, taken pity on her and afforded her some privileges in his own family. Officials in this city who ought to have been just to her treated her with the greatest unkindness and injustice. Her story is a heart-touching one, and we hope every friend upon whom she calls will buy one of her little books. They are now her only means of support, as her villainous husband robbed her of nearly $350,000.

We have decided to make permanent our liberal offer to send The Truth Seeker to trial or new subscribers three months for 50 cents. We will continue this offer throughout the year. We hope friends of the paper will take advantage of the offer, and send in all the names possible. Let us all try to keep The Truth Seeker list growing.

Will not publishers and editors of Liberal and Spiritualistic papers copy the petition for Mr. Heywood, and urge their patrons to sign it, that the same may be forwarded to the President in due time. If they do not like the way the petition reads, they of course can present another form. If we all make a united effort in favor of the persecuted man, we can probably accomplish his release. Let every man make his condition their own and act accordingly.

Anthony Comstock. His career of cruelty and crime. A chapter of 120 pages from the "Champions of the Church." This pamphlet is issued and is selling rapidly. It gives a truthful account of Comstock's means and plans for persecuting his victims. We have mailed a copy to the president and other officers of his Society for the Suppression of Vice and one to Anthony himself, thus addressed: "Miss Ella Bender, alias J. G. Phillips, alias Mrs. E. Semler, alias S. Bender, alias Miss Annie E. Ray, alias E. Edgewell, alias Mrs. E. Semler, alias Mrs. Farnsworth, alias Anthony Comstock, etc., etc., etc., Secretary and agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice, Member of the Young Men's Christian Association; care American Tract Society, 150 Nassau St., New York."

Col. R. G. Ingersoll in a private letter to a friend gave this opinion of Comstock: "I regard Comstock as infamous beyond expression. I have very little respect for those men who endeavor to put down vice by lying, and very little respect for a society that would keep in its employ such a leprous agent."

Price of "Anthony Comstock" 25 cents; a copy of The Truth Seeker sent with each order.

The Champions of the Church is going off pretty well. A few hundred copies have already been sent away, and we want to send a few hundred more in a short time. We think the work will give full satisfaction, and it is certainly very low in price. The book is heavy, weighing four pounds, and costs thirty-two cents to send by mail. Those ordering it will only do an act of justice to send the postage in addition to the price of the book, and then they will obtain a bargain. If any Liberal who orders the work does not think it richly worth the price we ask, we will make him a present of it. Cloth, $3.00; leather, red edges, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4 50.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion, as held in the columns of The Truth Seeker, between Mr. Cyrus Romulus R. Teed, and the editor of this paper. Proposition discussed, Jesus Christ is not only Lord God, but Creator of Heaven and Earth. Teed affirming, Bennett denying. 150 pp. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents. Postage paid.

Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier, who, after a pastoral service of over thirty years in the Romish Church in France, wholly abjured the Christian dogmas. Edited by Voltaire, and just published in English. A very Radical work. Price 25 cents.

Mysterious Rhymes and Poems is the title of a little volume of 321 pages of poems by our friend and patron, C. W. Terpenning, Creston, Iowa. The poems are quaint and amusing to say the least. If the quality of the poetry is not equal to Tennyson's or Massey's, the book will enlist the attention of the reader. Price, $1.50.

The Rasp is the title of the latest periodical we have noticed. We have received Nos. 1 and 2. It is a small weekly magazine, edited and published by W. H. Chaney, Portland, Oregon. Terms per copy, 5 cents; per month, 15 cents; three months, 40 cents.

Science and Theology—Ancient and Modern.

BY JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE.

II.

The Stoics, like the authors of the Bridgewater Treatises, had pressed science into the service of religion by the theory of final causes. They had examined the eye, and had found an organ constructed curiously to enable us to see. So the ear seemed to be made to hear, the feet to walk, the hands to minister to our various necessities. In the whole system of nature they had found an extraordinary adaptation of means to special ends, and the universe, as they supposed, was generally subordinated to the interests of man.

From the evidence of contrivance they had passed to a contriving mind, and had built together a specious fabric of natural theology. Lucretius met the Stoics on their own ground, and anticipated precisely the modern objection to the same positions. The arguments created more difficulties than it removes; for if we are to suppose every thing which exists to have been designed, we have to account for the existence of evil, while scientifically the inference of intention confounds organization with mechanism. In machinery the instrument is manufactured to supply a need which has been felt already. Men dug the ground with their hands before they invented spades, and they used spades before they invented plows. They made plows to do the work more easily which they were already doing with inferior means. They fought before they used shields and lances; they slept on the ground before they had beds; and they ate and drank before they had dishes and drinking-cups. In the organized works of nature the process is reversed. The use does not produce the instrument, but the instrument occasions the use. We see because we have eyes, we speak because we have tongues of a peculiar form, we hear because we have ears. But without eyes there could be no sight, without tongues there could be no articulation, there would be no sound if there were not ears to hear. We are too feeble and too ignorant to place ourselves behind the purposes of the Maker of the universe and insist that he intended this and that. We do not know what he intended. We see only that he does not work as we work, and we insist on evidence of conscious design, we make the moral phenomena of human experience hopelessly inexplicable. Organization is not contrivance, but immeasurably superior to contrivance. What it is we can not tell. We see only that the organs which we so much admire do not come into existence complete, as we should expect to find them if they were made with a determinate purpose. They are developed slowly, age after age, in successive modifications of a single type, the fish's fin becoming the wing of a bird, or the arm and hand of a man, the fish's scales becoming the bird's feathers; the horse's hoof a variation of the finger nail.

Having launched man into the world, Lucretius traces his history along the lines of the modern paleontologist. Sir John Lubbock might have transcribed many passages from him without altering a word. He describes the unclothed, houseless biped, hiding helplessly in caves, in danger of carnivorous beasts, and poorly feeding himself on roots and leaves. A branch of a tree provides him with a club and pebbles are his first missles. The stone age follows. He tears the ground with flints. He rises to bows and arrows. He kills animals and clothes himself with their skins. He sees sparks fly, and learns partly by accident the use of fire. He warms his lodging with it and dresses his food. A forest breaks into flame on a mountain-side. Straying afterward among the ashes of the conflagration, he finds copper ore which had cropped above the surface smelted by the heat. He examines it, he heats it again and finds it soft and malleable, and when cold once more he discovers it to be hard as stone and available for a thousand uses. The copper age succeeds the stone age, and the iron the copper, and so on through all the epochs of mechanical discovery. The necessities of his body being provided for, the mind begins to work. The man opens his eyes to the wonder of what is around him. He has done so much for himself. But forces are at work about him and within him, before which he is helpless. Pains rack his bones, disease lays him prostrate and powerless. Tempests destroy his crops. Floods sweep away his homestead and his stock. The thunder rolls, the levin bolt shoots from the cloud. The earth shakes, the meteor blazes across the sky. The sunrise and sunset do not strike him with wonder. He has been accustomed to them from his birth and he knows that if the sun disappears, he will find it again when he wakes from his slumber.*

But what the sun was, or what the moon, or what the bright procession of glittering gems which on cloudless nights passed over the vault of the sphere in majestic calm, what these were who could tell? The largest and brightest of these orbs moved among the stars, on courses of their own, perhaps with life, with motion, with motives, with will and purposes of their own. The clouds, too, the fierce harbingers of storm and desolation, what were they? Awe-stricken men called them gods, or the work of gods, with passions like those of man. They bent before them with trembling deprecation of their wrath. They invented religion, and in so doing filled themselves with causeless terrors which banished peace from their waking thoughts and filled their dreams with phantoms.

But their misgivings were not to haunt them forever,

> Ignorantia causarum conferre Deorum
> Cogit ad Imperium res et concedere Regnum.

With knowledge of the causes of things, the dominion disappeared of these imagined beings. Nature, when examined reverently, showed no caprice, no sign of interference or passion or willfulness; one unchanging sequence of natural cause and natural effect prevailed throughout the universe. Each phenomenon was preceded by some natural force producing it, and each advance of science was a guarantee to men of security and happiness. Miserable man was, and miserable he would be, so long as he was haunted by the dread of the unknown; not that the gods themselves, whatever they might be, inflicted pain on any inferior creatures; the gods were blessed in themselves and paid no heed to mortals. But wretched mortals tortured their own souls by causeless fear and terror. Thunder and lightning were the chief strongholds of superstition. Horace, we remember, professed to have been converted by a thunderstorm. Lucretius, though his knowledge fell far short of ours, was still satisfied that these aerial disturbances were natural phenomena. There was never thunder from a clear sky. Clouds accompanied it always, and clouds of a peculiar character. Could it be believed that the Olympian Jove came down into a cloud to be nearer to his mark? If the thunder was his voice, he would warn before he struck; but the flash always came before the sound. If the lightning struck the wicked, some sign of purpose might be admitted,

> "icti flammus ut fulguris halent,
> Pectore perfixo documen mortalibus acre."

But these fiery missiles fall on the innocent and the evil alike. They fall on the shrines of the gods themselves as readily as on the palaces of tyrants. Most often they fall on the earth or into the sea. Were we to suppose that the Omnipotent was practicing his hand? Lucretius did not know the phenomena of electricity. But with intuitive genius he had anticipated two, at least, of our most important modern discoveries. He had perceived that force was a constant quantity, that it was not expended, but was converted from one form into another. He had ascertained, also, that heat and light were intimately connected with force. A blow produced heat; sparks flew when steel was struck with flint; lead would melt by friction, even by the friction of the air when passing swiftly through it. His editor, Creech, selects this particular theory as an illustration of his scientific credulity. Lucretius had in fact struck on the exact explanation of the incandescence of meteoric stones.

From thunderstorms Lucretius passed to the other aerial phenomenon of rain. Rain was credited to Jupiter Pluvius, or whoever it might be. Lucretius showed, with ingenious clearness, that rain did not descend from any reservoir of waters above the firmament. It descended because it had first ascended by evaporation; moisture rose from the sea, rose from the ground, rose whenever any wet thing became dry. In the sky it condensed into clouds, from which it fell again.

So going, one by one, through the chief strongholds to which superstition attached itself, the Epicurean poet insisted, and, as we all now admit, insisted truly, that every one of them could be traced to natural causes acting in a definite way, and that there was no sign anywhere of miraculous interposition.

Of this universal system man was a part, but not the chief part, as, in his vanity, he imagined. Nature, in her work of generation, had no special thought of man, above her other children; she had placed him on the earth, a being who, if he could control his passion and imagination, if he could labor quietly and enjoy the fruits of his labor, was capable of modest happiness, and was equally certain of misery if he gave way to wild ambitions or disordered appetites. Society formed naturally, and regulations were made for the good of all, to enable society to hold together. If man would submit to these regulations, and would fulfill such functions of labor as fell to him, he might live out the space of years which nature had allotted to him in peace and content. His allotted time being over, then comes the end. And what is the end? From such a philosophy there could come but one answer. Lucretius is only peculiar in this, that the answer which he gives has no note of sadness in it, but is proclaimed as a message of good news, a deliverance from groundless alarms. The future life which haunted the consciences of the early nations was an anticipation of torment. So far from being any check on vice, Lucretius insisted that it was a provocation to crime by adding new terrors to death. The enormities into which men were seen daily plunging were adventured only to escape want and poverty, and want and poverty were dreadful because they were avenues to death. But death rightly looked on was no fearful thing, scarcely a thing to be regretted. What was death? The separation of soul and body. And what was soul? When a child was conceived did some immortal spirit come racing through the sky to take possession of the growing germ? Not so at all. Soul was generated with body and corresponded to body. In the human body there was a human soul. In an animal body there was an animal soul. A horse had not the mind of a man, nor a man the mind of a horse. The soul was born with the body, and grew with its growth. Feeble, like its tenement, in infancy, it strengthened as the body strengthened, came to its maturity when the youth became a man, and, with the coming on of age, mind and limbs lost their power together.

Whatever might be the nature of the soul, it was inseparably connected with an organized system of matter, and could have no existence independent of it. The human soul and the animal soul were the same in kind, they differed only as their bodies differed, and resembled each other in the same proportion. At death the soul of both dissolved like smoke, and ceased to be.

> "Ergo dissolvi quoque convenit omnem animai, > Naturam ceu fumus in altas aeris auras."

In a human body, and nowhere else, could a human soul have existence. Clouds did not form in the sea. Fish did not swim on dry land. Blood did not flow in a flower-stalk, or sap in stones. To everything there was an allotted place. The mortal had no fellowship with the immortal.

Was this a sad conclusion? "Rather," says Lucretius, "it is the most consoling of certainties. Death is nothing, for where death is we are not; Before we were begotten empires were convulsed. provinces were wasted with fire and sword; nations were sunk in wretchedness. We know nothing of these calamities. They touched not us. We could suffer nothing, for we were not. As it was before we began to live, so it will be again when we have ceased to live. Storms may roll over the earth, land may be mixed with sea, and sea with sky. We shall know nothing of it. The substance of our bodies will be in other forms, with other souls attached to them. New beings will have come into existence, to live and pass away as we did. But those beings will not be us. The continuity once broken is broken forever. We shudder when we look upon a corpse. We imagine that when our bodies are corrupting we shall be in some way present and conscious of our own decay. It is not so. Our bones will decay, but we shall not be present. We shall not be any more. We shall not suffer any more. 'Ah!' some one says, 'must I leave my wife and children, and my pleasant home? Must all be taken from me?' They will not be taken from you, for you will have no being. You will not miss them. You will know no regrets or vain longings for what is gone. Your friends will lament for you. You will not lament for them. You will be in peace.

"Why, then, unhappy mortal," says Lucretius to the vain complainers, "why do you grieve? Why cry out on death? Has your life been happy? The banquet is over; you have taken your fill; depart and be thankful. Have you been unfortunate? Has life brought you sorrow and pain, why wish for more of it? Life and sorrow end together. Would you live forever? The terms of human existence do not alter. Had you a thousand lives they could bring you nothing new. You would but tread again the same circle. As it has been with you, so it would be, though you could repeat the process, to eternity. This is nature's sentence, and who shall gainsay her? Dry your tears. Peace with your idle whines. Use your time wisely while it is yours. A little space and it will be gone. The ages before you were born are a mirror in which you can read the ages to come. The past has no terrors in it. The future has none, unless you create them for yourself. Real indeed they are to you as long as you anticipate them. Tityus and Sisyphus, Cerberus and the furies! the thought of these will cause you agonies as long as you believe in them. Know these spectres for what they are, the offspring of your own fears, and be at rest. Who and what are you that you dream of immortality? Wiser and

* It would seem true that what we call the "solar myth" had been already suggested as an explanation of the current legends; but the theory found no favor with Lucretius, who dismisses it in a few lines, as sensible as they are beautiful.

> "Nec plangore diem magno, solemque per agros
> Quærebant pavidi palantes noctis in Umbris,
> Sed taciti respectabant somnoque sepulti,
> Dum roseâ face sol inferret lumina cœlo.
> A parvis quod enim consuerunt cernere semper
> Alterno tenebras et lucem tempore gigni
> Non erat ut fieri posset mirarier unquam,
> Nec diffidere ne terras eterna teneret,
> Nox in perpetuum detracto lumine solis."

nobler men than you will ever be have lived and are gone. Accept your fate. There is no remedy."

Such was the Lucretian creed, which has this merit in it, that it is free from cant. There is no half belief here; no affectation; no professions from the teeth outward, of what the heart disowns; no feeble struggling to reconcile the irreconciliable; no half-formed misgivings, which take from our actions their pith and marrow, and make us dread to look into our consciences for fear of what we may find there. It was a creed naturally accepted by resolute men who were too proud to play intellectual tricks with themselves, and in it is expressed completely the practical genius of the Roman empire. The multitude never adopted it. The multitude continued their offerings at the temple, consulted the oracles, and prayed, or affected to pray, to the gods. The State did not openly profess it. The State maintained scrupulously the established decencies and ceremonials, but it was the real conviction of the Roman intellect. It was the creed of Julius Cæsar. It was the creed at heart of Cicero. Tacitus would not have called himself an Epicurean, but his opinion was substantially the same. Above all, it was a confession of the faith on which, for four centuries, the civilized world was ruled. The Romans knew nothing and cared nothing for spiritual ideals. Peace, order, justice between man and man, and material prosperity, these were the sole aims of the Roman administration, and the explanation of their contemptuous toleration of the motley superstitions of the age.—International Review.

Decay of Faith Among Professing Christians.

Some of the Baptist ministers of this neighborhood, at their last Monday's meeting, gave utterance to sentiments on the subject of answers to prayer which might have proceeded from Prof. Tyndall. One brother having related how a child dying of diphtheria was saved by an old woman who came to the house immediately after an earnest prayer had been made to God for help, another brother related a case in which a child in a similar condition was saved by a physician without any prayer at all. Then, a third brother, having told the story of a missionary who was led to look at a concordance and discover the word "girl" occurs only once in the Bible, so that he was ready beforehand to answer an Infidel's subsequent inquiry on the point, a fourth brother declared that ministers frequently pray for divine guidance in the choice of texts without getting it. The majority of the brethren, it should be said, adhered to the old doctrine that God frequently does things because they are prayed for, which he would not have done if they had not been prayed for; but this was not the unanimous opinion. The scientific theory that everything is governed by fixed laws, from which there is no deviation, and that prayer has no influence except upon the mind of the person praying, evidently found many supporters.

Similar doubts of the efficacy of prayer were expressed last Tuesday evening by a Methodist temperance lecturer. One of his hearers having asked him why he did not say something about prayer as a means of curing drunkenness, he replied that though Christ when on earth healed the sick, the age of miracles was passed, and that nowadays prayer cannot be depended on as a curative agency. The discussion of the subject promising to become lively, it was cut short by the usual expedient of striking up a hymn, so that further expression of the convictions of those present has been lost to us. When, however, public speakers or Methodist churches begin to dispute whether prayer is of any use in producing material results, it is plain that the old-fashioned belief in regard to it has begun to die out among the denomination.

We observe, too, that the Rev. George Muller of Bristol, England, who is clebrated throughout the Christian world for the great charitable works which he has carried on for many years, with no other assistance, as he says, than that sent him in answer to his prayers, has made a protracted tour in this country, and returned home without having gained any considerable number of converts to his practice. He has delivered many addresses, giving the facts of his experience, and they have been listened to by religious people with great interest; but nobody, so far as we have heard, has undertaken to follow in his footsteps. On the contrary, the custom of directly soliciting money for religious and charitable puposes is as common as ever. Moreover, the most pious church members continue to send for the doctor when they or any of their families are sick, and in other ways show their belief that though prayer is a good thing, human ingenuity and effort are much more to be relied on.

A more striking illustration of this decay of faith in the power of God is the way in which the Christian magistracy of England treat those of their fellow-Christians who are bold enough to trust to prayer, in cases where it is important that their trust should be well founded. Parents who refuse to call a physician for their sick children, and, particularly, who refuse to vaccinate them as a preventive of small-pox, are fined and imprisoned as criminals, and their conduct declared to be irrational and immoral, by officers of a government which, at the same time, maintains and defends a religion founded by the supposed answers of God to the prayers of its apostles! This policy may be wise as a matter of civil administration, but what shall we say of its effect upon the religious belief of the community?

These are but a few of the signs which indicate an increasing prevalence even among Christians of modern scientific skepticism, so-called. The childlike state of mind, in which God is regarded as a father, whose compassion may be worked upon by earnest entreaty, and who, when he thinks proper, interferes with the natural course of events to turn aside misfortune from those who appeal to him, appears to be giving place to a heathenish stoicism, which regards the universe as a huge piece of machinery and denies that even its maker can arrest or modify its workings. The change may be an improvement in the eyes of rationalists, but it is fatal to religious feeling. We are astonished that profound and intelligent theologians regard it with such cool indifference.—N. Y. Sun.

CHAPTER III.

About the middle of the night God put the bastard into a deep sleep, and Judah enchanted him in his sleep. Then Judah entered into the fellow's tent and with a knife cut Jeshu's flesh and took out therefrom the sacred parchment.

Jeshu awoke out of sleep affrighted by a great and horrid demon. Wherefore he said to his disciples, Ye shall know now that my heavenly father hath commanded me to come to him; I go because he seeth that I have no honor among men.

Then his disciples said, What is to become of us? He answered, O blessed ones, great will be your reward if ye keep my words, for ye shall sit at my right hand with my heavenly father.

Then they all lifted up their voices and wept. But Jeshu said, Do not weep, for a great reward is in store for your piety; only beware lest ye transgress my words. To which all responded, Whatsoever thou commandest we will do, and whosoever proves disobedient to thy commands, let him perish miserably.

Then said Jeshu, If ye are my followers ye will treat me with gentleness and justice. As ye go to fight for me at Jerusalem I will hide myself by mingling with you so that the citizens of Jerusalem may not know me.

These things Jeshu spoke deceitfully, that he might go to Jerusalem and enter the temple and again obtain the knowledge of the name.

Not in the last suspecting his evil intent, they all responded, All things that thou commandest we will do, nor will we depart therefrom a finger's breadth, either to the right or to the left.

Again he said, Make oath to me. So they all, from the least to the greatest, bound themselves by an oath.

And they did not know that Judah was among them, nor did they even know him.

Afterwards Judah said to the attendants, Let us provide for ourselves uniform garments, so that no one may be able to know our master. This device pleased them, and they carried it out. They journeyed to Jerusalem, there to celebrate the feast of unleavened bread.

Now when the religious men saw Judah they rejoiced with great joy, and said to him, Point out to us, we pray thee, what remains to be done? (for he had secretly withdrawn himself and come to the elders and wise men of the city).

Then Judah narrated all that had happened, and how he had obtained the name from the bastard. Wherefore they rejoiced, and Judah said to them, If ye will obey my orders, to-morrow I will deliver this fellow into your hands.

Then said the wise man, Hast thou enough knowledge of his going and coming? Judah replied, Everything is known to me. Lo, he goeth to the temple to attend the sacrifice of the paschal victim, but I have sworn to him by the ten commandments, not to deliver him into your hands. And he hath with him two thousand men. Be ye prepared therefore to-morrow, and know that the man before whom I bow down in adoration, he is the bastard. Act bravely, attack his followers and seize him.

Stephen Shetachides and all the rest of the wise men danced for joy, and they promised Judah to obey his orders.

The next day came Jeshu with all his crowd, but Judah went out to meet him, and falling down before him he worshiped him. Then all the citizens of Jerusalem, being well armed and mailed, captured Jeshu.

And when his disciples saw him held captive, and that it was vain to fight, they took to their legs hither, and yon, and gave themselves up to bitter weeping. Meanwhile the citizens of Jerusalem waxing stronger conquered the bastard and his crowd, killing many of them while the rest fled to the mountains.

Then the elders of Jerusalem brought Jeshu into the city, and bound him to a marble column, and beat him with whips, saying, Where now are all the miracles thou hast performed? Then they took those branches and weaving a crown out of them put it on his head.

Then the bastard becoming thirsty, said, Give me a little water to drink. So they offered him vinegar. Having tasted it he began to cry out with a loud voice, My forefather David prophesied concerning me, saying, And they gave me gall for meat, and in my thirst they gave me vinegar.

They answering, said, If thou art God, why didst thou not make known before thou didst drink that vinegar was offered to thee? Then they added, Thou dost stand now upon the verge of the sepulchre, nor wilt thou at last convert gall into good fruit.

But Jeshu weeping bitterly, said, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?

Then the elders said, If thou art the son of God, why dost thou not deliver thyself out of our hands?

Jeshu replied, My blood atoneth for mortals, for thus Esaias prophesied, And from his wounds we are healed.

Afterward they brought Jeshu before the greater and lesser Sanhedrin where sentence was pronounced, that he should be stoned and hanged.

The same day was the preparation for the Sabbath and also preparation for the Passover.

Thence taking him out to the place of punishment, they stoned him to death. Then the wise men commanded him to be hanged on the wood, but no sticks of wood were found that would support him, for all being frail were broken.

His disciples seeing this, wailed and cried out, Behold the goodness of our master Jeshu, whom no wood will sustain.

But they knew not that he had enchanted all wood when he was in possession of the name. But he knew that he would surely suffer the penalty of hanging, as it is written, When any man shall be judged to death for an offense and shall be put to death, then thou shalt hang him, etc.

Then Judah, when he saw that no wood would hold him up, said to the wise men, Behold the subtilty of this fellow, for he hath enchanted the wood that it might not sustain him; but there is in my garden a great stem of a cabbage; I will go and bring it hither, it will hold the body.

To whom the wise men said, Go and do so. So Judah went at once and brought the stalk and on it Jeshu was hanged.

Toward night the wise men said, It is not lawful for us to break one letter of divine law in regard to this fellow; we must do to him what the law demands, even though he did seduce men. Therefore they buried him where he was stoned.

Now about the middle of the night his disciples came and sat down by the grave and wept and mourned for him. Judah seeing this, took away the body and hid it in his garden under a brook. Diverting the water to another place he buried the body in the channel and then brought the water back.

The next night when the disciples came again and sat down to weep, Judah said to them, Why do you weep? Look and see if the buried man is there. And when they looked and found he was not there, the miserable crowd cried out, He is not in the grave, but has ascended to heaven, for he foretold this himself when alive, and as if concerning himself the saying was interpreted. [But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave], for he shall receive me, Selah.

Meanwhile the queen finding out what had been done, commanded the wise men of Israel to appear; and when they came she said to them, What have ye done with this man whom ye have accused of being a sorcerer and a seducer of men?

They answered, We have buried him according to the requirements of our law. Then she said, Bring him hither to me.

And they went and sought for him in the grave, but did not find him. Then returning to the queen, they said, We known not who hath taken him from the grave.

The queen answered and said, He is the Son of God and hath ascended to his Father in heaven; for thus it is prophecied of him, For he shall receive me, Selah.

Then the wise men said, Do not allow these thoughts to come into thy mind, for verily he was a sorcerer; and they gave proof by their own testimony that he was a bastard and the son of a separated woman.

The queen replied, Why did I exchange words with you in vain? For if ye bring him hither, ye shall be found innocent, but if not, none of you shall survive.

They all responded in these words, Give us time that we may discover the upshot of this affair. Peradventure we may find him there, but if we do not succeed, do unto us whatever pleaseth thee.

She allowed them three days' time, and they departed grieved at heart, lamenting, and not knowing what to do.

Therefore they ordered a fast, and when the appointed time came and they had not found the body, many left Jerusalem to escape the sight of the queen.

Among the rest went a certain old man named Rabbi Tanchuma. He in great sorrow going through the fields, saw Judah sitting in his own garden taking food. Coming up to him, Rabbi Tanchuma said, How is this? Why dost thou take food when all the Jews fast and are in sore distress?

Judah, greatly astonished, inquired for what they fasted. Rabbi Tanchuma replied. It is because of this bastard who hath been hanged and buried near the place of stoning; he hath been taken away from the grave, and none of us know who hath taken him. But his wicked followers declare that he hath gone up to heaven, and the queen threatened all of us Israelites with death unless we find him.

Then Judah asked, If this fellow shall be found, will it bring safety to the Israelites?

Rabbi Tanchuma said, Certainly it will.

Then said Judah, Come and I will show thee the man, for I took him away from the grave because I feared lest perchance his impious followers should steal him from the tomb, and I hid him in my garden, and made a stream of water run over him.

Then Rabbi Tanchuma hastened to the wise men of Israel and related the matter. Therefore they all assembled, and tying the body to a horse's tail, brought it and threw it down before the queen, saying, Behold the man of whom thou hast said, He hath gone up to heaven.

When the queen saw him, she was overwhelmed with shame and unable to speak. Moreover, while the body was thus dragged about for some time, the hair was pulled out, and this is the reason why now the hair of a monarch is shaved off in the middle of the head; it is a memorial of what happened to Jeshu.

One More Ally on the Wrong Side.

The hypercritical editor of the Journal of Cultured Freethought is made happy by the quasi-indorsement of his questionable course by no less a person than B. F. Underwood, who appeared editorially in the issue of The Index for June 27th. We entertain the highest respect for Mr. Underwood, and appreciate the good work he has effected among the American people. We cannot object to his taking sides with his friend Mr. Abbot—who so much needs a little aid—and against ourselves. We would not say a word condemnatory of any friendship that may exist between them, nor of any "mutual admiration society" that may exist in connection with them. But in so far as Mr. Underwood's remarks unjustly place us in a false position with regard to the petition which was sent to Congress, or by implication or otherwise place the thousands who signed that petition in a false position, it is but just that those remarks should be here candidly reviewed.

We would gladly secure Mr. Underwood's approval and esteem. Next after the approval of our own conscience, and the esteem of the thousands of our readers, there is no one we would be more glad to count among our appreciative friends than this favorite champion of Freethought. If, however, that is not to be our fate, we shall endeavor to submit to the inevitable with the best possible grace. In connection with that petition we feel that we discharged the highest duty that devolved upon us, and after seven months have passed by, we fail to see anything in our course connected with that petition that, in a spirit of justice, is deserving of condemnation. Let us briefly review our course in this unfortunate affair.

Nearly five years ago we stepped unbidden into the field of Liberal publication. We had occasion to feel that we were unwelcome, and that some editors withheld from us the hand of fellowship. We were undoubtedly illy prepared to discharge the duties we assumed. None are more sensible than ourselves that we are unlearned and uncultured. We have never claimed to be a good writer nor a competent editor, but we have felt inclined to do the best we could, and what we lacked in quality we have endeavored to make up in quantity. We have the vanity to believe that we have been faithful and earnest during these five years, even if we have not been cultured.

When, in November last we were arrested by Anthony Comstock on a charge of obscenity for simply exercising the rights of an American citizen in speaking and printing our convictions in such language as we were able to command—when we were forcibly deprived of our liberty and our property, we very naturally felt aggrieved. When we realized that many others had suffered far worse than ourselves from the same man and under the same laws—some even to utter ruin and others to the loss of life—we instinctively felt that the Comstock laws ought to be taken from our statute books and that Comstock himself should not be retained in any official capacity. The matter of sending a petition to Congress asking that those unconstitutional laws be repealed suggested itself to our mind. To draft the petition we were fortunate enough to secure the services of T. B. Wakeman, assisted by his brother, Abram Wakeman, than whom in their line there are no abler lawyers in this city. As a Liberalist, as a student of science, as a man of extensive reading, especially in the field of scientific and historical research, Thaddeus B. Wakeman has few or no superiors in this country. The petition was drawn with great care and was submitted to several able Liberals, and it is believed it was as judiciously canvassed as though it had been gotten up in Boston. It is hard to see why the citizens of New York and hundreds of other points all over the country had not the right to sign and send a petition to Congress asking for the repeal of obnoxious laws, even though Boston was not specially consulted. But for this, or something else, Boston's cultured editor took positive grounds in opposition to what we regarded as the best and greatest work of our life. Just as the blank petitions were being sent over the country by the thousand, and tens of thousands of people, honest, good, and true, and fully in unison with what the petition asked for were signing them freely, the cultured editor, in a five-column article, defended Comstock and his laws, denounced the petition and its object, and at the close said he should not sign it, and advised Liberals generally not to sign it. This was a direct blow at us. It was such kind of enmity as we were not prepared for. We had supported Mr. Abbot in all his demands and claims and had not said the first word in opposition to him, but here was a movement in which our very soul was engaged and he denounced it in the most positive manner and did all he could to oppose it. He doubtless kept many, so far as his influence extended, from signing the petition and in a short time he printed in one of his editorials a false statement in an advertisement from one of our city papers, penned by an enemy who was bulldozed and urged on by Anthony Comstock. By doing this, Mr. Abbot tried to show that we had committed forgery and gave this as an additional reason why the petition should not be signed. This conduct has been pronounced by many sensible Liberals with whom we have conversed and who have written us, as being uncalled for, ungenerous, unfriendly, unbrotherly, illiberal, mean, and contemptible, and we had no grounds upon which to deny the charge.

This course has been followed with persistent repetitions that the petition was ill-advised, ill-considered; that it should not be signed; that those who signed it did not know what they were doing; that it was injuring and disgracing the Liberal cause; that it increased and intensified Comstock's power; that it fastened the Comstock laws more strongly on the country; that the movement was a blunder and a crime; that it was in favor of obscenity; and that those who signed it either were defending obscenity or did not realize the crime or mistake they were committing, and much more in the same line. Now all these are falsehoods of the blackest kind. The cultured man's attempt to hold us up before the Liberal public as a forger was no baser, nor perhaps as bad, as the effort he has persistently made that we were a defender of obscenity, and were abetting those who wished to send out, by the ton, vile stuff to debauch and ruin school children. The imputation is the vilest slander that ever has been uttered. Probably the meanest and most despicable part of Comstock's career is the persistent effort he has made to blacken the reputation of his victims. No sooner does he maliciously cause the arrest of an unfortunate than he sets to work, in the daily papers and otherwise, to show that his victim was an obscenist or was engaged in sending obscenity over the country. This he did in the case of Dr. E. B. Foote, Dr. E. C. Abbey, Leander Fox & Son, E. W. Jones, and many others, to say nothing of ourselves. These charges were false beyond expression, and as base as false. Abbot's course toward us and the seventy thousand has been equally false and base. He has persistently endeavored to show that we were defending obscenists and obscenity, and that the signers to the petition had, innocently perhaps, been guilty of the same. This has been the burden of his wail for six months, and so when Mr. Underwood says: "The position of the editor of The Index in regard to the law against the circulation of obscene literature through the mails is, in my opinion, just and judicious," to that extent he defends Mr. Abbot's course and condemns our own. This is, perhaps, well. It is but proper that every prominent man should define his position, that it may be known where we all stand. We will repeat that we are sorry to find so fair and so honorable a man against us when we feel so well assured that we are right and that we have done nothing culpable or ill-advised in connection with the petition.

What are the great wrongs which that petition and its signers have committed? They have simply asked for the repeal or modification of an obnoxious and unconstitutional law. Mr. Underwood and Mr. Abbot both claim to be in favor of modification, and then, certainly, the petition asks for precisely what they claim to want. Does the word repeal in the petition make such an immense difference that we, the petitioners, should be held either as criminals or as having unwittingly or otherwise committed a great error? Does not the language of the petition leave it entirely at the option of Congress whether it shall be repeal or modification? Certainly it does. Does it not ask for modification just as much as repeal? Certainly it does. Did not Congress have the full and explicit privilege to make it modification? Certainly it did. Did they show a particle more disposition to modify the law than to repeal it? Assuredly not. Then why all this howling, this carping, this hypercriticism, this hair-splitting, this making a mountain of a mole-hill, and crying wolf when there is no wolf? It began in unfriendliness, in envy and jealousy, backed by a morbid desire to appear very respectable, and to stand very fair in the eyes of Mrs. Grundy and our orthodox opponents. Certain parties were so fearful that they would not seem to stand straight or erect, that they have decidedly leaned over backwards. We had rather lean forwards than backwards.

Was it honest in Mr. Abbot to assert that the petition called for the "total repeal" of the obnoxious laws? We think it was not. Was it fair and honest in Mr. Underwood to say that "the petition asked primarily for the repeal of the law of 1873"? We leave it for our readers to decide. We hold that the language of the petition calls "primarily" for neither modification nor repeal, but leaves both precisely equal. Suppose we were in need of some money—and it is a very supposable case, for we often feel that need—and we should ask Mr. Underwood to loan us fifty or one hundred dollars, and request him to give it in paper or in gold; would Mr. Underwood represent us correctly to say we had primarily insisted on the fifty-dollar loan, and that paper was the only form of money that would be acceptable to us? Did we not leave it with himself to decide whether it should be fifty or one hundred dollars, and whether it should be paper or gold? Most assuredly; and the petition did precisely the same by Congress; it left it with that body to modify or repeal, just as they saw fit. And now, in all common sense, has there not been enough said about the great mistake, blunder, or error of saying repeal or modify? Cannot the matter be allowed to rest till the hot weather is over, at any rate? The petition was numerously signed; we sent it, in good style, to the committee, who took it in charge; it made an imposing appearance; it was a creditable result; and we feel sure it did a great deal of good. Every signer on that petition has reason to be proud of that act of his life, and all that Abbot & Co. can say will not convert it into a crime.

Is it not cool and assuring in Messrs. Underwood and Abbot, from the imaginary eminence they seem to fancy they occupy above the masses, the one with a patronizing air, practically saying he doubts not that the signers meant well enough, and that they acted with the best of motives, etc., while the other says that "very few of them understood the real position the signing of the petition placed them in," etc. This is doubtless very kind and very reassuring to the seventy thousand; but it is our opinion that among the seventy thousand there are thousands with as much brains as Mr. Abbot or Mr. Underwood possess, and that they knew perfectly well what they were doing, and did not need an index nor a mental guideboard to tell them what they might sign with propriety, and what they might not.

But notwithstanding the great error that has been committed and the wrong that has been done the Liberals of the country by placing before them a petition which they should not have signed, the evil is going now to be remedied. These very respectable gentlemen are going to get up a petition that will be what a petition should be. It will be "carefully and judiciously worded," and the "enormous difference" between repeal and modification will be "explicitly stated." With the advice and instruction that are expected to issue from The Index office, it will be quite safe for one or two hundred thousand good, obedient obscenity-hating Liberals to sign it by the end of the year. This is all right. We hail the movement with joy, we rejoice that at length they are ready to ask for a "radical modification." It is far better than crying down the efforts made by others. We welcome them as co-laborers in a good cause. We will promise not to print five columns in opposition to the signing of their petition, and if it should not be fortunate enough to secure the approval of Congress we will not say; "I told you so;" "You did not draw up your petition right;" "You have brought disgrace upon the Liberal cause;" "You have committed a great blunder"—and a blunder is worse than a crime. No we will not be mean enough to act in that way. We will advise everybody to sign it who wants the law "tinkered up" some, but not repealed, and if it fails, we will say "don't be discouraged; your motive was good try again, perhaps you will have better luck next time."

Yes, we cordially hail our co-laborers, and they can depend upon our moral support. We are glad that they even want the Comstock laws changed a little, and the more the better. Let them go for modification and we will still go for repeal. We still think a bad law is better repealed than tinkered. We still think the law was enacted by improper influences, and at the direct request of Comstock and the Young Men's Christian Association. It was rushed through by a drunken and dishonest Congress in its last expiring moments when bills for salary grabs, back pay, double salaries, and thieving games became laws.

The Comstock law has been only an engine of evil, persecution, and oppression. No real case of obscenity has been prosecuted under it, but large numbers of people have been arrested under it for obscenity, and they have been harassed despoiled, mulcted, and ruined, without the slightest good having been accomplished. We are unable to see anything in the law, in its mode of action, or under its rule, that intelligent, honest Liberals are bound to respect.

We have not come to believe that it is any part of the duty of the Liberals of America to support Anthony Comstock or his vile laws or any part of them; and it causes us to feel regretful to see the high priests of Liberalism stand up and say to us, the laity, the rank and file: "You may speak in measured terms against Anthony Comstock but you must not oppose his laws in toto. You must hang on to a part of them, just for the sake of respectability and for fear that Mrs. Grundy or some other equally worthy old granny may think you are in favor of vile obscenity dealers who have set their hearts upon ruining the young of both sexes all over the country." We are honest in the opinion that Anthony Comstock is one of the most infamous men in our country, and we cannot think that the Liberals of the land are going to add to their respectability or culture by throwing up their hats for him or in favor of his mode of doing business, or of the laws he has caused to be enacted.

We have also given some attention to those laws of his, and we fail to see how they can be judiciously tinkered up or patched up so as to be as good as a new law ought to be. They are like a coat made of poor shoddy cloth, which has been dragged through the filth and pitch of ignominy, by which it becomes tattered and torn in every part, when the owner would doubtless think it had better be cast aside as a worthless piece of property, when some respectable renovator should cry out, "O no! don't throw it aside; don't repeal it; let's modify it; let's save a portion of it for respectability's sake and in respect for the shoddy establishment where the cloth was made." Would there be any reason or sense in such talk? Very little.

These men say "modify Comstock's laws." Well, as observed, we have been looking them over to see if they can be modified to good advantage. We have searched to see what there is in the laws that can be saved to any profit, and we must confess we have searched in vain. We fail to see how the new and the old can be joined together so as to make a good garment. Like the torn and befouled shoddy coat it ought to be thrown aside, and its place supplied with a new and far better garment. When the cultured gentlemen get up that carefully worded and well considered petition with which the country is to be favored, will they not be kind enough to point out the parts and passages of the Comstock laws which they are in favor of retaining, and will they not also be kind enough to draw up the new law, that is to be, just as they think it ought to be? It will be so much better for simple-minded Liberals who do not know enough to judge what kind of a petition they ought to sign to see before them precisely what kind of a law they are petitioning for. We think the gentlemen will not object to adding this trifle to their kind labors in behalf of the masses.

Is it a truth that the people want any portion of the Comstock laws of 1873 retained? and if so, for what purpose? Is it that obscene books and pictures may be suppressed and not be allowed to pass through the mails? Mr. Underwood will say yes to this. But does he want any more law upon this or any other subject than is necessary? Does he want to crowd our statute books with severe laws when it already has enough to answer all purposes? Are not too many laws as bad, or worse than too few? If the laws in existence previous to March, 1873, were all sufficient to rid the country of the vile prints objected to, was it necessary to pass more? Is it not a fact that all obscene books and pictures were driven out of circulation, if not out of existence, before the laws of March, 1873, were enacted? Let us assure Mr. Underwood such is the fact. The stock of the vile stuff which existed in this city was seized the year before the passage of those laws, and none of consequence has been in circulation since, and under the operation of those laws not a real case of obscenity has been prosecuted, but hundreds of cases have occurred where well-disposed people have been annoyed and tortured beyond measure. If friend Underwood thinks this statement untrue, we ask him to point out a single instance where an obscenity case deserving of prosecution has been prosecuted under the Comstock laws of 1873. For every case of the kind that he can point out we will name to him fifty cases where persons not guilty of obscenity and guilty of violating no law have been maliciously, cruelly, and wickedly prosecuted, persecuted, and bedeviled until they were fain to take themselves out of the world, or where the grief and anguish consequent upon the attacks of Comstock drove them in sorrow to their graves. Now, these things are so, and being so, does Mr. Underwood really think it is any part of the duty of freedom-loving Liberals to sustain such a man or his laws, and that it is a crime, or a blunder, or an error, or even a piece of ignorance to ask for a repeal of such evil laws? Can he really think that Mr. Abbot's course in regard to those laws has been just and judicious? If he does, we most assuredly do not, and shall exercise the liberty of expressing our opinions upon the subject. We do not believe Mr. Abbot will make his fortune either financially or in reputation by upholding Comstock or his laws. He may be eminently cultured, but he will scarcely be considered respectable and much less Liberal. It is our opinion that if the existence of Liberalism depends upon sustaining Comstock or his laws, the sooner it goes up in smoke the better, and let us have something more sound and more just in its place.

We have an instance of pure and unadulterated Comstockism in the Heywood case. Heywood is a graduate of Brown University, a gentleman and a scholar, and as honest a man as the sun shines upon. He is a hundred times more honest, more honorable, and purer than Anthony Comstock, but he committed the great crime of writing and printing his true convictions on a subject which he considers of deep importance to his fellow man, and for thus exercising his inalienable rights, Comstock, by false and decoy letters, caused his arrest, trial, and imprisonment, and by the aid of bigoted and unrighteous Christian judges produced his conviction and sentence, and pursuant to those Comstock laws which Messrs. Abbot and Underwood are so anxious to perpetuate, and which they think is so great an offense to ask to be repealed, that good, brave man has been torn from his family, and is at this moment serving out his sentence of two years at hard labor in Dedham jail. Are they not indeed beautiful laws, which every Liberal in the land should shout himself hoarse over, which have sent Mr. Heywood to prison? If Messrs. Abbot and Underwood pursue a consistent course, if they still deem those laws just and desirable to be retained, they must think that Mr. Heywood's sentence is a just one, and that "it served him right" to send him to prison? Mr. Abbot said Mr. Heywood has been "indecent," and of course he should be deprived of his liberty. He has said we also have been indecent, and it is not improbable that he thinks our true place would also be in prison.

It puzzles us to understand how Mr. Underwood is able to decide that the Constitution gives Congress any right to examine the moral quality of mail matter. There is not a word in that instrument that squints in the slightest degree in that direction. All it says on the question of mails is that Congress shall have the right to establish post roads and post-offices; that is to say, Congress shall have the power to afford facilities for transporting mail matter for the people, but it gives none for restricting the same. All men, of all colors, of all creeds, of all sizes, and all degrees of morality and decency have equal rights in the mail, and it is surprising that a gentleman of Mr. Underwood's usual good judgment and fine reasoning powers should occupy opposite ground. It would seem that his logical mind ought to be able to see that if Congress, or judges, or juries are empowered to condemn a man for depositing matter in the public mail, on the ground of indecency or immorality, that they would have to go but one step further to condemn him for heterodoxy in presuming to oppose the divinity of the Bible and the Christian religion. If a man shall be deprived of liberty of conscience as to matters pertaining to social ethics, sexual physiology, the laws of reproduction, what is to prevent his being debarred from expressing his dissenting views from current theology? Mr. Samuel Colgate, the president of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, in its last public meeting, denounced Freethinkers and Infidels equally as strongly as Freelovers. He thought the literature of each ought to be suppressed. If, then, Comstockism and Colgateism are to become the rule of the land, where are Mr. Underwood and Mr. Abbot to be? Why, in prison, of course, working out their respective sentences at hard labor? In the eyes of our Christian rulers and Christian law-makers they are just as deserving of it as Mr. Heywood. Is it indeed a part of the reformed Liberal creed that a man may think as he pleases on the subject of theology, and may be as radical as he pleases, but on the social and reproductive questions he shall think and act just as Congress prescribes, or go to prison? Is this the rule which Messrs. Abbot and Underwood would prescribe for us, and would recommend all good, submissive Liberals to advocate? If so, we will have to be a rebel; we can never bow our neck to such a yoke. We must be as free to think and speak and print and mail on one subject as another, and we want to know who is the man that has the power and the right to say No to our free, native American right.

True, the U. S. Supreme Court did recently give a weak, half-and-half sort of decision that the mail laws of 1873 are constitutional, but it is probably the weakest and the lamest decision that ever emanated from that court, and was given in the Christian interest because they saw if they pronounced the law unconstitutional that it would directly and seriously affect the work of the Young Men's Christian Association, of the Christian Society for the Suppression of Vice, of the Christian agent, Anthony Comstock, etc., etc., and it was deemed best to let it stand as it is. But, as true as the sun shines at noon-day, sooner or later, those laws will be set aside on the grounds of unconstitutionality. "Round and round we run; ever the truth comes uppermost, and ever is justice done."

There is scarcely a bright ten-year-old boy in the country who cannot see that Congress has no constitutional right to inspect or condemn the right of opinion in any citizen, and the doctrine that any man of any shade of belief or views shall be sent to prison and his property confiscated because he avails himself of the mail facilities of the country, must ultimately pass away, even though Messrs. Abbot and Underwood do advocate it. Justice is simply justice, and it cannot be changed into intolerance nor exquisite respectability.

We must confess, we are sorry to see Mr. Underwood advocating the constitutionality of abridging individual right and individual liberty upon any question. It is so different from the decision which the great statesmen of 1836 came to in that year in reference to stopping certain matter from passing through the mails, as to cause absolute surprise. At that time the dwellers in the southern portion of our country were extremely sensitive to the question of abolitionism, and they wished to prohibit it from passing through the mails, styling it incendiary matter. The N. Y. Tribune was then denominated incendiary matter, and that and similar publications were tried to be prohibited from mail facilities; but the U. S. Supreme Court, and such statesmen as Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, John Quincy Adams, Lewis Cass, Silas Wright, and others, decided the effort to be unconstitutional, and it was dropped. They held, imperatively, that all alike had rights to the mail, and that no set of opinions would be legally prohibited. We wish Messrs. Abbot and Underwood could see the matter equally as clear. If they could, they would perceive the great danger of any portion of the community being empowered to decide what another portion may or may not think, or what they may or may not send through the mail. If the Christians are thus empowered to judge, the Infidel must be placed at great disadvantage. He will be sure to be condemned. Should the Catholics come into power, the Protestants would have to go to the wall; because everything that denies the infallibility of the Romish Church and the Immaculate Conception would be pronounced immoral and would be prohibited. If Materialists and Atheists were, at some time in the future, to come into power, and they were allowed to prohibit mail facilities for opinion's sake, or upon the ground of morality, it would be very easy for them to say all belief in religions and superstitions is immoral and damaging to the rising generation, and consequently must be prohibited. How unjust that would be! But it is the ultimate result of the doctrine advocated by Messrs. Comstock, Abbot, and Underwood.

What ails these gentlemen is their utter abhorrence of obscenity and the fear that somebody will judge them favorable to it. It would be well were they not so thin skinned on this subject. Obscenity is very bad, but it is not the greatest crime that is committed. It is not so bad as injustice, calumny and serious injury done to a brother. Far greater wrongs have been done by man in a spirit of injustice toward his fellow-man than by all the obscenity the world has ever contained. It is right to abhor obscenity with all our heart, but other deep wrongs ought to be abhorred with equally as much intensity. We have been accused of being favorable to obscenity, but the charge is most untrue and unjust. We wish the circulation of vile, foul prints to be prohibited in whatever means of conveyance, but we are opposed to doing this by mail laws or by United States laws, and for these reasons: first, it is unconstitutional, and secondly, because it does the business very imperfectly. These laws can only reach what passes through the mail, while the avenues by express, by freight, by private despatch and by private conveyance are left open, by which an immense amount of bad business can be done. The fact already cited that before the obnoxious mail laws were enacted the country was thoroughly rid of all that vile trash and has continued so since, while since the passage of those laws there has been very little of that kind of business to attend to; these facts—and facts they are—ought to be sufficient to convince Messrs. Abbot and Underwood that their alarm, their fears, and their outcry are wholly unnecessary, and also that the great virtue and excellence of the Comstock laws exist wholly in their over-wrought imaginations.

We are at a loss to judge by what authority Mr. Underwood makes use of this language: "The absolute repeal of the present law against the circulating of filthy books and pictures through the mails would be welcomed by hundreds of depraved wretches whom it would help, by enabling them with but little danger to carry on their infamous business." The gentleman is not in the habit of making loose assertions. He usually has some authority upon which to base his utterances, but in this case it is to be feared he has very little. It is hardly to be expected that he has been in communication with the parties he speaks of or that they have confided the secrets of their hearts to him. Judging by the magnitude of the suppressing business that was accomplished before those laws became laws, and the small amount that has been done since, it is very safe to presume that they feel a supreme degree of indifference as to what is done with the Comstock laws. It is the innocent and the worthy that have occasion to fear Comstock and his laws and not the real publishers and venders of downright obscenity that have occasion to hold him and his laws in deep apprehension.

It would be well could the minds of Messrs. Abbot and Underwood be divested of the perfect horror they entertain with reference to the tons of vile trash that stand ready to go forth to all the schoolgirls of the country the moment Comstock and his laws are set aside, and that he is the only protection the dear innocents have between themselves and utter ruin. The mistake is a great one. The tons of vileness exist in the imagination and in the imagination only. There is undoubtedly more of that kind of badness in this city than in all other parts of the country. It has always been so. New York has been the headquarters for all that sort of indecency, but we are informed by credible persons who have the best chances for knowing, that since the year 1872—before the passage of the Comstock laws—if a lynx-eyed person were to search this entire city, from High Bridge to the Battery, with a lantern and a fine-toothed comb, not a copy of the old style of "bad books" could be found. If Messrs. Abbot and Underwood could be convinced of this truth it is probable that they would sleep much sounder and sweeter, and that the welfare of school children would become a source of far less anxiety. The schoolgirls are in no immediate peril from the tons of obscene and villainous matter waiting to be sent to them. It does not exist and nobody wishes to bring it into existence.

There has been nothing of the kind gotten up in six years. The talk about the tons of such matter passing through the mails is utterly false. Nothing of the kind occurs and nothing of the kind has occurred, and those who have had the nightmare in consequence of that imaginary big devil would do well to calm and compose their minds, for there is not the slightest necessity for their trepidation. In 1872 Comstock seized some considerable quantities of libidinous books, etc., and he has seized very little since. This stock of 1872 he keeps as his museum to exhibit on all occasions to shock the clergy, congressmen, editors, and such alarmists as Messrs. Abbot and Underwood. He takes of that stock to Washington and Albany when he wishes to win over to his use members of Congress and of the Legislature. When they have had a good look at this 1872 museum of indecency, they feel disposed to legislate just about as he prescribes. It is also from that 1872 stock which he keeps on hand, that he draws from when he sends obscene matter to various persons and to various parts of the country—the same stock of which his accomplice Joseph A. Britton has on occasions without number offered for sale to those he intended for Comstock's victims. We would say to all these intense obscenity haters, especially Mr. F. E. Abbot, that there is no sufficient grounds for his alarm and unceasing fears. It will be a long time before our fair land is sunken and submerged and over-slaughed by foul obscenity. Even the bad people of the country are not as bad as they are represented.

We must say our experience differs from that of Mr. Underwood. True, he has had good opportunities for ascertaining the feelings of Liberals on the question of repeal and modification, and he says he has found the sentiment almost universally in favor of modification and in opposition to repeal. Not so with us, we have conversed with large numbers of persons upon the subject, and receive many letters every day. The matter is often referred to, and in nearly every instance the friends we have heard from are in favor of repeal and opposed to tampering and temporizing. The secret is just here: Friend Underwood is a modifier and his friends modify to suit him, while we are known to be a repealer, consequently repeal is pealed into our ears. Let us all learn to possess our souls in patience.

We beg pardon of our readers for our prolixity and for some repetitions we have made of what we have said on former occasions. We have such a dislike of being misrepresented or placed in a false position that we say more than we would otherwise.

To the Liberals of the country we would say, wait with patience and composure until the talent of Boston have time to prepare a petition "as is a petition," one fit for intelligent Liberals to put their names to, and when the cultured editor gives the word of command all you will have to do is to march up to the cannon's mouth and be shot down like men or uphold the Comstock banner and shout for "modification" and "damn repeal," as the case may be. Hurrah for Abbot, culture, and respectability!

P. S. We are still a repealer.

NUMEROUS LETTERS are reaching us inquiring, "What has become of Payne's Age of Reason?" To relieve ourselves from the labor of answering many letters, we make this general answer which we will send to all inquirers: The Age of Reason is, we believe, suspended. One, and we believe a principal cause of its suspension, was its unfortunate quarrel with THE TRUTH SEEKER, in which truth compels us to say Mr. Payne was the aggressor. We do not know where Mr. Payne now is, or what his intentions are in reference to his subscribers."—Positive Thinker.

Religion not History.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

This entire ignoring of narrative gospels by Paul demonstrates to us that during his career no such narratives were yet written. For no one who has common respect for him will think him so perverse that when, under the immediate sanction of the apostles at Jerusalem, narratives had been compiled, Paul could slight and utterly neglect them. Such an opinion, coming from an avowed pagan, would be an unplausible aspersion—a mere slander. On listening to the language of some concerning the Bible and the gospels, one might fancy that they thought the apostles carried a sacred narrative in their hands, and, entitling it The Gospel, proclaimed the acceptance of "the book" as divine and inspired to be the cardinal point of justifying faith. But no such book as yet existed, much less was preached, as of divine origination. When an apostle spoke, his words were not treated as infallible; far otherwise; they sometimes differed among themselves. And if an apostle put pen to parchment, there is nothing to imply that in those days his written words were thought less fallible than his spoken words. The title Gospel, given in later times to these four narratives, seems now to delude many into the idea that, in the first age, by "preaching the gospel" was meant reciting a narrative of the human life and precepts of Jesus. If the apostles had set the same value on these as the Church did in the following centuries, they could not have failed to compile such narratives in the very first years. That they did not, shows that all of them substantially agreed with Paul, and that their "gospel" was something else than the miracles and moral precepts and wanderings of Jesus. Indeed, the received books of the Christian canon itself make clear what was the primitive gospel or good news. It was the proclamation of a coming divine kingdom on earth, in which Messiah should rule in person, and his saints sit on thrones by his side. If people will shut their eyes they cannot see this; but the fact is as clear as clear can be. A truly fascinating proclamation it was to a world trampled down under Roman tyranny. Messiah was to descend from heaven, not at the end of the world (as our English version erroneously has it), but at the end of the age. A new and blessed age was thereby to be established.

The times of refreshing were to come from the presence of the Lord, who would send to the cruelly wronged nations Jesus the Christ for restitution or re-establishment of all things, according to the words of all the holy prophets. The glorious prospects held up in Daniel and Isaiah especially had long been the delight of the Jews. They were necessarily the infant-food of the Christian Church. From this source it learned of what kind the kingdom of God would be; to have renounced these glowing predictions would have been suicide. Neither James, John, and Peter, nor Paul could have dreamed of such a proceedure; only a later age, after Jerusalem had perished, could deride as "Jewish" the glorious hope of Messiah's earthly rule, unveiled in Hebrew prophecy. Even a Hebrew Psalmist, without allusion to a messiah, had announced that Jehovah would get the victory over the heathen with his right hand and holy arm, and make known his salvation to the ends of the earth; therefore he called on all the peoples to rejoice and the floods to clap their hands, because Jehovah was coming—was coming to judge the world in righteousness. His kingdom was to be fundamentally new, exterior and visible, a real kingdom of heaven on earth. All pagan rulers were to be dethroned. The day of the Lord of Hosts was to be against all that was proud and lifted up, against high towers and fenced walls, against fleets* and war-horses, and chariots and royal pomp. The pride of all glory was to be stained; the honorable of the earth were to be brought in contempt. The Lord alone was to be king; let the earth rejoice! Truly this righteous rule is, as it was, "the desire of all nations." When announced as imminent, in conjunction with the stern call to repent of sin and be converted to a holy life—a call to which the conscience of mankind responded—it is not wonderful that so many listened and believed. Not that this gospel was "good news" to everybody. Of course, it was not to the princes of this world, against whose power it was proclaimed; Roman emperors were able to understand so much. But "the day of the Lord" was not only to overthrow all that is high and mighty, it was also to burn up the meaner sinners. Some one has said that Christianity is founded on the doctrine of hell fire, which seems to me an error, if hell means an eternal or a lasting fire; but, undoubtedly, the doctrine of God's fiery wrath against sinners, on "his great day," was cardinal to Christianity.

In Isaiah, as in the Apocalypse, Messiah was to tread the winepress of God's wrath and to stain all his raiment with blood. According to the other notion, also military, a fire was to go before him, and burn up his enemies, the wicked of every class. "To flee from the wrath to come" was the burden of John the Baptist, who first uttered, "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Jesus followed it up with the same formula. Paul echoed it in words substantially the same. The Lord Jesus was to be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the gospel. On those who obey unrighteousness, tribulation and anguish would fall in the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, out of which only a select body of mankind would be saved. The day of the Lord would come as a thief in the night, and the children of darkness would not escape. Hence the exhortation, Save yourselves out of this untoward generation. Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, and that you may stand perfect before the Lord at his coming. All who had heard the primitive gospel understood that it was a day of vengeance, as well as of mercy, a day sudden and sharp, a day of universal convulsion even to the sun and stars; a day to be wished for by saints, but to be dreaded by the wicked and by obstinate unbelievers.

That this great consummation—the bringing down from above a divine king, accompanied by angels and by saints raised from the dead, who would destroy tyrannies and idolatries—was to come speedily, is attested in the first three gospels and in the Apocalypse, in the epistles of James and Paul, and in the first epistle of Peter. "Behold! I come quickly." "I come as a thief: I say unto all, watch." "Ye turned to God from idols, to wait for his Son from heaven." "Keep this commandment without spot until the manifestation of the Lord Jesus." "The coming of the Lord draweth nigh." "The time is short: the Lord is at hand." "The Judge standeth at the door." "The end of all things is at hand." "The revelation of Jesus Christ, to show unto his saints what must take place speedily: the time is near." "Surely I come quickly." These are some of the phrases which assure us that the primitive gospel was the proclamation that God was about to send from heaven, very speedily, a divine Savior who would, in a moment of time, sweep away from among men all tyrannical rule. That this Savior had recently lived in Judea as a holy prophet was, no doubt, matter of interest, yet necessarily secondary; that he was to be the righteous king foretold by many prophets, the king for whose rule millions of hearts ached (as they still ache), was the prime fact; and his speedy coming made all earthly concerns seem insignificant.

The second epistle bearing the name of Peter (which for other strong reasons, is regarded as of later origin) is reactionary on this topic, and complains that men ask, "Where is his promised coming?" a question that necessarily arose, when time had passed on, and "things continued as they were from the beginning." A most evasive explanation is there given, viz., that a thousand years are, in God's estimate, but as one day. Thus God is made out to cheat us and mock our hankerings after just rule by telling us that he comes quickly; while by such logic the phrase may mean a million years or a million million as easily as a thousand. Again, the epistles of John the Elder have not a hint of this impending return of Christ to establish a personal rule on earth; a fact which suggests that John the Elder lived in the second century. His Greek style is identical with that of the fourth gospel, which also is silent about the divine kingdom on earth, totally omitting even the cardinal proclamation, "Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand."* Indeed, the contrast between the first and the fourth gospel is notable concerning the royalty of Jesus. In Matthew, the high priest adjures him by the living God to tell whether he be the Christ. Jesus assents, and adds, with needless circumstance: "Presently ye shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven." As he habitually calls himself "Son of man," the very fact is a virtual allusion to Daniel vii, 13, and a proclamation of this "gospel of the kingdom." But in John xviii, 33, when Pilate asks him whether he is the king of the Jews, Jesus replies, not with frank precision, as in Matthew, but evasively, for he says: "My kingdom is not from this world;" but leaves it obscure whether or not he expects, by angelic swords, to be shortly installed on an earthly throne. The omission of this topic in the fourth narrative does but bring additional proof that it is of later origin, and cannot lessen our conviction as to what was the primitive gospel held in common by James and by Paul; a doctrine which so vividly fixed attention on the glories of an immediate future as to overpower interest in Jesus as a human personality.

A Plea for the Unborn.

In looking about for a remedy for the many ills to which the workingmen and middle classes seem to be heir, the chief concern should be to find one that is practicable. There are as many potions ready to be taken as there are patients to take them, but they are inseparable from surroundings which are not to be thought of. The co-operative plan of stores and workshops has done much for the lower classes of England. But it does not seem to be received with so much favor in this country—probably because we are not reduced to the straits with which our English brethren are familiar. New York is especially full of reforms and reformers. Some of the schemes are admirable, could they be carried out, and some are deplorable in their tendencies, and it is perhaps best that they should have no influence beyond the very limited circle which holds them.

One of the most successful enterprises—from a pecuniary point of view—ever devised to assist men and women without means, is the communal home at Oneida. The founders of that enterprise have prospered amazingly, and accomplished wonders for their members. Some of the social features of that institution are, however, extremely bad; so bad, in fact, that they more than counterbalance the good effected by their compact organization. A scheme which should unite the advantages of organization, and still leave the family relations untouched would be more desirable. But we can learn one lesson from them which should be treasured up by the laboring people. They allowed no children to be conceived in their community till they were prepared to support and educate them. They did not and do not interfere with the sexual relations although they did and do interfere with the love relations. Whether the means employed by them to prevent an increase of population is the best or not I do not pretend to know. That is for physicians to discuss. Once convince people of the necessity of regulating the size of their families by their means of sustaining them, and remove the Christian embargo from the discussion of this subject and we will soon have healthy and practicable methods of reaching this result. That there are now ways in existence, no one who takes the pains to inquire, will doubt. Every educated physician knows what will accomplish this, and that class of females who are a curse to any country are not wholly ignorant of the manner in which undesirable offspring may be avoided. The wealthy classes are also familiar with this subject, and it is principally among the workingmen, where large families are the most severely felt, that ignorance upon this subject is the deepest.

A great many will say that this country is in no danger of having too many children. The country is not, but the laborer is, and it is to the laborer directly that this question is of the most consequence. The lady who rides in her carriage does not regulate her family through necessity, but for her own convenience. The laborer should regulate his by the wishes of his wife and the length of his pocket-book.

At the close of our late civil war, the immigration of foreigners was large. They came by thousands and crowded into our cities. Manufacturing was increased, but the country was not developed. Tenement houses went up in the towns, and the farms were left deserted. The squalid streets were filled, and the broad prairies were left to the wild flowers. The solitude of the desert was unbroken, and the avenues of cities were choked with workers. We are now paying the penalty. Manufacturers commenced to cut down wages, and the workers commenced to strike. There was no work for many, but they had to eat. Though their hands were idle their stomachs were not. There were so many competitors for work that wages were easily reduced, but there was no cessation in the competition for food. Millions were reduced from comfortably-fed mechanics to poorly-fed day-laborers, and the day-laborers were forced into the ranks of the beggars and criminals. All classes except the very rich sunk down a step in the scale of civilization, and the very rich began to form an aristocracy of wealth, and to look with indifference if not contempt on their less fortunate fellow-beings. If one-half of the population of this country could be taken from the towns and cities and settled on farms, the shadow of hard times would be lifted from our land, and the bright sunlight of prosperity would gild and gladden the face of toil. But it cannot be done. It is hopeless to dream of such a millennium, and we must make the best of a bad condition.

Society is honeycombed with corruption, and the workingman has contributed—unintentionally, we know—to the general demoralization around us. Our leaders have been "the blind leading the blind," and they have led us into a Stygian darkness, from which we are now painfully groping our way. Priests and politicians have been our ruin. Politicians have coaxed, flattered, and in too many instances hired the workingmen to vote for them. Politics seem to be a game in which the most unscrupulous win, and the man who should rest his claim to the suffrages of his fellow-citizens upon the righteousness of his cause and the honesty of his purpose would stand but a slight chance in the race for office. Big promises and small performances are the capital on which a politician gets and administers his power.

As for the priests, it is perhaps to be expected that they will always be found on the side of the conservatives. They always have been clogs and brakes on the wheels of progress, and, if we judge them by their record, always will be. It is for their interests to keep the poor people ignorant, for by such ignorance they thrive. Education is the only sovereign remedy for the disease of poverty—not the education which the college gives, but the education of common sense—but that is exactly what the priests will not let the people have if they can help it. They tell us that we are in the hands of God, that he looks after us all, and that whatever he sends we must accept with resignation. If to a brawny laborer, blessed with a buxom wife, he sends seven children, they must thank him for the "blessing." If he forgets, however, to send food for more than four, they must also submit and praise his goodness in sending even that much. For the rest, they must depend on charity, or see their children starve. Such teaching is devilish, but that it is so, no Christian can deny. And when an Atheist, filled with love for her race, points out a way in which poverty can be at least ameliorated, she is prosecuted, her child torn from her, and herself made the object of bitter and pharisaical reviling. Such is the treatment meted to the philanthropist by the priests. Such is the reward of a noble woman, and I might add, of such bigots is the kingdom of heaven.

But the people are getting aroused upon this subject and are beginning to regard it as the most practical means of alleviating the suffering of the poor in the future. It may be difficult to convince the Westerner, who looks over an almost boundless land, that there are too many workers in the country, but let him come to the city and he will be convinced. Let him wander among the squalid habitations of the poor—the Baxter streets, the Water streets, and the Five Points, to be found in every large city—let him see the wretchedness, want, and woe of the dirty denizens of under-ground cellars; let him listen to the sounds of drunken revelry and the contending voices of wrangling human brutes which issue from the dimly-lighted dens of poverty, and he will not say there are not too many. He will only wonder at the toleration of such places, and he must have more than a human heart not to wish that thousands of the poor creatures had never been born.

These are the lowest ranks of labor, the recruiting offices from which are drawn the petty thieves and vilest criminals which the workingman is taxed to support. If you go up a step or two to the better class of workingmen, you will find a difference of degree, and not of kind. Crowded in narrow streets are tall tenement houses, each holding twenty families, with an average of five, and often more, in a family. Think of it! a hundred human beings crowded into a single house! Think of it, farmers, on your splendid farms, merchants in your cozy homes, mechanics toiling at your trade. A hundred people in a single house, and yet there are hundreds, aye thousands, of these sepulchres of poverty in this city alone. They are monstrous coffins filled with unshrouded ghosts, for the people who inhabit them are but shadows of what men and women should be. Pale and spiritless women, tired and discouraged men, rickety and sickly children, fill them from garret to cellar. Despondency pervades the very streets, and poverty, toil, and care are stamped on every face. And yet they go on rearing children to follow in their footsteps—perhaps to sink into the ranks of the criminals, or to be forced to the poor-houses to subsist on charity.

Is it a crime to ask them to abstain from begetting children—we do not ask them to forego marriage—to beg them not to crowd their houses any fuller, to pray them not to visit their misfortunes on their innocent offspring, and to wait till they are able to feed and educate the beings who are to be the future laborers of the world? Is it a sin to plead for the unborn generations, to ask that they may have the comforts denied their parents, the luxuries to which they are strangers, the advantages which are as far from them as the glittering stars? How many souls have been dwarfed and cramped by the spectre of poverty—the ever-pressing need of working for the daily bread! And will our workingmen go on raising slaves for the capitalists, criminals for our jails, and competitors for the scanty subsistence forced from the grudging earth?

If the laborer should intelligently use the power he has in the ballot, he could remove the incubus placed upon him by the capitalist; and, if he use his reason, he can make the earth a happier place for those who come after him. Is it too much to hope that he will? EUGENE MACDONALD.

The Watkins Convention.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: G. C. Hibbard Esq., of Watkins, the Chairman of the Schuyler County Liberal League and Freethought Committee will be pleased to furnish friends who contemplate attending the Watkins Convention with any required information, or engage for them rooms in advance at hotels or boarding-houses. And the following extracts from a letter I received from Mr. Hibbard to-day may give your readers some necessary information.

"The Hall you can have, also the Grove, which is in the centre of the village, and is the most delightful park I know of for its size; it is well shaded, can seat about two thousand people and furnish camping ground for about sixty tents. I have seen the hotel and boarding-house people with the following results: Glen O. K. Hotel, Lake View Hotel, and Glen Mountain House, our three best and first-class houses, $2.50 per day. The Jefferson House and Fall Brook House are $2 00 per day. Higher prices than these they will not ask, and perhaps you can get them to shade a little if the parties are large enough. All our boarding-houses will charge $1 00 per day. Fare on steamboats, excursion rates, from Geneva to Watkins and return, $1.00, which is half price; from Canandaigua to Watkins and return $1.95 two-thirds rate; from Elmira to Watkins and return ninety-one cents. Some of our citizens will take some of the distinguished speakers to their houses. Many private houses will board cheaply.

"It will be time to organize a business committee in August. At Havana, three miles from here, the hotel rates are from $1.00 to $2.00. There are three nice clean hotels in Havana. There will be no extortion by any of the hotels, and those attending the meeting will be kindly and considerately treated. The hotel prices could be obtained lower if the convention was held in June. August is the best month of the season, as the most tourists come that month. Do you expect us to provide any tents? if so, I will submit the matter to the committee."

I will add that I am confident that arrangements can be made with the best hotels for $2 00 per day. And as for a tent in which to hold the meeting, brother Cosad of Wolcott, informs me he thinks he can obtain the large one we had at the Wolcott meeting of last year if desired.

The Watkins Convention.

HON. FREDERICK DOUGLASS ACCEPTS AN INVITATION TO SPEAK.

WASHINGTON, D. C, June 23, 1878.

MY DEAR SIR: I cheerfully give my heart and hand to every earnest effort to know the truth and free the human mind from the thralldom of bigotry and superstition of every kind and degree, and hence, if not prevented by the claims of duty elsewhere, I shall be with those who assemble in Watkins on the 22d of August.

We cannot, I think, do a better work in our day and generation than to hold up the standard of perfect freedom of thought against all the fetters forged by priestcraft and the gloomy traditions of men. Law irreversible and eternal we should seek to know and obey, as the highest of which man is capable. Yours truly,

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

To H. L. Green, Esq.

An Open Letter to Anthony Comstock.

BY A YOUNG CONVERT.

DEAR SIR: Believing that the popular impression that philanthropists seek only the approval of their own consciences, and are totally indifferent to public praise or blame, is a somewhat erroneous one, I have ventured to entertain the hope that you, at least, would not prove entirely insensible to the homage of an obscure but infatuated admirer. Although a stranger to you personally, I have carefully and enthusiastically studied your career from the beginning, and flatter myself that I have correctly estimated your public life and character.

What Boswell was to Johnson that am I to Comstock. If your modesty has heretofore prevented you from taking your proper place amongst the notables of the land, I am determined that it shall do so no longer. I will be an Aaron unto you and speak for you.

I have searched the pages of history with a jealous eye to see if any might justly claim to share the honors with my hero, but no rival appears. A few abortive attempts have been made, it is true, to produce a perfect monstrosity, but there was always some essential element lacking. It remained for this nineteenth century to crown the work of ages by happily and harmoniously combining in one person the characteristic qualities of the serpent, the hyena, the jackal, and the turkey-buzzard, and produce an—Anthony Comstock.

It is said that Nero caused his victims to be torn to pieces by wild beasts. But you cannot be charged with any such prodigal waste of raw material. Your victims are not frittered away on ordinary wild beasts, but carefully reserved for the especial entertainment of yourself and pious associates. I suppose, however, it was some consolation to them to know that they were being worried to death by the most beastly beast in the menagerie of the universe.

Thomas de Torquemada made a vigorous dash for immortality by frying a few hundred thousand Freethinkers. But Thomas was a failure. It is charged that he was sincere, and it is even hinted that he possessed a conscience. Now, as you have never been accused of sincerity, and were never known to be troubled with that useless baggage, a conscience, you have been enabled to easily outstrip all competitors on the highway to infa— Christian usefulness.

Cortez and Pizarro, fired with a holy zeal for the mother Church and a laudable desire to accumulate a moderate amount of filthy lucre, butchered a million or two of pagans. But it is well understood that you are not actuated by any such sordid motives. Gold, silver, national currency, and even greenbacks you despise as dross, for whether you

Ride on the railroad or walk.
Write decoy letters or talk,
Lie, or commit perjury.
Steal, or commit forgery, whatsoever you do, you do all to the glory of Comstock, Britton, Abbot, God, & Co.

Dear Anthony, I admire you immensely, but just now my admiration yields to solicitude. We have it from your own pen that when you were a clerk at Washington you became "enciente," and as would never consent to "put things out of the way" you must by this time be in a "very interesting and delicate condition," and I am harrowed with fears lest that little episode in the life of Pope Joan be repeated here in the streets of New York, respectability come to grief, and that godless Infidel Bennett exalt his horn against us. Oh, Anthony! why did you not use "vaseline"? Brother Colgate would have been only too willing to furnish you (at a moderate profit) all you required, and as he is President of our immaculate "Society for the Suppression of Virtue and Morality," the law of course would not effect him, and everything would be lovely. But now, I am tormented with ragged-edged anxiety—

'Tis a point I long to know.
Can you be relieved or no?

I suppose you are aware (or if not I will inform you) that I am a profound student, and at the same time, professor, of that ancient and very respectable "science," astrology, and my interest in you has induced me to consult the stars in reference to you, and although the result is not as flattering as could be wished, yet it may prove interesting to you and satisfactory to your acquaintances. Your horoscope reads thusly:

You were born in the sign of the "Scorpion" (the constellation that rules obscenity). Malign influences prevailed; the stars conspired together for evil, a mildew fell upon the earth, and the tail of the dragon trailed its shadow across your path in life. Your early history——Ahem! (Well! we may as well pass over that and avoid unpleasant odors. The business that you are now engaged in is the most congenial to your tastes and genius that you could possibly have selected, nevertheless the stars indicate that the digestion and assimilation of so many tons of obscene literature will ultimately injure your health and ruin your constitution.

If you continue in your course you will become so saturated and gorged with filth that your mother would disown you, your sister would take refuge in a nunnery, your brothers go to Congress or commit suicide at the thought of being related to you. A wen on society, a wart on the body politic, and a cancer on humanity, you will only serve one purpose in the economy of nature—an illustration of the doctrine of "total depravity." The itch, the scurvy, yellow fever, and small-pox will all strike you at once. One of your legs will resemble an elephant's, the other a wild turkey's. Your arms will look like flails, your hands like crane's feet, and your finger nails like grizzly bear's claws. Your backbone will resemble the dorsal fin of a swordfish, your ribs look like a corduroy bridge, and your hair like porcupine's quills. Your toe-nails will drop off, and your teeth fall out (except one, and it will resemble a spike sticking in a stove-pipe hole). Your skin will appear to be hung on your bones to dry, and your eyes resemble those of a dead sucker. Somebody would kill you out of pure compassion, but you will continue to live for the same reason a skunk does—it would be as much as a man's life is worth to go within seventeen feet of you. You will crawl through life a conglomeration of all that is loathsome, detestable, repulsive, and horrible, and when you die, your foul carcass will be carted out to the suburbs. Your grave will be a turkey-buzzard's maw, your monument a pile of guano, and a thanksgiving proclamation will be issued that the earth is rid of a pestilence. And your "soul" (or what passes fo such), not worth saving, and too small to be damned, will float around loose through space, eluding the microscope of the angel Gabriel, and finally gravitate—by the laws of affinity—to polecat paradise.

Now, Anthony dear, let us take sweet counsel together. Don't you think that your valuable services to the "Vice and Immorality" Society have not been sufficiently appreciated? Do you think it right to waste so much of your sweetness on the desert air? Had you not better retire from the arduous labors of a life of obscenity to some more sequestered and peaceful occupation, and let "some other feller" sacrifice himself on the altar of his country for a few periods? Take the advice of one who loves you. Retire to the peaceful banks of the Pennsylvania Canal, seek all along the line for a vacancy, and if you can find a mule team (of the Gothic order of architecture) so dilapidated that no one else would be caught driving it, hasten to restore the equilibrium of nature by dropping into the situation. It is true that in your new vocation you will not corruscate across the range of public vision to any great extent. But this slight drawback will be more than compensated by an immense advantage—in your case not to be despised—you can slip quietly out of the world and escape the eternal execration of mankind.

With all the ardor of a first love, I join in the universal wish that, U. B. DAMD.

Pious Point, State of Grace, June 24, 1878.

THE new 6-inch Armstrong gun at Shoeburyness gives velocities of 2,000 feet per second with 70 pound projectiles, while the pressure in the chamber does not exceed 15 tons per square inch. It weighs about 11 tons, and has a far greater penetrating power than the old 11-inch guns, which weighed 25 tons. This decreased weight of gun, with enormous increase of efficiency, shows the rapid progress made in artillery within the past year, and it further shows the possibility of so arming those merchant vessels which could not use the older heavy pieces as to make them very effective for offense or defense. There is every reason to believe that the development of certain new principles in gun construction will lead to even more astonishing results

PROF. CLERK-MAXWELL, in the Rede lecture delivered at Cambridge, England, recently, thus alludes to the late improvement of the telephone which overcame the principal limitation to its power: "As long as the human voice is the sole motive power of the apparatus it is manifest that what is heard at one end must be fainter than what is spoken at the other. But if the vibration set up by the voice is used no longer as the source of energy, but merely as the means of modulating the strength of a current produced by a voltaic battery, then there will be no necessary limitation of the intensity of the resulting sound, so that what is whispered to the transmitter may be proclaimed ore rotundo by the receiver." This will explain what has been to many so puzzling in the results obtained by the carbon transmitter.

H. MORIN says that if saccharose is heated with water under certain conditions it is transformed into a vitreous product which preserves its transparency, in a greater or less degree, according to the way it is cooled. When the temperature is gradually reduced the translucency is preserved, but affected to some extent with prismatic crystals. If, however, the cooling is rapid, the partial crystallization is avoided. The product contains on an average 3.28 per cent of water, and at 14.5° C. its specific gravity is 1.966.

Letters from Friends.

VALUED ENDORSEMENT.

We take pleasure in presenting the following private letter to our readers, from L. V. Pinney, editor of the Winsted Press, one of the ablest and most Liberal of our exchanges. It was not intended for publication, but is too good to be kept hidden.—[Ed. T. S.]

WINSTED, CONN., June 27, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of my most valued exchanges. It is astonishing to me how you get time to write so much and so well.

It seems to me that the ground taken by the Press on the obscenity question is one which will stand the tests of time and experience—viz., perfect liberty to all men to say what they please on sex, as well as religion and politics. Let the people talk and read just what suits their royal taste. They never were yet made worse by free speech, but always better. It's not for you nor me nor Congress to say this book or this expression is in good taste and that in bad taste, this is obscene and that is not. No man was ever afraid obscenity would harm himself, but his neighbor, poor fellow; he must look out lest it harm his neighbor! I see you are a little afraid yet to take square ground in favor of liberty of thought and speech, and Ingersoll shows himself a very craven in this matter; but I think you will find that the side of liberty will be the winning side here as it has been elsewhere. The course of Abbot is nauseating enough. He is no Liberal. He belongs to bigotry and the Church. All foes of liberty should "join the Church," and he has shown himself the foe of liberty. There won't be much but "culture" left of Abbot when you get through scourging him, I suspect. Very truly yours, L. V. PINNEY.

JEWELL CENTER, KAN, June 20, 1878

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for a short time, but could not afford to do without it at all since I have got to reading it and lending the papers to the neighbors. Real true Liberals are not plenty in this country. Many who do not believe the old mythological stories peddled from the pulpit by priests and preachers, for a pecuniary consideration, are yet afraid to come out boldly and stem the tide of public opinion. I have distributed several dollars' worth of your tracts, and find they are doing good. Ingersoll's lectures are frequently inquired after now, and read eagerly by those who would not read anything like them a year ago. There are many here who would make good Liberals if Liberalism were popular, and the cause is gaining gradually all the time.

Yours most truly, L. D. RAYNOLDS.

WATERPROOF, LA., May 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Being one of the subscribers which you gained through the influence of Mr. S. Sturm, I take the liberty to answer a part of the article signed "Senex" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 4th inst., which I have read with no less "amazement and indignation" than "Senex" could have perused the letter of Mr. Sturm. I was amazed to see in a first-class paper an article like that of "Senex," and indignant that the character of a gentleman should be assailed on so slight a pretext.

With all due deference to the Liberals in your ranks, permit me to assert that none possess a better character, more honest and upright principles, and a higher regard for his fellow's feelings than Mr. Sturm. Had you witnessed with what zeal and devotion he worked for your cause during your trial, etc., you would cheerfully bear me out although he has written to you to stop his paper. I do not approve of the spirit of Mr. Sturm's letter, but it certainly did not call forth such slandering remarks from a person just cowardly enough not to sign his real name when attacking the character of a gentleman.

I shall not reply to anything "Senex" might say in response to this, and with this, drop the subject. You need not, however, "stop my paper." Very truly yours,

HARTWIG MOSS.

WEBSTER, MASS., June 25th, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: An article appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 15th, bearing the title, "Civilization Without Clothes," and written by an extra-cultured person under the nom de plume of "A. R. C.," attacking Mrs. Wheelock and T. C. Leland. They are able to reply to him on that score; but when he makes the astounding assertion that the French nation, as a class, is a nation of prostitutes, that's the rub, and having lived fifteen years in France, and knowing the French uncultured people well, I must try and defend them. In the first place, the French people are the only people that I know of who know how to live. They are not hypocrites; they don't walk about on Sunday in funereal procession, with an unmeaning book under their arm to listen to a man talking nonsense which they don't believe—they enjoy themselves better than that. Anthony Comstock and the "Society for the Suppression of Vice" could not live a week among them; they would be laughed out of existence; and no uncultured French judge could be found to condemn people for such frivolous offenses as those for which Anthony and his people persecute. The French uncultured people come out like men and fight for real liberty; the extra-cultured American stays at home, and hires a man to fight his liberty battles. The French people are not content with a sham republic; they want a real one. The French women are industrious women; they attend to their household duties; they do not recline on rocking-chairs and loaf about, like the cultured ladies of America, in sewing-circles under the pretentious plea of benevolence.

The cultured Mr. Frothingham, in one of his lectures, said the first French Revolution did no good to France. He is mistaken. It did away with the sacred character of king, priest, and noble; it abolished that abominable law, "Primogeniture;" it enacted the tribunal of prud, homme, or arbitration of the working man.

I will conclude with the motto of the "uncultured" French people: "Vive la Republique! Democratic et Social!"

JAMES FORBES,
One of the Uncultured.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., June 15th, 1878.

DEAR FRIENDS: Having made in the last six months a successful tour from Michigan to this city, we now propose to pass July, August, and September on a tour to include the following cities: Dallas, Little Rock, Memphis, St. Louis, Chicago, Indianapolis, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, New York City, Newark, and Boston, and such other towns and villages as may desire us. One or more lectures may be had on any reformatory topics, viz., Spiritualism, Free religion, temperance, labor reform, finance, etc. Mr. Vandercook will sing original songs at each lecture. Mrs. Brown can be engaged for clairvoyant and test seances. We are probably too well known to you to need any recommendations. We however would refer to the editors of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, Banner of Light, Voice of Truth, TRUTH SEEKER, etc. Also to the officers of the Iowa N. Wis., N. Ills., Mich., Tenn. and Texas Associations of Spiritualists and Liberals. Shreveport, La., over June 30th, Sewell, Texas, over July 7th, Dennison, Texas, in discussion with Rev. L. W. Scott, over July 14th. Those who desire us to visit them, please address us (with stamp for reply) at Dennison, Texas Herald office, till July 15th, and we shall be pleased to open a correspondence with you. Believe us tfuly your friends, CAPT. H. H. BROWN.
M. C. VANDERCOOK.

BROWNVILLE, VT., June 26, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Having read long ago, your "World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," I want to tell you my disappointment; I found it better and far more interesting than I expected. And now a word about the "book of the century;" that I want and mean to have some time, and others of your works I know I should like to have. I sincerely thank you for your labors of love bestowed upon such works. Your paper, too, if read, will do great good. Sincerely yours, LUCIUS SMITH.

LEEDS, N. Y., June 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We have just established a new school of Freethought in this village, and it seems to be making Christians feel very badly already, and, of course, they are working against it as best they can, but their work will prove of no avail; we mean business. The name of this association is The Leeds Philosophic and Library Association. Among its objects are the following: "To afford a better opportunity to study the philosophy of politics, religion, the laws of nature, and the various departments of science." We are but few in number, and are also poor. I have given them a room in my building for one year, provided they shall conduct themselves in a manner becoming Infidels, and I guess there will be no trouble about that. They have elected me Librarian, and it devolves upon me to purchase all books, newspapers, etc.; and, of course, I being heartily in sympathy with you, would naturally incline to patronize you, provided we can be as well served for the same money. Our orders will, of course, be small, but we shall, doubtless, be able to order more or less every month. We want you to let us know what percentage you will throw off, or, in other words, what is the best you can do with us? Respectfully,

GEO. H. WARNER.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, June 24, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed two dollars which you may place to my account on THE TRUTH SEEKER which I ordered for Mr. Glime.

I see by the tab on my TRUTH SEEKER that the time has expired for which I payed. I will remit for another year possibly in a few weeks.

You may save me a copy of "The Champions of the Church," the cheapest. I think fromthe characters you have already portrayed in THE TRUTH SEEKER that it is just the book the Infidel inquirer wants. If the account of Catherine de Medici is a fair specimen, and I think it is the book could well be called "The Champions of Hell on Earth," for I think if there ever was a Hell (big H), it was when such fiends roamed at large or held the reins of (un) civil government. Yours truly, JAS. LOVE MCKELNEY.

ST. CHARLES, MINN., June 24, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find one dollar, which please place to my credit towards paying for THE TRUTH SEEKER. In the fall I hope to get one or two more subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. You can also put me down for a copy of your new work, "The Champions of the Church." I will try and send you the money for it early in the fall, when you can send it. I think that the cause of Liberalism is gaining in this vicinity.

Those lectures which Prof. B. F. Underwood delivered in St. Charles about the last of March, and again on the 25th, and 26th of May, had the effect to arouse up a spirit of inquiry into the claims of the Bible, as the inspired word of God. We shall no doubt procure the services of Prof. Underwood again, and also those of other lecturers, so that the people will have a chance to examine the truths of Liberalism. I am very much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. Its candid and fair discussion of the subject of Spiritualism should not displease any seeker after the truth. A fair examination of the subject can do no harm. I hope you will be able to give THE TRUTH SEEKER to the people for many long years. Yours truly, C. L. BLAIR.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to direct your attention to the fact that a reverend lecturer in your vicinity is impressing the way-worn path of antique truth with his colossal weight and determined footsteps. A man of splendid literary taste, but unacquainted as yet with those sweet secret paths known only to the patient and profound lover and seeker of truth.

How can I sufficiently thank him for quoting that harmonious stanza from Milton's divine hymn to the nativity, for those splendid passages from Shakspere—and then such precious things extracted from Tyndall's pages, that would send a thrill to the calm heart of Socrates, or cause the thoughtful soul of Democritus to seem a shade less divine. Yet, as might be expected, he perverts and misrepresents the thoughts of this great scientist—the gem of our age.

Does Tyndall deny the freedom of the will? As reverting in a late speech to that immense chain in which a multitude of causes conspire to produce an effect, he is careful to place the man himself in the position of a great important link.

What object can be more grand than a soul imbued with varied thoughts and associations, a fountain of motives guided by one ruling passion? In some important decision, the last differentiation reaches an advance point, which the man has never before attained, while the mental elation attendant upon this culmination, proclaims the birth of a spontaneous independent thought, or motive of action, the product of his own mind processes—of himself. Who can write upon any subject successfully until his mind is fully imbued with the spirit of the same? What anguish is more keen than that of a genius, when he finds another obtaining the credit due to his own authorship?

Much is attributed to environment, but the soul is a crucible which receives elements into its fiery chamber, to re-create them, and such emanations acquire a divinity which is the free life-issue of the man himself. The will is undoubtedly free, and has force to resist the power of transmitted impressions. "Wheel within wheel, and soul within spirit," what an unlearned jumble? How serenely would Darwin ignore such puny conclusions, and walk out with his microscope to sit at the feet of nature, as she marshalls the atoms to do her bidding.

Mr. Cook resembles the man who never saw a child, and believes that all things are received from the hand of God full grown, overlooking the cycles which elapse between the formation of the fusoria and the man.

Degrees are the science and machinery of the universe; with deliberate and majestic force evolving at its own proper period, the sun or the dew-drop, the human heart, or the human conscience. If Mr. Cook's views are not pantheistic, they are at least identical, with those which are so esteemed by the thinking world, while the theories long since exploded, mouldy relics of Duns Scotus and the middle ages, challenges our belief: "The plan of all created things is hid somewhere in the substance of God."

We seem to hear repeated the honest declaration of learned Buddhists, that there is no God, but a blind irresponsible force; and that the best worship consists in plans for self-defense. After daintily tasting the Pierian spring, our lecturer invites Madame Mystery to throw her veil over the whole subject, which she might have done with as much propriety before he commenced his lectures, saving him much labor and ineffectual attempts to explain that which yields nothing to the efforts of the timid and inconsistent thinker.

Mr. Cook has much faith in chemical identity, and supposes, no doubt, that his decision is final on the germ question, so that scientists need make no more investigations with microscopes of improved power. He constructs quite a stupendous individual out of the co-ordinating power, not alluding to the fact that the most respectable ghost in question must be responsible for the manufacture of much which is malicious and hurtful, and that his path of creative glory is strewed with the mangled victims of his improvidence and procrastination.

The lecturer in question, without sufficient reasoning, depreciates the great and efficient powers of nature, alluded to so triumphantly by Cosin, who cannot sufficiently admire the obedience of the atom to the laws of nature, displaying at least a capacity for future development. A few distinguished scientists pronounce matter naturally inert, but Mr. Cook, with delirious zeal for the honor of God—while he grants that matter is possessed of ethereal properties—esteems the phenomena of nature too stupendous to be accomplished without a constant supply from the fountain of infinite force, the least advance into the creative region being out of the sphere of finite powers. God must leave his throne to give lungs to the tadpole, or to prevent one animal kingdom from encroaching upon another; though Clark supposes these kingdoms to be interlocked without the power of separation.

Promethean fire does not belong exclusively to Jove; the leviathan submits not to a galling chain; neither does a genius, whom Cosin with commendable warmth styles "the rival of God."

Mr. Cook's soul is more ethereal than his spirit; but, according to the law of progress, this soul is destined to eliminate something still more ethereal, which will cast the present existence into the shade, so that the reverend gentleman will probably find in the end that all the souls belonging to his theory will turn out to be spiritual bodies and nothing more.

That life, which is merely a spark, a flash of organized existence—the memories and hopes which are the delicate activities of the same—is termed a cause by the shallow thinker, when it is only an effect of the systematic operations of nature. There can be nothing more fallacious than Mr. Cook's idea, that the spirit is a subtle entity capable of clinging to a refined organism or fragment of the same; both being imperishable and destined thus to be preserved from the general wreck which attends the decomposition of gross matter.

The whole force of our organism is taxed for the performance of every physical and moral act, and these even cannot compass its lofty aims. If there is such a thing as a spiritual body, figuring largely in any world, it is now entirely dependent for all that it possesses or can manifest upon that organization with which we are acquainted. What can it be but body, being an offshoot of body? Repeat or refine these offshoots to any extent, such emanations will be simply existences capable of soul phenomena. A body can never change or transfigure into a soul. A soul is the act of the body, and action is not being.

A hope or memory is not a substantiated thing; it is a phosphorescent spark upon the sea of life, dying in the instant which gave it birth.

Can we imagine for a moment that the deity is constantly supplying some ethereal property to organizations, which could not be benefitted by that which did not grow with and out of themselves. And how amusing the thought that when phenomena are to be expected, poor and awkward nature must, of course, make the first move, or nothing is done to all short-sighted human appearance. The article being duly manufactured, a lively little deity comes up, with a hot iron in his hand, and burning his name upon it, exclaimed: "This is my work." And everybody cries "Hosanna."

How preposterous the idea that finite and infinite life exist in a state of necessary relation to each other, that nature is forced to join impossible harmonies, when the sweetest sound is born of her discords, and the richest light is thrown up from a background of cruelty and gloom. Her highest achievements are wrought from the inmost recesses of her spirit, while perfections and even faults are interesting, chiefly from the fact that they are peculiar to herself.

Respectfully, ZILLAH.

MORRILL, KANSAS, June 22, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: It has been some time since you heard from me, but I have not forgotten you or the cause. I have just returned from a long, protracted trip to the central and southern part of this State. I found a great many Liberals, and numbers that would take THE TRUTH SEEKER if they could spare the money. Hard times press heavily on new beginners in a new country. The people are looking for better times, but I am afraid they will not come in time to save many a poor man's farm from the block. It does me good to see greenbackers and Liberalism gaining ground, and if we can keep the parties purged of traitors and send them where they belong, and each organization works faithfully for the object it was created for, it will accomplish its good work, to the benefit of the people; if not, we can do nothing. I am very sorry to see contention in the Liberal ranks; but there are always some thin-skinned gentlemen who will object to a move if they are not the first counseled, and would ruin a cause they had been working for years to establish rather than another should progress faster than they, or make a move independent of them. Mr. Abbot is one of such men. If he can't be the bell-wether, he will do all he can to scatter the flock, as can be seen by his past record with The Index; and I am sorry to say that there are some readers of The Index who are so made up in the man that they will not read both sides of the question, and are as bigoted to him as the Christians are to their Christ. I have taken The Index since the first year of its publication up to last January, and THE TRUTH SEEKER from the first number; and it seems as if I was well acquainted with you and Mr. Abbot, and I think I am, if a man can gather anything that flows from another's pen. Your views on all questions are told in a straightforward manner, in language that all can understand; no equivocations, no words used, or sentences formed, so as to have a double meaning. I believe that your aim and intentions are for the general good of man, religiously, morally, and politically.

As for Mr. Abbot I can't say so much. In certain directions he has done a good work and worked hard; but the position he has taken in this Comstock affair is like the cow that gave a good mess of milk and then kicked it all over. I think he showed the cloven foot several times. I did not like his course in the Butts and Index Association difficulty; also, in a letter he sent me, at the starting of THE TRUTH SEEKER, stating that you and Butts started it for the purpose of breaking down The Index I don't like his views on the finance question; and, above all, the wet blanket he threw over you at your arrest, and classing the seventy thousand signers of your petition as knaves, fools, or obscenists. I am no writer, but I believe it to be the duty of every signer of that petition to snub Mr. Abbot or acknowledge the corn. I not only signed it, but circulated it, and, out of the whole number (nearly one hundred), I know there was not one in favor of circulating obscene literature. Some of the most prominent men in the county, besides some prominent church members, signed it. I am pretty confident they were not all fools or knaves, as Mr. Abbot tries to make Col. Ingersoll out to be. He says Col. Ingersoll is good-natured. I think he is, or he would snub Mr. Abbot or acknowledge his good-natured stupidity in signing the petition. Mr. Abbot was so used to contentions while in the Christian Church that he is not at home unless he can find fault and cause a rupture in the Liberal ranks. His Comstockism will, if he has the power, tear to pieces the League which he has been for years building up, and make it impotent. As chief of that organization, instead of marshaling his forces and coming to the rescue of one of its members, he slinks back into the enemy's camp, from whence he originated, and joins the howl of the Anthony crew. He was fed and curried in the wrong stall to be a true leader of the Liberal party. He is not the man for The Index. His index finger curves too much towards the orthodox tree, where he once gathered fruit and longs to pick again. As an editor of a Liberal paper, he is too refined, too respectable, too moral (Christian morality) to tell the truth without misrepresenting or downright lying, too refined to publish some subjects that science requires, and the people, for their own good, should know, too respectable to speak about things by their proper names for fear his orthodox friends will cry out, "See what a vile set these Liberals are!" In his eighth demandment he asks "that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'Christian' morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty." Has he abrogated his eighth demandment? Go on, Bennett, your paper is doing a good work. If Abbot howls and lies, you and Mr. Leland are enough for him. Punch all the lies out, and make a good truthful Infidel, out of him, or drive him, with his respectability and fine-haired morality, where they belong.

Yours for the right, J. W. SCOTT.

HUDSON, MASS., June 22, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Seward Mitchell, of Cornville, Me., the long-time iconoclastic writer and defender of free thought and human rights, in a letter addressed to me about two weeks since, from Norridgewock jail, Norridgewock, Me., states that he and his companion, Josie Chase, were arrested and lodged in jail for sixty days, for living their own lives in their own way without asking leave of priest or magistrate. He is permitted to go out every day, a privilege entirely denied her, which distinction of sex, he justly protests against in the strongest terms. This is another illustration of the fraud and tyranny of class legislation and male usurpation which will cause Maine, when right instead of bigotry prevails, to hide itself in shame. Never was there a time, when brave utterances and earnest endeavors were needed more than now. Very truly, GEO. C. WAITE.

CENTRAL, S. C., June 27, 1878.

DEAR BENNETT: I feel so grateful to you and brother Leland, that I must tell you about it. You know I am one of the 70,000 damphools who signed the petition for which we are to be forever excommunicated from the congregation of the Lord, Tony, & Co., to say nothing of the righteous indignation of his eminence Francis E. Abbot. But here is what makes me rejoice and feel like returning thanks—it is the way in which you and brother Leland have dusted that cultured gentleman's jacket. Well it is really funny. I wonder if he knows he is whipped, and that the whole 70,000, whom he has sought to slander and insult from a lying standpoint, now have his measure, and find that the Liberal element in the United States will receive no very perceptible shock when Mr. Abbot shall step down and out of the Infidel ranks, for he is to the cause of mental freedom just what Benedict Arnold was to American Liberty, and would sell his birthright for a mess of Mrs. Grundy's pottage, or a Comstock plaster of respectable rascality. Again let me thank you and brother Leland for your effectual castigation of the great cultured I Am.

Brother Bennett, I hope in a short time to send you one or two subscribers; they have promised it as soon as they can get the money. I am loaning my paper out now all the time. I have calls almost every day, and every one that reads THE TRUTH SEEKER speaks of it in flattering terms; it gets better every week. The "Darwins," by Mrs. Slenker, is causing a good many young folks to read the paper. I hope ere long to see "The Darwins" in book form; I think it will find purchasers. Fraternally thine, R. M. CASEY.

["The Darwins" will be issued in book form as soon as completed.—ED. T. S.]

HONEY GROVE, TEXAS, June 16, 1878.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Old age is on me at last. As our common friend (Charles Stephenson) said about death—said he, in his last moments, "It has come at last." If my letter be childish, it is nothing more than the course of nature that it should be so. You may call to mind that I was born in 1799. I am the oldest man I know in Texas. I am in fine health this morning, so is my first and only wife. She was born in 1802. We were married in 1827. We have one daughter and three sons living. They are in good circumstances, living here in Texas. They are all Infidels, but much respected.

Now, my old friend, if you had time to write me a simple sentimental letter, I have no doubt it would cheer my feelings in the gloom of old age. I am now reading "Views of Our Heavenly Home," by A. J. Davis. It does not give me the pleasure I looked for. I admit that the declarations may be true, but I cannot grasp the sense. What does he mean by saying universes, using the plural? But yet I consider A. J. Davis one of the wonders of the world. I consider A. J. Davis and D. M. Bennett two of the best workers in the world. And what name more notorious, unless it be that of Henry Ward Beecher?

The first in fame, the last in infamy, the bold and truthful TRUTH SEEKER makes its regular visits. But I must say before long, "Stop my paper." I shall not be able to read much longer. I am going out with the impression that what we call death is but an incident in life. I hope to live forever. You and I may meet in the next world. They call it the Summer Land. How I wish I may meet you there. I think I know you now as well as I do any man I never saw. I have your "Biography," and I have your picture. I know what your friends say, and I know what your enemies say. So farewell until we meet in the Summer Land. J. A. RUTHERFORD.

FACTS FROM MY SUNDAY READINGS.

Almanac Items for July —July 3d is the first of the dog-days. The dog-days precede or follow the heliacal rising of the star Sirius in the constellation of the Greater Dog, in the morning. The extreme heat of this season of the year was connected by the ancients with the appearance of this star in the morning, and dogs were supposed to be then more liable to rabies, and festivals were instituted for the killing of dogs during this season. By the precession of the equinox the rising of Sirius in the morning has been changed to the latter end of August, and in a few thousand years it will happen in the dead of winter.

July Fourth, American Independence. This day was formerly called St. Bullion's day, and there was an old saying that "if the deer rise up dry and lie down dry on St. Bullion's day, there will be a good gose harvest," meaning that dry weather at this season is favorable to crops, July Seventh.— The translation of St. Thomas à Becket (Thomas—Hebrew—means a twin).

July Fifteenth.—St. Swithin's day is remarkable on account of the notion that if it rain on this day there will be more or less rain for forty days to come. St. Swithin lived over one thousand years ago. He was the originator of tithes in England. The story runs that he was buried at his own request in the churchyard of the cathedral, and one hundred years after, desiring to give him greater honor, the priests began removing his remains into the interior on the fifteenth of July; a heavy fall of rain stopped them—the rain lasted forty days—and the priests then gave up the project, thinking the saint opposed to the removal.

The twenty-fifth is dedicated to St. James, the apostle. In Catholic times it was customary for the priests to bless the apples on this day.

The primitive Romans had, at first, a year of ten months, making 304 days.

OLD ENGLISH PROVERBS.

A lie has no legs, but scandal has wings.
All is net gain that is got into the purse.
An apple, an egg, a nut, you may eat after a slut.
An hour in the morning is worth two in the afternoon.
An ounce of mother-wit is worth a pound of clergy.
Antiquity is not always a mark of verity [old bibles, for instance].

GRAMMAR.

MANSFIELD, O., June 16, 1878.

DEAR EDITOR: Undoubtedly several of your readers have been more or less diverted by the altercation between Messrs. Einstein and Leland. The clause, "at least nobody that The Index has as yet printed," in Mr. L.'s letter of the 11th ult., attraced my especial attention. Since he has said that he wrote advisedly, and has repeatedly attempted to defend the expression without seeing the point of Mr. E.'s criticism, it is funnier still. "At least nobody whose communication The Index has yet printed," renders the phraseology more explicit.

But please allow me to give a partitive review of Mr. Einstein's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of yesterday. I think I can show that it contains more errors than sentences, the first of which is composed of ill-chosen and worse-arranged elements. Compare, "nevertheless I do not intend to engage in a protracted and superfluous controversy," with his last clause. Change "will" to "should" in the second. Omit "past" and "in them" in the third. "Each other," in the fourth, should be "one another." The principal proposition, in the fifth, should read, "My intention was neither to praise nor to censure it." The sixth is very suggestive. Mr. Editor, on what of your part have you a "weak spot," or a "bad conscience?" The sign of the infinitive is not "needed" after "need" in the seventh. The eighth is so bad that I am compelled to reproduce it: "My letter, as well as his of the 11th inst., has been before your readers, whom I confidently leave to judge whether his is friendly and just to The Index, whether it deserved my criticism, and what I said is correct."

I hope this is sufficient to expose his fallacious pretension that he can write the English language understandingly, a task which very few are capable of performing. The rest of his jargon is equally faulty, and "weak spots" remain in what has been criticised. There are two kinds of ignoramuses; the one is conscious, and the other unconscious, of his own ignorance. The latter should engage our warmer sympathies. Respectfully, J. J. BURDGE.

A LETTER FROM ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

MR. EDITOR: I regret very much that your very able and interesting correspondent, Mrs. Elmina Slenker, cannot be with us at the Watkins Convention. I hope you and other friend of hers will prevail upon her to change her mind and come to Watkins. I know hundreds of her readers would consider it a great pleasure to take her by the hand and make her personal acquaintance.

The following is her letter, which is all very good aside from over-estimation of myself as a Liberal worker, and I hope the reader will pardon me for not withholding that portion of it. H. L. GREEN.

"DEAR FRIEND: I was proud and pleased to see my name in the last TRUTH SEEKER among the honored and honorable list of notables who were invited to attend the Freethinker's Convention at Watkins. I should greatly enjoy being there and forming one of such an assemblage as that will be of the wise, good, and great of the land. I should rejoice to look upon the faces of so many whose names have been to me as household words, and whose printed thoughts have given me so much pleasure and knowledge. I would like to throw the little mite of influence I have in the scale of Liberalism in that public pronounced way that can only be done at such great conventions as this, but I am too far away, and too much confined by home cares and duties to be able to accept the invitation to meet with you all on that hoped-to-be pleasant occasion. It is generous of you to think of partly paying my expenses there. I thank all who are thus kind, and am deeply grateful for the many marks of good will and appreciation I have received from Liberals all over the country.

It is true I have labored faithfully to the full extent of my means, and with tongue and pen for half a lifetime for the spread of Freethought, but I have done it with a glad heart and a willing spirit, and the reward is coming as bread cast upon the waters. From here and there and yonder; from village, hamlet, and city; from the backwoods, the prairies and the beautiful farms, comes the cheering voice of the free!

Old myths, creeds, and superstitions are fast loosing their hold upon the minds of men, and science, truths, facts, and realities are taking their places. Gods and devils have all departed, and men and women are standing in their places.

Thanks for thy card. I have many times thought of writing to thee and telling thee how pleased I was at seeing thee so earnest, energetic, and faithful in thy labors for a cause I have so much at heart. I see thy name in all Liberal papers, and in many that are not so liberal. Thine has been a great work, well performed, and may thee long live to speak for the duped and priest-ridden, and help to open a way for them into the light, cheerful, pleasant paths of the true and the real. Thine gratefully and fraternally,

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

MR. R. J. NUNN calls the attention of electricians to the use of antimony as a negative element to replace carbon in some galvanic batteries where sulphuric acid is used as the exciting fluid. He mentions among its advantages its cheapness, the absence of scaling and disintegration, and the fact that galvanization begins almost immediately on immersion. He overcame the brittleness of the proposed substitute by casting it on a core of copper.

The Passion of a Sun.

[Suggested by the modern theory of the birth of solar systems from primeval fire-mist.]

BY A. E. LANCASTER.

Ages ago, an infinite mist of splendor,
I trailed through brooding vastitudes of space,
Biding the hour my vaprous depths should render
The embryo worlds hid in their bright embrace.

That dread day dawned. 'Mid lightning and 'mid thunder
No language, thought, dream, vision might rehearse,
My children broke from me, in blazing wonder,
New stars amid a star-brimmed universe.

Then I, the central sun of that vast system,
Gazed on my circling worlds with fond desire,
Sending soft beams to lingeringly kiss them,
And yearning to them with my heart of fire.

I watched them grandly grow. Through pulse of earthquake,
Slow change of wind and wave, rain, frost, and tide,
I heard stupendous beasts fantastic mirth make,
And through unbounded, manless Edens stride.

As, through slow time, humanity's tender essence
Strove in strange brood of beasts that groveling trod,
So, in first man, akin to brute in presence,
Gleamed that insatiate soul which yearns for God.

Then dawned for me that shining life of anguish
Which must endure till my last race be run,
Till my last lingering satellite shall languish,
And drop dead on the bosom of me, its sun.

Within my body of flame a soul was hidden
Where passionate sympathy held lonely reign;
And in my throbbing spheres arose, God-bidden,
Creatures who learned the awful touch of pain.

Each grief was mine, from the faint, fragrant sorrow
Of wounded blossoms that in my love breath grew,
From baffled human hopes which owned the morrow
To the dread pangs gigantic angels knew.

O soft the touch wherewith my lovelight hovered
Round two young human souls whose thirsty lips
Drank of each other's being, nor discovered
Vague prophecies of passion's near eclipse.

One other joy was mine; where battle gory
Fields dewy sweet had soaked in blood and mire,
I raised them up to honor by my glory,
And kissed them back to beauty with my fire.

Worlds bloomed and withered round me; as in a vision
I heard shrill wailings wander through the sky,
Heard the loud laugh of phantom-like derision
From maddened stars that had begun to die.

Strange loves, wierd hates, unutterable remorses,
These the black fruit my sun-fed children bare.
My proudest stars, abloom with radiant forces,
Knew the sad smiles of measureless despair.

Through my vast heart soft symphonies of sadness
Thrilled from green-sweet or gray-grown world's afar—
The pain crushed joy, the mirth transformed to madness,
The wasting passion of each wearied star.

I cried: "O God, when shall my course be finished!
When shall these worlds return to me, their sire,
And I, my solar sovereignty diminished,
Become once more that floating dream of fire?"

I pined to lose this superconscious being,
Phantomed with memories that I dared not name,
And feel (in endless dreams my senses freeing)
Vast, shuddering throbs of sympathetic flame.

Flesh of my flesh, ye passionate worlds that wander,
Now far, now near, in me ye live, ye die!
Through me ye pass to that eternal Yonder,
Whose infinite hand replenishes the sky.

But to what end? When yonder constellation
Melts to faint realms of reminiscent spray,
Shall not the soul from fleshly degradation
Escape to smile at impotent decay?

"Answer!" I groaned, "O Nature, anguish-breeding!
Answer, thou God! that hearest my shuddering cry!"
And from each star swept a soft solemn pleading,
As though that voiceless one had breathed a sigh!

—The Evolution.

A TRAVELING minister observed a rough-looking man lounging in front of an Elko saloon last Sunday, and approaching him, asked, "My friend, do you know where men go, eventually, who hang about saloons and gambling houses on the Lord's day?" "Yer whistlin', I do, pard. They spar for grub here till the hash factories tumble on their racket, an' then some on 'em strike out fur Tuscarory, an' a few drift over to Eureky. I'm fly on that programme, pard—bin over the routes myself." The minister pinned on an agonizing smile and sadly passed on.—Elko Post.

Over-Population.

The other day a tornado swept through a city in China and killed ten thousand people. The incident was mentioned in our newspapers; just mentioned, and that was all. But the Chinese are human beings, and the misery caused by this wholesale destruction of life among the surviving friends and relatives of the slain must have been appalling. But no one seemed to think or to care for "the other hearts that must ache"—so far off as China. What cynic was it who said the best of us would feel more anguish in pricking her little finger with a thorn than she would on hearing that a hundred thousand Hindoos had been burned to death?

The other day, also, in England, a lady was deprived of the custody of her little child, a beautiful girl of seven years, who was taken from her and given to the father, although that father had previously signed away his legal and natural rights to her. This event, which, no doubt, has inflicted much misery upon the mother—but no more than that felt by the Chinese mothers left childless by the tornado—has excited widespread interest here as well as in England; and, I am told by a friend who knows, that there is scarcely a journal in either country which has not commented at some length, and with a good deal of feeling, upon it. Perhaps a sufficient reason for this curious contrast may be found in the fact that the tornado was the act of God—if one may be allowed to use that expression in this age of real or pretended disbelief in the existence of God—while the taking away of the little English girl from her mother was the act of man. If God—or the blind forces of nature, or whatever else one may choose to say—sends a tornado, no one can help it; but it is within the power of men to prevent future judges from making unnecessarily cruel and unjust decisions. Now I, who am a mere woman, do not say that Sir George Jessell, the Master of the Rolls, in deciding that Mrs. Besant's child must be torn from her and given to its father, made an unjust decision; but I remark that a great number of your contemporaries, here and in England, are evidently of that opinion. Even such a highly moral and respectable j urnal as The New York Times, following the skillfully veiled but still apparent lead of its London namesake, is practically "down" on Sir George; so are excellent journals like the Baltimore American and the Springfield Republican.. The point is that Mrs. Besant has been terribly punished because she held, expressed, and taught certain opinions concerning the existence of God and the increase of population; in other words, because she was an Atheist and a Malthusian. The judge ruled it was his duty to protect "the worldly interests" of the child, and that her worldly interests would be injured by permitting her to remain in the guardianship of such a mother. The consequences of the marriage relation are far-reaching; the law will do that for children born in wedlock which it will not do for illegitimate off spring; yet it might seem that for the sake of society, as well as of such children, especial care should be taken of their morals. The law will not do it, save under certain contingencies.

Not long since, an unchaste woman, the inmate of a house of ill-fame, brought suit against a man whom she claimed to be the father of her child—a girl—for its support. It was shown that the mother would educate the child in vice and bring it up to follow in her own footsteps, and that the money sued for would only enable her to do this more effectually. But the Court ordered the money to be paid, and ruled that the mother was the only guardian of the child.

Mrs. Besant's little girl would not have been brought up in vice had she remained with her mother, for Mrs. Besant is a lady of irreproachable virtue; but she would have been educated in her mother's opinions. She had been born in lawful marriage, and the Court was bound to look after her "worldly interests."

It seems to be probable, however, that Mrs. Besant would not have been deprived of her daughter had she contented herself with being an Atheist and had not insisted upon being a Malthusian also. Atheism of various shades is rather fashionable in England just now; no one is tabooed in society because he does not believe in God. But Malthusian doctrines are under a ban—albeit that Malthusian practices may prevail to a greater extent than is generally suspected. Mrs. Besant had written and published a book advocating the adoption of means to restrict the over-population of the country, and explaining clearly what these means might be. It is not true, your contemporaries say, that there is anything immoral in this book; they insist that it will do nothing towards encouraging vicious practices, since all who are inclined to vice already know how to sin with at least physical impunity. They remark that the higher and middle classes of society already practice the precautions which the book recommends; and that the classes for whom it is especially written are those who "spawn children, half of whom must be paupers." Here, for example, is the vigorous and almost rude language in which one of your most estimable contemporaries speaks. Says the Springfield Republican:

"The great question of restricting the increase of the population is impossible to smother by any legal circumscriptions. The world has arrived at that age when there are few new realms to conquer, and the progress of science is lengthening the term of life perceptibly even year by year. Whether an utter recklessness of increase is to be continued perpetually, with a corresponding perpetual growth of pauperism and disorder, is a question of serious imminence. Somewhere there must be a pause. The checks of famine, pestilence, and war decrease as an intelligent civilization extends. The checks of forbearance and prevention are beginning to take their places. It may be fairly said that in the best informed portions of our social fabric they are already operative. In France the people have found them out; and certainly, in considering the comparative prosperity of France, this fact cannot be left out. But, generally speaking, the very class that recruits pauperism, and must, until man is other than he is, continue to recruit it, knows nothing except to breed as uncoucernedly as flies or fish; and the result is a vast substratum of utter poverty and abasement, and every city a tremendous nursery of crime. This matter is inseparably joined with the simple case of Rev. Frank Besant's suit to recover his child to religious and conventional education."

I should like to remark, by the way, and in order to remove a common misapprehension, that, during a somewhat long residence in France, I learned that the restriction of the increase of population in that country is brought about, not by the methods which high medical authorities assure us are fearfully prevalent in New England, but by the continence of married people. There is certainly no sin in this, but the whole subject is one that is involved in difficulty, and that, perhaps, one of my sex should not discuss.—Anastatia Ambler, in N. Y. Graphic.

Are Prayers Ever Answered?

BAPTISTS GIVING INSTANCES IN WHICH THEY ARE AND IN WHICH THEY ARE NOT.

The Baptist ministers yesterday discussed the subject: "Is there any guidance of the holy spirit in specific cases?" The essayist was the Rev. James Waters of Passaic. His conclusions were that the function of the spirit is to clarify the understanding of men. Having the spirit, the mind has greater vigor, force, confidence, faith, and courage in life's battles. The spirit is not to supersede the soul's faculties, but to stimulate them.

Many of the brethren claimed that there were many answers to men's prayers by the holy spirit which must have been special acts of intervention.

Brother Cailhopper, of Keyport, N. J., told about his own child, who was thought to be dying with diphtheria, when the brother was praying, "Lord, if there be any help for the child, for Christ's sake send it;" and, almost immediately an old woman entered the house and asked to treat the child, as the doctor had given it up to death. She boiled some beans in a bag, applied them, and the disease was expelled. Brother Cailhopper thought that the words of the prayer were dictated by the spirit.

Brother Coleman said that he had a story to match Brother Cailhopper's. He, too, had a child sick with diphtheria; he had laid it down dead, as he supposed. But a physician worked over it for three hours and restored it to life. And Brother Coleman did not pray for the child's recovery a syllable. [Laughter.]

Brother Harris, of Bloomfield, N. J., told a story of a missionary who was warned not to enter the house of a certain ill-tempered man in his neighborhood, on pain of being brutally assaulted. The man of God mustered up courage and called at that house, when the rough inmates accosted him: "You can't come in here unless you'll tell how many times the word 'girl' occurs in the Bible!" The missionary at once answered, "It is used but once in the Scriptures," Joel iii, 3." The man with the bad character then allowed the minister to talk with him, and, eventually, both he and his wife became Christians. The missionary had that very morning, for no reason known to himself at the time, ascertained the fact about the word "girl" by looking in the Concordance. The event was either a coincidence or the result of a clairvoyant state of mind, or a revelation of God's spirit. Which?

Brother Lawson, of the Greenwood church, Brooklyn, suggested that if the holy spirit ever reveals hidden knowledge, he should think that ministers, after praying to have good texts for sermons revealed to them, would be answered. [Laughter.] And yet, he continued, how many ministers rise from their knees with no text to preach from and go into the pulpit with one that the holy spirit never suggested! Then Brother Lawson said that Deacon Richardson, of the late street-railroad squabbles at Bond and Atlantic streets, Brooklyn, was present, and wanted to say a word. The deacon was no deacon at all, he added, but was so only by the grace of the editor of the Brooklyn Eagle. He was only a trustee of the Hanson Place Baptist church.

The so-called Deacon William Richardson got up from a front seat, his hair and chin whiskers looking very white, and his face looking very red. He smiled as he said that whatever he might think of the judgment of those in authority in not making him a deacon, they had not done so. Furthermore, as he had a profound regard and respect for the genuine article of a deacon, he did not want the term applied to him by the brethren.—N. Y. Sun.

KIDDER'S

SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents, which will be forwarded, post-paid, to any address on receipt of price. K. P. KIDDER,

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

To His Excellency, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States:

SIR: Whereas Mr. E. H. Heywood, a citizen of Massachusetts, a man of education and deep convictions, a graduate of Brown University, and highly respected by a large circle of persons, editor of a newspaper called "The Word," and publisher of tracts, pamphlets, and books, has been tried in the city of Boston, in a United States District Court, and sentenced by Judge Clifford to two years' imprisonment and $100 fine for sending one of his pamphlets through the United States mail, the charge being that certain expressions in said pamphlets are obscene:

Now therefore we, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, beg to set forth the following facts and considerations, and ask your Excellency to exercise the power of pardon vested in you to meet cases of manifestly unjust punishment:

1st. The pamphlet in question was written and published with good motives, with the intent to promote true morality, and is not obscene in any sense of that word. It is written in as pure language as any work on physiological and social subjects; and contains less that is calculated to offend than the classic literature of the last two or three centuries, found in all our libraries, and circulating freely and without question in the United States mails; and not nearly as much that is objectionable as is contained in the frequent reports of divorce and other trials, which are published broadcast in the great daily journals and sent through the U. S. mails without restraint or question. Mr. Heywood, therefore, is sentenced to undergo a long imprisonment for no real offense and for doing less than other publishers and citizens of the United States are doing daily with impunity. Therefore we, your petitioners, seek at the hands of your Excellency a remedy for this very partial administration of the law.

2d. The freedom of the press is the one point, the world over, that should be the most jealously guarded by a free people. At no other point is power so tempted, or so apt to encroach; and no other freedom so inexorably exacts the full traditional "price"—"eternal vigilance." This freedom is guaranteed for the very purpose of protecting new and unpopular truths. This is the very source of much of social and intellectual progress and is the deadpoint in the struggle between truth and error. That which is popular, may almost be said to need no guarantee of freedom—it protects itself. It is the unknown or newly discovered truth which as much requires a tariff of protection, while it is new and unknown, as any growing manufacture in a young State requires it.

In this view the noble utterance of one of the earliest and most illustrious of your predecessors, James Madison, will greatly help to guide your action. He said on a memorable occasion: "It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The freemen of America did not wait until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

And now recently these views are anew and most cogently sustained by the United States Supreme Court. One of the points decided in the late case of Jackson, dealer in lottery tickets, is: "Regulations against transportation in the mail of printed matter which is open to examination, cannot be enforced so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is essential to that freedom."

That decision was made after the trial of Mr. Heywood but before his sentence. His pamphlet and his whole case come within that decision—that freedom of the press shall not, "in any manner," be interfered with—and your Excellency is most urgently but respectfully requested to grant him, in your clemency, the benefit of that decision now; and relieve him from his fine and imprisonment by your pardon.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc., etc.

Odds and Ends.

A CONCLUSIVE reply has been given to some clever articles in a contemporary, entitled, "Is Life Worth Living?" The answer is, "It depends on the liver."

"I DIDN'T know," said an old lady, as she laid down her newspaper, "that thieves were so scarce that they had to advertise for 'em, and offer a reward for their discovery."

YOUNG lady on horseback (doubtful about the road)—"Will there be a bridge, by-and-by, across a little brook?" Small rustic—"Wal, I dunno 'bout by'n by, but there's one there now."

"HAS the jury agreed?" asked the judge of a sheriff, whom he met on the stairs with a bucket in his hand. "Yes," replied Patrick, "they have agreed to send out for half a gallon."

THE MEDIUM.—An editor, speaking of Spiritualism, says: "We don't believe in any medium except the "circulating medium," and that has become so scarce that our faith in it is shaky."

THOSE glorious summer nights are here when a lover whispers impassioned words in the dreamy ear of a favored maiden, and feels his undershirt sticking to him closer than a brother.

"CHARLES," said she to one of her Sunday-school class, "mention some act of violence that was inflicted near the sea about this time." "Don't remember any, 'cept Jonah was whale-laid on the shore."

THE discovery has been made that the world does not revolve with the same motion that it did a thousand years ago; but it still swings round fast enough to satisfy the man with a heavy note coming due.

"And they were talking so unkindly of you, dearest Louisa, and—" "And what were they saying?" "Saying that you painted your face; and I told them that it was untrue, and that your color was only erysipelas."

WILSON, the celebrated vocalist, was upset one day in his carriage near Edinburgh. A Scotch paper, after recording the accident, said, "We are happy to state he was able to appear the following evening in three pieces."

SMALL boy (entering shop)—"I want a penny-worth o' canary seed."

Shopkeeper (who knows the boy)—"Is it for your mother?"

Small boy (contemptuously)—"No, it's for the bird."

"Why do you suppose College is such a learned place?" asked one gentleman of another. "I rather suspect," was the reply, "that, as everybody takes a little learning there with him, and nobody ever brings any away, the learning accumulates."

TIME—night: Luna and several stars studding the blue vault. Youth and maiden leaning over a gate, and looking at the heavenly orbs. Maiden, filled with enthusiasm, points a taper finger towards the zenith, and exclaims, "Oh, Henry, let us study botany!"

THERE was only one cigar left in the box, and two young hopefuls were struggling for it. The first little boy grabbed, but said, consolingly, to his brother, "Never mind, Dick, I'll smoke it till I get sick, then you can finish it," and the heart of the other little boy was comforted.

A LOWELL man who lost his good character some time ago, was severely hauled over by some of his former friends. "I know it, boys; I know my character's gone; lost entirely. And," he added, rather pointedly, "it's too confounded bad, for it was the only one in the place worth saving."

THE flowing reporter who wrote with reference to a well-known belle, "Her dainty feet were encased in shoes that might be taken for fairy boots," tied his wardrobe up in a handkerchief and left for paths unknown when it appeared the next morning: "Her dirty feet were encased in shoes that might be taken for ferry-boats."

HE lies across the teachers knee, his broadest end on top,
And the teacher buckles down to work like a
Cossack of the Don;
When the voice of the afflicted cries shrilly,
"Stop!
It isn't fair; I haven't got my winter trousers on!"

Two sweet little girls sat upon the sidewalk in front of the post-office, one of them nursing a large wax doll. Her companion asked, in tones of deep earnestness: "Does 'oo have much trouble wif 'oor baby?" "Oh, doodness, yes!" was the reply; "she cwies mos' all 'e time. She's jes' cwied and cwied ever since she was born. I's jes' discouraged, an' I don't fink I'll borne any more."

A NEWLY-MARRIED man went home the other evening and found his wife asleep on the lounge. He knelt beside her and devoured her with loving eyes. "John," she murmured, in her sleep. "Yes, my pet, what is it?" he whispered, thrilled to his heart's depths by the calling of his name. "John," she again murmured, "spare-rib is only nine cents a pound." The thrill passed off."

A SAN FRANCISCO boy, only four years old, was observed making queer movements with his elbow. His aunt asked him what he was doing. "Crooking my elbow," said precocious. "But what are you crooking your elbow for?" "'Cause I want to det a nice little strawberry on my nose." "But that won't make a strawberry, Johnny." "Yes it will, for the cook says papa wouldn't have the big strawberry on his nose if he didn't crook his elbow so often."

"A little grand-nephew of Prince Bismarck was sitting upon the prince's knee the other day, when he suddenly cried out: "Oh, uncle, I hope I shall be a great man like you when I grow up!" "Why, my child?" asked the uncle. "Because you are so great, and every one fears you." "Wouldn't you rather every one loved you?" The child thought a minute, and then replied: "No, uncle; for when people love you they cheat you, but when they fear you they let you cheat them."

Gems of Thought.

A TRULY elegant taste is generally accompanied with an excellency of heart.—Fielding.

WE ought not to quit our post without the permission of him who commands; the post of man is life.—Pythagoras.

EVERY moderate drinker could abandon the intoxicating cup if he would; every inebriate would if he could.—J. B. Gough.

THE first draught serveth for health, the second for pleasure, the third for chance, and the fourth for madness.—Anacharsis.

SUPERSTITION changes a man to a beast, fanaticism makes him a wild beast, and despotism a beast of burden.—LaHarpe.

THE greatest burden in the world is superstition, not only of ceremonies in the Church, but of imaginary and scarecrow sins at home.—Milton.

WHEN affliction thunders over our roofs, to hide our heads and run into our graves shows us no men, but makes us fortune's slaves.—Ben Jonson.

WE are accustomed to see men deride what they do not understand, and snarl at the good and beautiful because it lies beyond their sympathies.—Goethe.

A THOUGHT is often original, though you have uttered it a hundred times. It has come to you over a new route, by a new and express train of association.—Holmes.

WE are surrounded by abysses, but the greatest of all depths is in our own hearts, and an irresistible leaning leads us there. Draw thyself from thyself.—Goethe.

THINKERS are scarce as gold; but he whose thoughts embrace all his subject, pursues it uninterruptedly and fearless of consequences, is a diamond of enormous size.—Lavater.

PUT a man into a factory, as ignorant how to prepare fabrics as some teachers are to watch the growth of juvenile minds, and what havoc would be made of the raw material!—Horace Mann.

O TEMPERANCE, thou fortune without envy, thou universal medicine of life, that clears the head and cleanses the blood, eases the stomach, strengthens the nerves, and perfects digestion. —Temple.

IF any man think it a small matter, or of mean concerment, to bridle his tongue, he is much mistaken; for it is a point to be silent when occasion requires, and better than to speak, though never so well.—Plutarch.

MEN would not be so hasty to abandon the world, either as monks or suicides, did they but see the jewels of wisdom which are scattered so plentifully along its paths, and lacking which no soul can come again from beyond the grave to gather.—Mountford.

FOR my part, I am convinced that the method of teaching which approaches most nearly to the method of investigation is incomparably the best; since, not content with serving up a few barren truths, it leads to the stalk on which they grew.—Burke.

TASTE, if it mean anything, must mean a general susceptibility to truth and nobleness; a sense to discern, and a heart to love and reverence, all beauty, order, goodness, wheresoever and in whatsoever forms and accomplishments they are to be seen.—Carlyle.

A THINKING man is the worst enemy the Prince of Darkness can have; every time such a one announces himself, I doubt not there runs a shudder through the nether empire; and new emissaries are trained with new tactics, to, if possible, entrap him, and hoodwink and handcuff him.—Carlyle.

THE glorious sun—the centre and soul of our system, the lamp that lights it, the fire that heats it, the magnet that guides and controls it; the fountain of color which gives its azure to the sky, its verdure to the fields, its rainbow hues to the gay world of flowers, and the purple light of love to the marble cheek of youth and beauty.—Brewster.

TASTE, when once obtained, may be said to be no acquiring faculty, and must remain stationary; but knowledge is of perpetual growth and has infinite demands. Taste, like an artificial canal, winds through a beautiful country, but its borders are confined and its term is limited. Knowledge navigates the ocean, and is perpetually on voyages of discovery.—Disraeli.

HAPPY is the man who has that in his soul which acts upon the dejected as April airs upon violet roots. Gifts from the hand are silver and gold, but the heart gives that which neither silver nor gold can buy. To be full of goodness, full of cheerfulness, full of sympathy, full of helpful hope, causes a man to carry blessings of which he is himself as unconscious as a lamp is of its own shining. Such a one moves on human life as stars move on dark seas to bewildered mariners; as the sun wheels, bringing all the seasons with him from the south.—Beecher.

THE old family Bibles of our childhood usually had in them a collection of books called the "Apocrypha," which, though not considered as God's infallible word, were yet looked upon as divine and holy writings. And what a blessing it would be to many of the educated pious if they could only give to the blessed volume one more weeding out—once more select from it the twaddle, nonsense, pettiness, and foolishness, the falsehoods and humbugs, the impossible, incredible, unscientific, and useless statements, and call them apocryhal, and after a while drop them entirely out. And could each sect of to-day weed for itself, what a very meagre quantity of the great book would remain! All disputed doctrinal points would at once and forever disappear.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Notes and Clippings.

In Elgin, Ill., an elder has been turned out of church for slandering his pastor.

The annual loss of gold and silver by attrition of coins is estimated to amount to millions.

Wendell Phillips advised the Nationals to trade with no party, but to stand ready to absorb either.

It is reported that the Rev. Mr. Murray has been bitten by a wild cat in Maine, but as the cat was old and tough, it is thought it will get over it.

A member of a Baptist church in Nashville had his baby baptized by a Catholic priest. The Baptists indignantly turned him out of their communion.

The Board of Health of this city has appointed a special corps of fifty physicians to prescribe for the sick children in the tenement houses who are already dying at the rate of two or three hundred a day.

The wheat harvest of the last few weeks has been favorable and abundant. Enough grain has been secured in good order to feed the people of the entire globe for some time. It would seem that none ought to starve in this country.

The Rev. Joseph Cook is addressing audiences and wanting to know "if death ends all." We don't know whether it ends all, but if it will only end what little there is of the Rev. Cook we will be willing to give it a rest.—Seymour Times.

The Pan-Anglican Synod assembled at Lambeth Palace, London, on July 2d. Ninety bishops were present. Archbishop of Canterbury presided. He urged that the question of maintaining the faith against Infidelity be the principal topic of discussion.

The Chinese famine is steadily increasing. In one district the living devour the dead. In the prefecture in which Shanghai is situated the population has been reduced from 1,000,000 to 160,000. The number who have died is estimated at 5,000,000. Where is God?

A Western politician gave this advice to his son-in-law, who was nominated for office: "Lean a little towards everything, and commit yourself to nothing. Be round; be perfectly round, like a bottle, and just dark enough so that nobody can see what's in ye."

George Francis Train has his match in Manchester, England, in the person of a man who says that he lives well on twelve cents and a half a day. For twelve years he has abstained from any food save bread and water, yet at the age of fifty-one he is in excellent health.

The Rev. Robert Trimmer, rector of Holy Trinity, Guldford, England, sued a laborer named Barker in the county court for $1.75 marriage fees. The parish clerk also sued him for 75 cents, and the pew-opener for twenty-five cents. The judge made an order for payment in each case.

A young Methodist clergyman in Medway, Mass., was arrested for stealing two bank books, a $50 United States bond, and some money, from Mrs. Miranda Daniels, while she was at church on a recent Sunday, but he was discharged because the proof against him was not positive enough to convict.

It was not believed that the Paris Exposition of 1878 would be a financial success, yet the Government commissioners already feel that they are out of financial difficulty. The cost of buildings and maintenance is estimated at about $9,000,000, and a revenue of nearly $7,000,000 is already assured. The attendance has exceeded expectations.

The recent murder trial in Camden, N. J., in which Hunter was convicted of the cruel and cold-blooded murder of his victim, is another instance of the fact that a profession of religion does not make a man what he ought to be. He was a very prominent member of a popular church, superintendent of the Sabbath-school, and had been regarded as one of the most exemplary of men, yet he was proved as guilty as the most depraved villain. If the Christian religion will not prevent a man from committing such a horrible crime, it is to be feared it has proved a failure indeed.

The Rev. Joseph Cook says when he sees the bioplast weaving bone and muscle and never making a mistake, he feels that he stands in the presence of almighty God. But we're not going to believe him till almighty God says he saw him standing there.—Seymour Times.

A church in Kansas whose popularity has been waning for some time past, called a meeting of its officers lately to try and devise some means to recuperate its exhausted means and stem the tide. The minister was advised by one of the sharp deacons to engage eminent counsel, and to have his trial put down on the calendar for an early date.

The Pope and the Ultramontane Cardinals.—The Pope has intimated to the cardinals most violently opposed to him, especially Oreglia, Sacconi, Ghigi, Ledochowski, and Randi, that if they do not desist from their present line of conduct he will be forced to take unpleasant steps. To Cardinal Oreglia particularly he said that it was time to have done with it.—London Standard.

Bishop McTyeire and some of his associates in the Board of Vanderbilt University, have shut down on Dr. Alex. Winchell, of Syracuse, for what they consider heterodox opinions as to the creation of man. They wanted Dr. Winchell to resign his lectureship, but he refused. Then they put him out by declaring the lectureship vacant. Dr. Winchell is one of the first scholars of the day, and knows more than Dr. McTyeire and all the Vanderbilt Board put together. He denounces their action as a piece of narrow-minded bigotry.

A Great Vein of Salt Discovered.—Our western New York correspondent sends us the particulars of a discovery which may develop into importance: "The workingmen engaged in boring an oil well at Wyoming, Wyoming county, recently ran the drill through 70 feet of pure white salt. The salt was struck at a depth of 1,072 feet. At the depth of 950 feet the drill passed through a salt vein of three feet in thickness, the water of which being subjected to analysis, showed the presence of flourine, chlorine, bromine, iodine, aluminum, and sixty per centum of chloride of sodium. Wyoming is thirty-seven miles west of Rochester.—Syracuse Standard.

The Rev. Dr. Webber, pastor of the most important Presbyterian church in Troy, N. Y., preached three sermons on "Future Punishment," in which he advocated the doctrine of probation after death. These sermons were published. The Presbytery of Troy now takes the matter in hand. Unwilling to depose such a man as Dr. Webber, or even to inflict an ecclesiastical censure upon him, they pass a resolution expressing their "surprise and great grief." This is a novel sort of Presbyterian action, and is severely criticised in certain Presbyterian quarters. It is freely said that had Dr. Webber been a little man and pastor of an obscure church, he might have been censured, or even more harshly treated.

The Bursting of Jo Cook in Chicago.—Joseph Cook has made his second advent here, but has not captured the city the second time. His popularity in the northwest has seemed to be almost as brief as the blue glass fever. Ten months ago he came and commanded a conquest. Now he comes again, but he comes to empty benches by the hundred in a common lecture hall. Twice he essays an audience, and ends in drawing only a few hundred persons to him. No popular enthusiasm, in either religious or secular circles, hails his coming as before, and none bade him good-bye. The fault lies partly with himself, partly with the people. The latter find him and his philosophies much ridiculed by the secular press. They find it fashionable among gossipers to make sport of Mr. Cook—"Jo," they call him.—Union.

The agricultural reports from all quarters are almost duplicates of each other—magnificent weather, abundant yield where the harvest has already been garnered, excellent prospects for the crop yet growing. In Illinois the winter wheat harvest is about over; the grain is of splendid quality, and the yield is great. Many of the farmers are selling their new wheat at seventy-five to eighty-five cents. There seems to be no expectation that the price will advance. The cornfields look splendidly, and the farmers are now anxious to sell their remaining stock of last year's corn. The railroads are already beginning to be embarrassed for want of sufficient cars to move the crop. The cotton crop is still reported to be very forward; some estimates place the probable yield at five million bales, but it is altogether to soon to make any calculations with safety.

Deacon Bostwick's Confession.—H. E. Bostwick, who has been shop-walker at Freedman Brothers & Co.'s since 1870 has been dismissed in disgrace, having robbed the firm of not less than twenty thousand dollars He confessed that he had been stealing from the firm during the entire period of his service. His principal method of stealing was to sell goods and pocket the cash received for them without making any account of it. Another way was to sell goods subject to "approval," so return them on his ticket, then destroy the ticket and report the goods returned to the store. He was always treated on confidential terms by the old firm, and enjoyed unusual privileges. He gave a great deal of his time to church work. He was a deacon in the First Congregational church, and for several years superintendent of the Sunday-school of that church.—Detroit Free Press.

It is a singular fact, worthy of note, that notwithstanding the general depression in other branches of business, the toy trade, so far at least as the manufacturing is concerned, has regularly increased from year to year, until the present time. The trade with Europe is steadily growing, and a large share of the export trade is now being done with England, the shipments going principally to London and Liverpool. Mechanical and automatic toys are multiplied every year. The difficulty of their inventors lies in making good ones which can be sold cheap; but this in a great measure is now being overcome, and the goods are being rapidly cheapened. The export trade in wood toys is largely increasing, and large quantities are annually shipped to Germany, from whence we formerly imported in considerable quantities, and the sharp competition of our domestic manufactures has brought more than one importing house to grief.

There is a war at Seabright, N. J., and two of the reverend clergy are the warriors, one being a Baptist and the other a Presbyterian, Paul, the Baptist, is the representative of the owners of a turnpike on which he has erected a toll-gate. Dodd, the Presbyterian, heads the party who say they will go through the gate as much as they please without paying toll. Paul says he will collect toll, even if he has to shoot the folks who pass through the gate. Dodd says he is not afraid of Paul's pistol. Paul says he would as soon shoot Dodd as any other man, and will do it if he attempts to go through the gate without paying. Both of the clergymen are prominent real estate holders at Seabright. Neither of them is reduced to the necessity of preaching for a living. A sort of truce was declared for last Sunday, in order not to stain the New Jersey sand with the blood of any peacefully-disposed persons who may be driving to or from church; but it is understood that after Sunday the dogs of war were to be let slip, and havoc to be cried to all who attempt to pass Paul's gate without laying down their little cash in advance.

The wheat crop is already being harvested in many parts of the country, and it is estimated that the yield will reach 400,000,000 bushels, or ten bushels for every man, woman, and child in the country, providing the population be forty millions. All the grain crops look promising. The potato crop in most of the States will be of immense magnitude, though it has been damaged in some parts of the country by excessive rains. The grass crop is the heaviest we have had for many years, the days of storm in the spring having favored its growth. The yield of apples and pears will be less than was expected. The severe frosts that occurred during the setting of the fruit buds were injurious, though the promise during their blooming season was most satisfactory. California has given us some of our choicest peaches, but the crop this season will not be more than half as large as usual, and the quality of this favorite fruit promises to be indifferent. The heavy and late rains produced "curled leaf," with which nearly every tree is scarred. In this State there will be a plenitude of all other fruits. The strawberry crop was abundant and excellent.—Sun.

Several persons at a picnic party in Connecticut were also struck by lightning.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"Poor girl," said Edith; "she is truly to be pitied; yet I should rather be in her place than in that of his wife. To be tied, for life, to such a man would be the worst kind of martyrdom."

"I wouldn't stay tied," said Myra. "If I found out that my husband (granting I had one) was such a heartless wretch as that no power on earth could compel me to endure his constant companionship or force me to become the mother of his children."

"Suppose you could not get a divorce from him, what would you do then?" said Jennie. "Would you live alone all your life and be a mere nobody?"

"No, I would not be a nobody, for I'd study my profession and turn out one of the best doctors in all the country. I am studying it now all I can; but in a case like that, it should be the one object of my life, and I would bend every energy of mind and body to it. Sometimes I think it would be well for our sex if there was less marrying done; less weight given to love and domestic ties, and girls would strive to become something more than wives and mothers. Not but that these are grand and noble things in themselves, but as long as we women live so much in our affections alone, just so long will we find among us precisely such victims as your Tennessee friend. We must have higher aims than merely trying to win romantic lovers, who will pet and coddle us, and make of us toys and household drudges, just as their nature and circumstances incline them."

"No danger that any one will ever make a toy or a drudge of you, Myra," said Edith, laughing. "You are too independent, and have too much personality to ever be merged into any identity save your own."

"Well, we've all had sober, serious, and philosophical talk enough for one sitting," said Minnie, "and I guess I'll make a diversion by reading for you a short composition written by sister Rose while we were in Tennessee. I found it yesterday in an old box of letters, and, as none of you have ever seen it, I know it will amuse you. It was published in the paper there at the time, but will be new to all 'you uns;' and, as it is near garden-making time, will be appropriate to the season. You see, the Tennessee people are great believers in signs, moon theories, etc., and many of them consult the almanac when they make gardens, make soap, cut timber, or even haul out manure. But here goes," and Minnie read as follows:

"Having, all my life, been an unbeliever in moon theories and 'old women's' whims, as I, in my ignorance, deemed them, in regard to setting out onions, planting potatoes, melons, cucumbers, etc., and sowing vegetable and flower seeds according to the almanac signs, and in the light and dark of the moon, I at last resolved for once to go precisely according to these signs and theories, and thus practically prove them to be of no account.

"So, having engaged the services of a competent astronomer, who was an astrologer and medical almanac maker—one of that kind who always "truthfully" predict the sort of weather the coming year will give us—to calculate to an instant the precise time when such and such plants should be set out, and vegetables put in the ground, and seeds sown to produce the most desirable results, I had my assistants stationed at different parts of the garden, where the soil had been previously prepared to receive each sort of seed. The astronomer was placed in the centre, watch in hand, and, at the exact point of time desired, the signal was given, and each one sowed, planted, or set out his allotted part. I am obliged to confess myself actually astounded at the results which followed. They have carried my convictions en masse clear over to the other side of the question. Why, in some instances, the seeds hardly touched the earth ere they began to germinate and sprout; and some sorts, which are quicker in coming up than others, actually began to swell before they reached the ground; and we had to cover them in a 'jiffy,' lest they should grow in mid-air.

"During the night succeeding this famous garden-making we were hardly able to get any sleep at all on account of the noise, hubbub, and commotion caused by the rapid shooting up of the plants, which came out of the ground with such a sudden plunge that they sent small rocks and clods of earth flying hither and thither, keeping up a continuous and tumultuous clatter. By daylight everything was up, and as far advanced in growth as is generally the case in six weeks after planting. We dug a mess of early rose potatoes for breakfast, for dinner had cucumbers, radishes, and May peas, while the supper table was garnished with 'string beans,' and 'roasted ears.' Such vegetables to bear I never saw! One hill of potatoes furnished us with a sufficiency of that staple of Paddy's favorite food to last us for a month. The stalks of corn grew thirty feet high, and had ears two feet in length all the way along from top to bottom. Parsnips and carrots penetrated so deep in the earth that they were cooked all ready for the table by its central fires. And the squashes, of which we planted the Hubbard variety, grew to enormous proportions; the rinds were eighteen inches thick, and, after using the edible part, we made of them chicken coops and pig-pens, cutting out holes to let in air and light. One mammoth specimen outstripped all the rest, and acquired such extraordinary dimensions that we had serious thoughts of converting it into a dwelling house or public lecture hall. To tell you the tenth part of all the surprising results of 'planting in the signs,' would tax your time and patience, so I will close by relating a part of the history of one bean, which almost rivals that famous one of 'Jack, the Giant-Killer.'

"Now, this bean we happened to plant in a peculiarly rich spot, and more nearly upon the precise instant in which all the signs were at the best possible juncture. The very first day the bean reached to the top of a pole sixty feet long (for we prepared for every emergency we could foresee, and had, consequently, got the longest pole we could), and then, instead of the top falling down and feeling around for something to cling to, as this species of plants usually do, it kept straight on up, winding round and round upon itself, making a pole, as it were, of its entwined tendrils. On, on, up, up it went, straight as a die, day after day, till the top was lost in the clouds. The whole vine, from top to bottom, was covered with beans, each pod three and a half yards long, and looking like a great string of green snakes. When this vine was about two weeks old we went early one morning to look at the garden, and away up, almost beyond the reach of vision, we saw something bright and shining apparently sitting among the leaves of the vine. Of course, we were on the 'qui vive' to know what it could be, supposing it some new production of the wonderful vine. In about half an hour it began to move, as if waking up out of a sound sleep, and then all at once, by a series of short flights and agile leaps, it came down to the bottom and stood upon the ground beside us. Language is entirely inadequate to portray the exquisite beauty of this lovely being who thus suddenly made its advent among us. It bore the appearance of a boy of some ten or twelve years of age; the eyes were of a deep blue, and wonderfully soft, sweet, and tender; the hair, of a bright golden hue, fell in graceful curls about his neck and shoulders; the face was perfect in regularity of features, and more beautiful than 'poet ever dreamed of or artist ever painted,' and was lit up with the brightest, rarest intellectuality, and love, gentleness, and amiability beamed from every lineament. The whole body was covered with a coat of soft, silken, bright, waving hair, more beautiful than any garment ever devised by human skill or ingenuity. The hands and face alone were naked, and the skin of these was of a clear, transparent whiteness, tinged with the loveliest rose-hue color of health; and over and around this lovely creature waved, glimmered and shimmered an arora of clear, soft, radiant lightness from which the most delicious perfume was wafted on every side. As we stood gazing in bewilderment of amazement and admiration, it meanwhile looking with curiosity upon us and its new surroundings, all at once there broke upon the air the most ravishing and enchanting music we had ever heard. This beautiful inhabitant of some fairy realm was evidently addressing us in its own native language; but finding that it failed to make itself understood, it again became silent; then we questioned it by signs as to whether it had come from the moon, pointing to that luminary, which was yet above the horizon. Seeming to comprehend the query, it made a motion of dissent and directed our attention to a spot a little to the right of the place where the moon was, intimating, as near as we could understand, that it had come from a planet situated in that direction. While we were yet gazing upon the place pointed out, our strange companion assumed a listening attitude, uttered a loud clear note of melody, sprang up the vine, and with a few flying leaps went almost beyond our sight, while far above it we could see a faint glimpse of light, resembling that which surrounded our late visitant, and we heard an almost inaudible note of an exquisite musical refrain, which we supposed to be a call from a friend of this lovely youthful wanderer, who was seeking to lure it back to its native home 'beyond the skies,' where humanity has evidently progressed very much farther on towards perfection than it has upon our own younger planet.

A PROCESS which at once effects the utilization of sewage and prevents the pollution of streams has been for several years in successful operation at Burnley, Lancashire, England. A certain quantity of lime is put into the filthy sludge, and then the solid matter which is deposited is capable of being used for cement, and the clarified water is permitted to escape.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

No sensible person supposes that carefully devised institutions, which have been established for the good of the whole, as well as for the individual, in every human state, are the results of the action of a personal and supernatural Creator, acting for a definite purpose. On the contrary, every one knows that these useful institutions of organization in the state are the consequences of the co-operation of the individual citizens and their common government, as well as of adaptation to the conditions of existence of the outer world. Just in the same way we must judge of the many-celled organism. In it also all the useful arrangements are solely the natural and necessary result of the co-operation, differentiation, and perfecting of the individual citizens—the cells—and by no means the artificial arrangements of a Creator acting for a definite purpose. If we rightly consider this comparison, and pursue it further, we can distinctly see the perversity of that dualistic conception of nature which discovers the action of a creative plan of construction in the various adaptations of the organization of living things.

Let us pursue the individual development of the vertebrate animal body a few stages further, and see what is next done by the citizens of this embryonic organism. In the central line of the violin-shaped disc, which is composed of the three cellular germ-layers, there arises a straight delicate furrow, the so-called "primitive streak," by which the violin-shaped body is divided into two equal lateral halves—a right and a left part or "antimer." On both sides of that streak or furrow, the upper or external germ-layer rises in the form of a longitudinal fold, and both folds then grow together over the furrow in the central line, and thus form a cylindrical tube. This tube is called the marrow-tube, or medullary canal, because it is the foundation of the central nervous system, the spinal marrow (medulla spinalis). At first it is pointed both in front and behind, and it remains so for life in the lowest vertebrate animal, the brainless, skulless Lancelet (Amphioxus). But in all other vertebrate animals, which we distinguish from the latter as skulled animals, or Craniota, a difference between the fore and hinder end of the marrow tube soon becomes visible, the fore end becoming dilated, and changing into a roundish bladder, the foundation of the brain.

In all Craniota, that is, in all vertebrate animals possessing skull and brain, the brain, which is at first only the bladder-shaped dilatation of the anterior end of the spinal marrow, divides into five bladders, lying one behind the other, four superficial, transverse in-nippings being formed. It is just the same whether we examine the embryo of a dog, a fowl, a lizard, or any other higher vertebrate animal. For the embryos of the different skulled animals (at least the three higher classes of them, the reptiles, birds, and mammals) cannot be in any way distinguished at an early stage of their growth. The whole form of the body is exceedingly simple, being merely a thin, leaf-like disc. Face, legs, intestines, etc., are completely wanting. But the five bladders are already quite distinct from one another.

Most persons even now refuse to acknowledge the most important deduction of the Theory of Descent, that is, the palæontological development of man from ape-like, and through them from still lower, mammals, and consider such a transformation of organic form as impossible. But, I ask, are the phenomena of the individual development of man, the fundamental features of which I have here given, in any way less wonderful? Is it not in the highest degree remarkable that all vertebrate animals of the most different classes—fishes, amphibious animals, reptiles, birds, and mammals—in the first periods of their embryonic development cannot be distinguished at all, and even much later, at a time when reptiles and birds are already distinctly different from mammals, that the dog and the man are almost identical? Verily, if we compare those two series of development with one another, and ask ourselves which of the two is the more wonderful, it must be confessed that ontogeny, or the short and quick history of development of the individual, is much more mysterious than phylogeny, or the long and slow history of development of the tribe. For one and the same grand change of form is accomplished by the latter in the course of many thousands of years, and by the former in the course of a few months. Evidently this most rapid and astonishing transformation of the individual in ontogenesis, which we can actually point out at any moment by direct observation, is in itself much more wonderful and astonishing than the corresponding, but much slower and gradual transformation which the long chain of ancestors of the same individual has gone through in phylogenesis.

The two series of organic development, the ontogenesis of the individual and the phylogenesis of the tribe to which it belongs, stand in the closest casual connection with each other. I have endeavored, in the second volume of the "General Morphology," to establish this theory in detail, I consider it exceedingly important. As I have there shown, ontogenesis, or the development of the individual, is a short and quick repetition (recapitulation) of phylogenesis, or the development of the tribe to which it belongs, determined by the laws of inheritance and adaptation; by tribe I mean the ancestors which form the chain of progenitors of the individual concerned (Gen. Morph. ii, p. 110–147, 371).

In this intimate connection of ontogeny and phylogeny, I see one of the most important and irrefutable proofs of the Theory of Descent. No one can explain these phenomena unless he has recourse to the laws of Inheritance and Adaptation; by these alone are they explicable. These laws, which we have previously explained, are the laws of abbreviated, of homochronic, and of homotopic inheritance, and here deserve renewed consideration. As so high and complicated an organism as that of man, or the organism of every other mammal, rises upwards from a simple cellular state, and as it progresses in its differentiation and perfecting it passes through the same series of transformations which its animal progenitors have passed through, during immense spaces of time, inconceivable ages ago. I have already pointed out this extremely important parallelism of the development of individuals and tribes. Certain very early and low stages in the development of man, and the other vertebrate animals in general, correspond completely in many points of structure with conditions which last for life in the lower fishes. The next phase which follows upon this presents us with a change of the fish-like being into a kind of amphibious animal. At a later period the mammal, with its special characteristics, develops out of the amphibian, and we can clearly see, in the successive stages of its later development, a series of steps of progressive transformation which evidently correspond with the differences of different mammalian orders and families. Now, it is precisely in the same succession that we also see the ancestors of man, and of the higher mammals, appear one after the other in the earth's history; first fishes, then amphibians, later the lower, and at last the higher mammals. Here, therefore, the embryonic development of the individual is completely parallel to the palæontological development of the whole tribe to which it belongs, and this exceedingly interesting and important phenomena can be explained only by the interaction of the laws of Inheritance and Adaptation.

The example last mentioned of the parallelism of the palæontological and of the individual developmental series, now directs our attention to a third developmental series, which stands in the closest relations to these two, and which likewise runs, on the whole, parallel to them. I mean that series of development of forms which constitutes the object of investigation in comparative anatomy, and which I will briefly call the systematic development series of species. By this we understand the chain of the different, but related and connected forms, which exist side by side at any one period of the earth's history; as for example, at the present moment. While comparative anatomy compares the different forms of fully-developed organisms with one another, it endeavors to discover the common prototypes which underlie, as it were, the manifold forms of kindred genera, classes, etc., and which are more or less concealed by their particular differentiation. It endeavors to make out the series of progressive steps which are indicated in the different degrees of perfection of the divergent branches of the tribe. To make use again of the same particular instance, comparative anatomy shows us how the individual organs and systems of organs in the tribe of vertebrate animals—in the different classes, families, and species of it—have unequally developed, differentiated, and perfected themselves. It shows us how far the succession of classes of vertebrate animals, from the Fishes upwards, through the Amphibia to the Mammals, and here again, from the lower to the higher orders of Mammals, forms a progressive series or ladder. This attempt to establish a connected anatomical developmental series we may discover in the works of the great comparative anatomists of all ages—in the works of Goethe, Meckel, Cuvier, Johannes Müller, Gegenbaur, and Huxley.

The developmental series of mature forms, which comparative anatomy points out in the different diverging and ascending steps of the organic system, and which we call the systematic developmental series, is parallel to the palæontological developmental series, because it deals with the result of palæontological development, and it is parallel to the individual developmental series, because this is parallel to the palæontological series. If two parallels are parallel to a third, they must be parallel to one another.

The varied differentiation, and the unequal degree of perfecting which comparative anatomy points out in the developmental series of the System, is chiefly determined by the ever-increasing variety of conditions of existence to which the different groups adapt themselves in the struggle for life, and by the different degrees of rapidity and completeness with which this adaptation has been effected. Conservative groups which have retained their inherited peculiarities most tenaciously remain, in consequence, at the lowest and rudest stage of development. Those groups progressing most rapidly and variously, and which have adapted themselves to changed conditions of existence most readily have attained the highest degree of perfection. The further the organic world developed in the course of the earth's history, the greater must the gap between the lower conservative and the higher progressive groups have become, as, in fact, may be seen, too, in the history of nations. In this way also is explained the historical fact, that the most perfect animal and vegetable groups have developed themselves in a comparatively short time to a considerable height, while the lowest or most conservative groups have remained stationary, throughout all ages, in their original simple stage, or have progressed, but very slowly and gradually. The series of man's progenitors clearly shows this state of things. The sharks of the present day are still very like the primary fish, which are among the most ancient vertebrate progenitors of man, and the lowest amphibians of the present day (the gilled salamanders and salamanders) are very like the amphibians which first developed themselves out of fishes. So, too, the later ancestors of man, the Monotremata and Marsupials, the most ancient mammals, are at the same time the most imperfect animals of the class which still exist.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Materialists say these brutal doings were characteristics of early times, but that it is absurd to suppose they were commanded by an infinite being. The records of these barbarisms are valuable only as they furnish us with an index to the character and condition of the Jewish people and surrounding tribes centuries ago.

Christianity claims that the Bible is an exceptional book, and its advocates are unwilling to test its narratives by the ordinary rules of historical criticism. They ask that we believe the whole, whether it seems to us reasonable or not.

The Materialist subjects the Bible to the same canons of evidence, and judges as to its historical authenticity by the same rules of criticism that he employs when he read Tacitus or Livy, Thucydides or Xenophon. He accepts as probable what seems natural and reasonable, while he rejects without fear or hesitation everything miraculous or plainly fabulous. "It is an absolute rule of criticism," says Renan, "to exclude from history every event of a miraculous character."

Christianity, to prove its claims, appeals to—

1. Antecedent probability.
2. The lofty monotheism of the Old Testament.
3. The progressive character of the Bible revelation.
4. The miracles of the Old and New Testaments.
5. The Prophecies.
6. The Ten Commandments.
7. The Sermon on the Mount.
8. The character of Christ.
9. The martyrdom of the early Christians.
10. The spread of Christianity.
11. The influence of Christianity.

1. The Materialist replies, that the argument of antecedent probability leads to a reductio ad absurdum. The same kind of reasoning that is used to prove that God would probably make a revelation, namely, that he is infinitely powerful and infinitely good, and man needs more light than nature affords, would establish an antecedent probability against the existence of evil in the world. Evil, it may be said, is injurious to man and offensive to God. God is infinitely good and disposed to make man happy. He is all powerful, and can remove all obstacles to his happiness. There is, consequently, no evil in the world. This argument of antecedent probability proves too much and therefore proves nothing.

2. Monotheism existed in Egypt and India long before the Jews had a national existence, long before the alleged date of Abraham. The Egyptian priests were monotheists. The Vedic hymns are more monotheistic than the Pentateuch. Moses taught that the God of the Jews was one God and superior to all others. He did not forbid belief in, but the worship of, other gods.

3. The progressive character of the pretended revelation from God simply accords with the improvement and advancement of the Jewish people.

4. The miracles of the Old and New Testament prove nothing until they are established as historical events.

5. The prophecies are generally vague, lacking in circumstantiality and particularity of statement. But many of the clearest of the prophecies have been plainly falsified by the facts of history. This is true of the predictions regarding the destruction of Babylon, Tyre, and Damascus, the desolation of Egypt, the restoration of the lost tribes, the perpetuity of the Israelitish throne, the appearance of a temporal Messiah, who should sit on the throne of David and make them (the Babylonians) captive, whose captive they (the Jews) were, and the destruction of the world.

6. The Ten Commandments were old when Moses was born.

7. The Sermon on the Mount contains many beautiful precepts, but we find them all in Hindoo, Greek, and Roman authors centuries before the time of Christ.

8. The character of Jesus contains much that is estimable, but it has grave defects and deficiencies, and on the whole is, in our opinion, inferior to that of Socrates and hundreds who have appeared in later times.

9. Martyrdom is proof of sincerity, not of the truth of what is believed or taught.

10. The spread of Christianity is wonderful to nobody who acquaints himself with the condition of the world at the time it appeared, and the events which led to its rapid progress and triumphant establishment in the Roman Empire. The progress of Buddhism and even Mohammedanism, in our opinion, is more difficult to explain.

11. The influence of Christianity we think, on the whole, has been terribly pernicious. No other system of which history gives an account has inflicted the same amount of suffering on the human race. From millions of graves the blood of its victims cry out against it.

The Materialist holds that a miraculous revelation from God is antecedently improbable, because it implies a miraculous intervention in the affairs of the world.

There is abundant evidence, we think, all the evidence that the case admits of, that the Bible is entirely a human production.

It is clear that many of the books of the Bible were neither written at the time, nor by the persons, claimed. The genuineness of a book claiming to be a revelation from heaven once destroyed, the claim is entitled to no further attention.

Nearly all the books of the Bible abound in statements plainly contradictory. These contradictions are admitted now by intelligent and candid Christians.

The Bible contains barbarous laws and instructions. Many of the ceremonies commanded are puerile in the extreme. Many of the prophecies, as we have noticed, have been proven unhappy guesses.

Modern science, astronomy, geology, natural history, paleontology, archæology, and Egyptology have brought to light facts universally recognized as such among scientific men, which completely disprove much of the teachings of the Bible respecting the past history of this globe.

Many of the narratives in the Bible are as certainly fabulous as anything to be found in any of the ancient histories that have descended to us.

It is demonstrably true that the religion of the Old and New Testaments is largely an outgrowth from pre-existing systems of faith.

The Bible deserves a place, the first place no doubt, among the other pretended revelations of the world—the Zend Avesta, the Rig Veda and the Koran.

Christianity is full of mysteries based on alleged occurrences contrary to general experience, and opposed to the enlightened reason of man. For instance, the story of the resurrection is contrary to all our observation and experience. It is not above our reason, it is plainly opposed to it; for all reasonings are based on experience, and the story of the resurrection contradicts the invariable experience of mankind. It is true that discoveries have been made, which seemed to be contrary to the natural course of events or operations of nature; but further investigation has shown that, however in conflict with a limited experience, they were according to that general experience which teaches the invariableness of natural law.

The mysteries of nature which present themselves to the Christian and the Materialist alike, are not contrary to experience, are not opposed to reason, but are simply above our comprehension. That the stimulus of air, heat, light, and moisture operating upon a rose gives different colors to the stamen, petals, and anthers, is a fact of which although we do not understand the rationale, we have no doubt. That grass of the same pasture is converted into wool on the back of sheep, hair on the back of the cow, and feathers on the back of the goose, we are satisfied; but the process in detail, by which this transformation takes place is beyond our comprehension. So all the mysteries of nature are founded on our ignorance of the causes of phenomena known to exist, phenomena respecting the reality of which there is no dispute. Is there no dispute as to the reality of the miraculous conception and the resurrection? Let the Christian establish the Munchausenish stories of the Bible as true before he claims an analogy between the mysteries of nature and the miraculous events recorded in Jewish and Christian Scriptures.

There are wide and irreconcilable differences of opinion among Christians. These differences are inconsistent with the claim that the Bible is a revelation from God. Should a being of infinite wisdom, as we have before remarked, make a revelation to man, he would, it is reasonable to believe, make himself understood; otherwise his communication would be no revelation at all. To reveal is to make known. Men are liable to be misunderstood because of the indefiniteness of their ideas and their inability to express their views with clearness and precision, but is it possible that such a being as we are told God is, has taken the pains to inspire certain individuals to write his thoughts, and has so obscured his meaning by doubtful phrases and ambiguous expressions that learned and honest men cannot agree as to what he has declared?

There is diversity of opinion among Freethinkers with whom Materialists are ranked; but such a difference of views among them is to be expected and is consistent with their general position, since they agree that men have no divine standard, and that it is evident to all that no two minds are constituted exactly alike, receive exactly the same education, or are surrounded by exactly the same influences. In the absence of an infallible standard, uniformity of opinion, especially in matters of speculation, is not to be looked for.

THE operation of giving a smooth surface to shot and shell by means of the lathe has been pratically abolished in the Royal Laboratory Department of the Woolwich Arsenal. Projectiles are now cast of the exact size required and with a smooth surface. Two advantages have thus been secured—the cost of production is reduced, and the hard and strong outer surface of the shells is preserved.

ORGANS OF PLANTS.

NO. XXI.

My Dear Readers: Let me now talk with you about the organs of plants. You know my partiality to the subject, and will humor me with at least one more letter upon this theme.

Having considered the elementary structures and tissues found in the vegetable kingdom, let us now proceed to view them in combination to form the plant. The simplest plant is found among Algæ, where, as in the Red-snow plant, the whole organism consists of a single isolated cell. Other plants of the same family, and all fungi and musci, are composed of a number of cells, united in various ways, while in ferns and their allies, and all flowering plants, vessels are formed in addition to their cells. The plants in which the tissues are entirely cellular are called cellular plants; those in which vessels are found are vascular plants.

That the portions of a plant may be properly maintained, two functions have to be performed, namely, nutrition, on the proper performance of which the life of the individual plant depends, and reproduction, by which the perpetuation of the type is provided for. In such a simple form as the Red-snow plant these functions are performed by the single cell. In the plants composed of numerous cells a differentiation takes place by which special cells are set apart for particular functions, and thus certain organs are formed in the plant. In the higher plants these organs become more complicated from the introduction of the vascular element.

The nutritive organs of plants are generally known as the root, the stem, and the leaves. In all vascular plants, and the higher cellular plants, an axis or stem having roots and bearing leaves is distinguishable; and such plants have been designated cormophytes or phyllophytes. In the lower classes of cellular plants, as fungi and algæ, no such distinction is possible, and there is merely a flattened, leafy expansion with depended filiform processes; this structure has been termed a thallus, and such plants are thallogens, or thallophytes.

Amongst the higher plants the reproductive organs are, in ordinary language, comprehended under the term flower; and, as they are conspicuous, such plants have been denominated flowering, phanerogamous, or phœnogamous. Amongst all cellular plants, and in some vascular plants, as ferns and equisetum, there are no flowers, and the reproductive organs are inconspicuous, hence they are termed flowerless, or cryptogamous. In all cases the young plant, or embryo, is completely cellular. But, as growth proceeds, that differentiation takes place which distinguishes the several classes of plants, one from the other. In phanerogams, the first leaves produced upon the embryo plant are termed primary seed-lobes, or cotyleodons. In some cases these are two in number, and are opposite one another. In other plants the lobes alternate, and only one cotyleodon is formed.

Lest I become tedious, I will very briefly pass over the organs of nutrition, among which may be named roots, stems, branches, buds, leaves, etc., and dwell at more length upon the organs of reproduction, as these are less familiar to you.

In phanerogamous plants these organs are conspicuous, and constitute what is known as the flower. The structures which go to form these organs are not, however, formations of a new type, but are merely modifications of those structures which we have already considered.

A flower bud has not in ordinary circumstances any power of extension by the development of its central cellular portion. In this respect it differs from the leaf bud. In some cases the flowers, so far as their fuctional capabilities are concerned, are abortive. Flower buds, like leaf buds, are produced in the axils of leaves, which are called floral leaves or bracts.

As a convenient method of expressing the arrangements of the parts of a flower, floral formulæ have been devised. Several modes of expression are employed. The essential reproductive organs, are the stamens and the pistil, the latter containing the seeds or germs of young plants, and corresponding to the female, while the former produces a powder necessary for fecundation and is looked upon as performing the part of the male. The presence of both is required in order that the perfect seed may be produced. A flower may have calyx and corolla but it will be imperfect if the essential organs are not present. The name of hermaphrodite or bisexual is given to flowers in which both organs is found; that of unisexual or diclinous to those in which only one of those organs appears,—those bearing stamens only being staminiferous, or male; those having the pistil only, pistiliferous, or female. But even in plants with hermaphrodite flowers it is rare that self-fertilization takes place, and this is provided against by the structure of the parts or by the period of ripening of the organs. Some flowers have long stamens and a pistil with a short style, others have short stamens and a pistil with a long style. In some plants the stamens are perfected before the pistils, in other flowers the pistil is perfected before the stamen. When the male and female flower of a species are found on separate plants, the term dicœcious or dioicous is applied; and when a species has male, female, and hermophrodite flowers on the same or different plants it is polygamous.

The stamens arise from the thalamus, or torus, within the petals, with which they alternate, forming one or more verticils or whorls, which constitute the male organs of the plants. Their normal position is below the lower whorl, or pistil, and when they are so placed upon the thalamus they are hypogynous. The arrangements of parts are of great importance in classification. The stamens vary in number from one to many hundreds. Like the other parts of the flower, they are modified leaves, resembling leaves in their structure, development, and arrangement. In their general aspect they have a greater resemblance to petals than to the leaves, and there is often seen a gradual transition from petals to stamens, especially in spiral flowers. When flowers become double by cultivation, the stamens are converted into petals. When there is only one whorl, the stamens are usually equal in number to the sepals, or petals, and are arranged opposite to the former, and alternate with the latter. When there is more than one whorl of stamens, then the parts of each successive whorl alternate with those of the whorl preceding it. The staminal row is more liable to multiplication of parts than the outer whorls. The number of stamens is indicated by the Greek numerals prefixed to term Androus; thus a flower with 1 stamen is Monandrous (Hippuris, Centranthus); 2 stamens is Diandrous (Veronica, Calceolaria, Circæa); 3 stamens is Triandrous (Grasses, Iris, Valeriana); 4 stamens is Tetrandrous (Alchemilla, Galium, Plantago); 5 stamens is Pentandrous (Primula, Unbelliferæ, Campanula); 6 stamens is Hexandrous (Tulip, Lilium, Juncus); 7 stamens is Heptandrous (Trientalis, Horse-chestnut); 8 stamens is Octandrous (Heath, Fuchsia, Epilobium); 9 stamens is Enneandrous (Butomus, some Lauraceæ); 10 stamens is Decandrous (Saxifraga, Dianthus, Oxalis); 12 stamens is Dodecandrous (Asarum, Agrimonia, Reseda); 20 stamens is Icosandrous (Strawberry, Potentilla, Cratægus). Numerous and indifferent stamens is Polyandrous (Poppy).

The pollen, or powdery matter contained in the anther—the head, or superior part of the stamen—consists of small cells developed in the interior of other cells. These are produced in the large, thick-walled mother-cells, or pollen utricles formed in the interior of the pollen-sacs of the young anther. The color is generally yellow, and the surface is often covered with a viscid, or oily substance. Pollen-grains vary from 1-300 to 1-700 of an inch, or less, in diameter. Their forms are various. The most common form is ellipsoidal, more or less narrow at the extremities, which are called its poles, in contradistinction to a line equidistant from the extremities, and which is its equator. They are sometimes spherical, sometimes cylindrical, and curved. Within the pollen-grain a granular, semi-fluid matter, called fovilla, is contained, along with some oily particles, and occasionally starch. The fovilla contains small spherical granules, sometimes not more than 1-30000 of an inch in diameter, and large ellipsoidal, or elongated corpuscles, which exhibit molecular movements under the microscope.

When the pollen-grains are ripe, the anther dehisces, and the pollen is shed. In order that fertilization may be effected, the pollen must be conveyed to the female organs of reproduction. This process, termed pollination, is promoted in various ways, the whole form and structure of the flower having relation to the process. In some plants the mere elasticity of the filaments is sufficient to effect the pollination, in others it is effected by the wind. But the more common agents are the insects. In alluring them and attracting them to the flower, the odoriferous secretions and gay colors play an important part.

The pistil or the more distinctive female organ occupies the center or axis of the flower, and is surrounded by the stamens and floral envelopes when these are present. After the flowering is over, this organ is changed into the fruit and contains the seeds. It consists essentially of two parts, a basal portion forming a chamber, the ovary or germen, containing ovules or young seeds attached to a part called the placenta and an upper portion, the stigma a cellular secreting body, which is either seated on the ovary, and is then called sessile, as is in the tulip and poppy, or is elevated on the stalk called the style, interposed between the ovary and stigma. The style is not necessary for the perfection of the pistil. Like the other organs, the pistil consists of one or more modified leaves which in this instance are called carpels. When a pistil consists of a single carpel it is simple or monocarpellary, a state usually depending on the non-development of other carpels. When it is composed of several carpels, more or less united, it is compound, or polycarpellary. In the first mentioned case, the terms carpel and pistil are synonomous. Each carpel has its own ovary, style (when present), and stigma, and is formed by a folded leaf, the upper surface of which is turned inwards towards the axis, and the lower outwards, while from its margins are developed one or more buds called ovuls. That this is the true nature of the pistil, may be seen by examining the flower of the double-flowering cherry. In it no fruit is produced, and the pistil consists of sessile leaves, the limb of each being green and folded, with a narrow prolongation upwards, as if from the midrib, and ending in a thickened portion. The ovary then represents the limb or lamina of the leaf, and is composed of cellular tissue with fibro-vascular bundles, and epiderrmal covering. The cellular tissue, or parenchyma, often becomes much developed, as will be seen, particularly when fleshy fruits are considered. The outer epidermis corresponds to the lower side of the leaf, exhibiting stomata, and sometimes hairs; the inner surface represents the upper side of the leaf, being usually very delicate and pale, and forming a layer called sometimes epithelium, which does not exhibit stomata. The vascular bundles correspond with the veins of the leaf, and consist of spiral, annular, and other vessels.

A pistil is usually formed by more than one carpel. The carpels may be arranged like leaves, either at the same or nearly the same height in a verticil, or at different heights in a spiral cycle. When they remain separate and distinct, thus showing at once the composition of the pistil, the term apocarpous is applied.

The ovary is usually of a more or less spherical or curved form, sometimes smooth and uniform on its surface, at other hairy and grooved. The grooves usually indicate the divisions between the carpels and correspond to the dissepiments. The dorsal suture may be marked by a slight projection or by a superficial groove. When the ovary is situated on the centre of the receptacle, free from the other whorls, so that its base is above the insertion of the stamens, it is termed superior, as in lychnis, primula, and geranium, when the margin of the receptacle is prolonged upwards, carrying with it the floral envelopes and staminal leaves, the basal portion of the ovary being formed by the receptacle, and the carpellary leaves alone closing in the apex, the ovary is inferior, as in pomegranate, apple, pear, gooseberry, and fuchsia. In some plants there are intermediate forms, in which the term half-inferior, is applied to the ovary, whilst the floral whorls are half-superior.

But, kind friends, the weather is extremely warm, and I feel assured that you do not want too much of botany and hard names at this time. I see I shall be compelled to bore you with still one more letter upon this botanical subject. If I am able to say what I wish, in that one letter, I will afterwards talk to you upon some other theme.

In the meantime, let me advise you to keep as cool as you reasonably can, avoid sunstroke, and try to make yourselves as happy as possible.

Believe me your sincere friend, Lucifer,

How to do it—and How not.

BY THERON C. LELAND. ARTICLE VII.

"There is a one best way to do every thing, even if it be but to boil an egg."

That is a piece of Emersonian wisdom which will well apply to this business of suppressing obscenity. Given the necessity, then what is the "one best way" to do it? If I could bore and button-hole Congressmen, and waylay secretaries and officials and, after a hard struggle, should succeed in getting (what decidedly I don't want) an appointment as obscene agent; and wished to take a contract to really and truly suppress obscenity; and honestly wanted to suppress it; and knew the article when I saw it; and wasn't constantly mistaking mushrooms for toadstools; and didn't want to make any money out of the suppression of the one nor spread of the other, what would I do, as a sensible contractor? What tools would I choose, and what "one best way" would I go to work as a determined exterminator? Would I select a wheelbarrow to "tote" a few hundred pounds from a mass of tons, out to the suburbs, and dump it on a vacant lot or would I take a gang of shovelers with cars, carts, and excavators to remove and bury it out of sight effectually?

Now, to take the U. S. mail for such a work, after the Comstock and Abbot fashion, is just exactly the wheelbarrow method; is to take a tool that will never accomplish the purpose, and is decidedly not the "one best way." To forbid the transport of obscene matter by mail, leaving the express and freight lines free to carry it, as the Supreme Court, Dogberry like, goes out of its way to compel Congress to do, is so glaring an example of how not to do it that no one but a wholly incapable obscene agent and his reverend backers would resort to it. If there are tons and tons of obscene matter, as the agent claims, certainly the recognized carriers for tons are the great freight forwarders, and you never can suppress the transportation of tons of obscenity as long as the Erie canal remains open.

But suppose we reject hyperbole and extravagance of statement, and recognize the fact that there are really no tons of actually obscene matter—that it takes a makeweight of Liberal books and Freethought journals, which are not obscene, thrown in to make up tons. Throw out all untenable claims, and then what is the "one best way" to suppress what little of real obscenity does actually get pictured or printed, and thrown upon such market as there is for it? How did Comstock do it before he had any U. S. postal law to help him? Before 1873 there was no such law; but there were already existing State and local laws, and he went to work to find who manufactured the obscene stuff, seized their stock and sent the offenders to prison.

The place where obscenity originates is the place to attack and uproot it. It has but few places of origin—it has many ways of circulation. It is printed somewhere, it is produced at some place, and the detective force of this country is equal to the task of finding out where and by whom, and State and local laws may be made effective for the purpose without ever calling the U. S. mail into the service. This kind of literature must have types, plates, and presses, like any other, and cannot be wholly hidden from observation. The books or prints have to be stored, distributed and sold; and many persons must know of the various operations. A moderate reward for information would bring out some journeyman printer, clerk, office-boy, or somebody who had aided or in some way knew of such publication, storage, or sale. Even the purchasers could be induced to inform. In short, the ways and means are abundant for detecting fairly and legitimately the offenders in this line of vice, without resort to the U. S. mail, which, though it might be of some use as a pruning-hook, is more likely to be turned into a sword to go slashing around in many dangerous ways.

If it is objected that some of the States might pass suppressive laws on the subject while others would not, and then the obscene wares might be transported from one State where it is not prohibited, to another where it is, I would meet that difficulty, as it might arise, by bringing the subject promptly and urgently before the Legislature of any State where any of her citizens were discovered in this kind of manufacture and traffic. Also, by extra vigilance over dealers in the contraband literature and by certain and adequate punishment of them when caught. There ought to be no difficulty in framing and securing the passage of such a law as would be just, through all the Legislatures; and then the wholly indefensible practice of going to Congress to obtain legislation on morals, and on merely local vices, would be stopped.

Comstock didn't go to Congress to get any aid in suppressing real obscenity. He went there for quite another and farther on purpose. He had already accomplished his one great work. He was ambitious and wanted other worlds to conquer. It was by his success in the methods he first employed, under State laws, that he was emboldened to take a higher flight; so he went to Washington to lobby through a law that would reach Infidels, Freethinkers, free religionists, free lovers, or anybody who had the independence to hold free opinions of any kind. He was doing well enough at the suppression of real obscenity under State laws; and in procuring the enactment of the U. S. postal law of 1873, his whole and sole object was to extend his authority through its operations to opponents of the Church, and to unorthodox classes. It was under these State laws before 1873 that he did his really meritorious work, and made his reputation as an effective agent and a benefactor to society. It was not till he began to put his U. S. postal law into operation that he came up against difficulties and began to meet opposition; and it was not till the stretch of his authority beyond what even that law allowed, that he lost caste and sank into odium, even with many, if not all who had previously aided and defended him. The obscene postal law has been of no real benefit or service to Comstock, and never will be. On the contrary it has tempted him into tyrannies and encroachments on the freedom of the press which he never would have thought of but for the unconstitutional and altogether questionable power it placed in his indiscreet hands; and he might better consent now to let the law be repealed. It is already a dead letter so far as he and his objects are concerned, and will become more and more unenforceable day by day. Wherever in these United States an editor publishes a paper, and one thousand subscribers, or even only one hundred want it enough to pay for it, they have a right to have it, and he has a right to publish it and send it to his patrons through the mails, unmolested by any power or authority whatever; least of all by an ecclesiastical authority or one that has the remotest origin from or relation to any ecclesiastic influence.

There will always be this insuperable difficulty with the Abbot and Comstock method. Congress has no constitutional power or authority to exclude written or printed matter from the mails. No matter what the Courts have decided, or may decide, the truth of this proposition will come out more clearly the more it is discussed. It is not claimed that Congress has no right to exclude anything from the mails. A chain cable or a hogshead of molasses is "anything." The mails were not originally intended to carry merchandise. The carrying of small articles, aside from news, is a later innovation upon the P. O. Department. Carrying such articles is a mere matter of convenience, and the cessation from such carrying would amount to nothing but an inconvenience. But written and printed matter, letters, and newspapers, the things that from early colonial times have been carried first on man, or mule, or horseback, then in mail coaches, then on steamboats and railway trains, without partiality and without discrimination, carrying everything and refusing nothing in the shape of a letter, newspaper, magazine, or pamphlet—these are matters of necessity; and their safe, impartial, unmolested transportation in the mails is a matter of the most vital importance to the American people.

Judge Blatchford, then, if he is a Judge, is not wholly right when he holds that, "as Congress had the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, it had also the right to determine what it will and what it will not carry." On the contrary, Congress must, by colonial law, by common law, by common usage for three centuries, by constitutional law, and by every consideration of necessity and in accordance with the powers granted them by the people, carry all letters, journals, tracts, pamphlets and periodicals. These they must carry without choice or discrimination; and it is not till they get outside of these that "Congress has the right to determine" what other and farther articles "it will or will not carry." Books probably ought now to be added to the articles that they must carry, but, as between all other articles of strict merchandise, of course Congress has the right to discriminate by law as to what it will or what it will not carry.

As to written and printed matter, Congress has the right to make rules and regulations—make terms upon which it may be carried, fix the price per ounce or pound, prescribe advance or terminal payment, printed matter to be open at the end for inspection to see if written matter subject to letter postage may not be enclosed, and regulations of that kind; but Congress has no right to interpose any regulations concerning the views, opinions, or inculcations, religious, social, or political, contained in the written or printed matter. It don't cost any more to carry one opinion than it does another, and it is the weight of the paper, not of the opinion that Congress has to consider.

Not one word in the Constitution of the United States, not one line of it from one end to the other, grants to Congress any power to regulate the views, opinions or moral or immoral quality of the literature of the people. Section 8th, article I., of the Constitution commences: "Congress shall have power," and then goes on to enumerate seventeen numbered powers which "Congress shall have," but this power, which Abbot and Comstock claim, is not among them. The 7th power just simply reads: "To establish post-offices and post-roads," and that is all the Constitution says on that subject. Neither do any of the subsequent amendments provide for any such regulation or interference with entire freedom of opinion or the transportation thereof in the mails. On the contrary, the very first amendment expressly provides that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," and the Supreme Court has just decided that "Liberty of circulating is essential to that freedom."

The Comstock law, then is clearly unconstitutional; and Abbot, Underwood, and Ingersoll, when they get their modified petition going, modify it as much as they may, will still occupy the unenviable position of praying Congress to retain upon the statute book an infamous law for which there is not only no warrant in the Constitution, but which is condemned by it in one of its express provisions, and condemned also by the whole spirit of the Declaration of Independence and the doctrines of the founders of the Republic. You, modifying gentlemen, cannot suppress obscenity by your postal law alone. That can reach only a very small part of it. You have got, at last, to invoke the aid of State laws, if you wish to suppress the whole of it. But those State laws will do it effectively without aid from the postal department. Why not, then, go to those laws at once, as we have done from time immemoral, even down to the era of our obscene Agamemnon; and not meddle at all with so cumbersome, inefficient, and questionable a power as the U. S. mail affords.

What, then, would happen if the 70,000 petitioners should be granted the utmost of their prayer? They asked for repeal or modification—suppose they should get repeal—what would be the worst result of that repeal? Why, simply the situation would go back to the state of things before 1873, to the State laws then and now existing, under which Comstock did all the really thorough work he has ever done. Is there anything so very distressing in that? If, in any point, these laws are now defective, they can be amended; and under them real obscenity can be pursued in and through all its hiding-places and effectually suppressed, without wrenching from its beneficent purposes the great U. S. mail, the vital, all-important vehicle for the circulation of the correspondence and news of 50,000,000 of people, to gratify the whims and the spites of a well-meaning, perhaps, but entirely narrow and impracticable clique of the "unco guid." It is desirable, it is commendable, it is indeed the part of highest wisdom, necessity, and honor to apply the principle of "eternal vigilance" to every first step that may lead on to tyranny, suppression of the truth, and finally to wholesale interference with freedom of the press, and then, farther on, with all our freedoms. The Fathers commended to us that vigilance. We should never let it sleep; but we have caught it napping, and we dream of security when the tyrant is at our door. One editor of a Liberal journal lies in a United States prison to-day, the victim of an oppression that we thought possible only under an old world despotism; but no less the victim of that lack of vigilance which the American people should have brought to bear at an earlier stage of this downward business. We should awaken now with renewed and resistless energy and retrieve our neglected position. But, gentlemen Underwood and Abbot, will petitions to modify, do it? Won't your modification be but a compromise which will share the fate of all compromises—a half measure which will leave a upas tap-root to sprout, and spread, and poison the national atmosphere over again? Can't you see "the consequences in the principle," and conclude it to be the better policy to "avoid the consequences by denying the principle"?

Schwabe has compiled a long series of statistics concerning the periodicity of the solar spots, having from 1826 to 1868 observed the Sun every day that the state of weather permitted. The result of his observations was that he recognized the existence of a positive periodicity, very marked maxima and minima succeeding each other at an interval of about ten years. This decennial period coincides very unexpectedly with several meteorological phenomena on the earth,—amongst others, as recent observations testify, with the variations of magnetic force and the periodicity of aurora borealis.

The periodicity of the spots indicates, as Father Secchi remarks, a periodicity in the solar activity, and the variations of this activity may well be communicated to the Earth, either by means of heat or some other channel as yet unknown, such, for instance, as electro-dynamic induction, this producing upon our globe meteorological or electric phenomena.*

The theory expounded by M. Becquerel at the Académie des Sciences, in 1871, is in confirmation of this view. He maintains that all the causes which elicit electricity from the Earth's surface would be insufficient to supply the enormous quantities which are diffused in the planetary regions, and even in our atmosphere. He goes on to show that the hitherto unknown origin electricity can be none other than the Sun. The spots upon this luminary, some of them 40,000 miles in extent, seem to be the cavities from which the hydrogen and the various substances composing the solar atmosphere are emitted. Now, hydrogen conveys with it the positive electricity which becomes diffused in the planetary regions, permeating thence to the terrestrial atmosphere, and even to the earth itself. The matter which electricity carries with it suffices for its transmission, it having been proved that electricity has the property of becoming diffused in a void space, if it has any accompanying matter. The phenomena of the polar aurora produced by electric discharge also prove, in M. Becquerel's opinion, the existence of gaseous matter in space, far beyond the bounds assigned to the terrestrial atmosphere, it being certain that these auroræ are at least 125 miles distant from the earth's surface.

M. Charles Sainte-Claire Deville points out that the facts adduced by M. Becquerel in support of the celestial origin of atmospheric electricity confirm his own hypothesis as to the celestial origin of the variations of atmospheric temperature, and, especially, as to the influence which the periodical apparition of cosmical substances in the interplanetary regions may have upon these phenomena.

The following facts will fit in harmoniously at this point.

Signor Tacchini wrote from Palermo to the Académie des Sciences, that the aurora borealis of February 4th, 1872, was a phenomenon so extraordinary as to have few parallels in scientific annals, and that its apparition was accompanied by corresponding movements upon the surface of the Sun.

The bad weather prevented Signor Tacchini from taking spectrum observations on the 3d and 4th of February, but he noticed, on the morning of the 5th, that the whole surface of the Sun was in an abnormal condition. The rim was covered with bright flames; towards the north pole they exceeded 20 seconds, with an arc of 36′ to right and to left, corresponding with a bright region of magnesium which, at the western rim, extended almost to the equator. In this portion, at 50 degrees from the pole, was seen a magnificent prominence, which rose to 2′ 40″, and from this point, at an arc of 40 degrees, the rim was lighted with brilliant flames, while the atmosphere was studded with small luminous filaments, or bright specks, about 2 minutes in height. Signor Tacchini also sent a drawing to illustrate these phenomena.

M. Cheux, communicating to the Académie des Sciences the features of a white aurora borealis observed near Angers, on the 8th of August, 1872, states that the Sun had been for some time in a very effervescent state, and that on examining it with a Foucault telescope on the 9th of August, he saw about 24 spots, one of which, a deep black, was very beautiful.

Senor Capello, of Lisbon, also sent some drawings of the Sun as appeared on the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th of August, after the same aurora borealis.

BEFORE administering chloroform, Prof. Occhini causes the patient to inspire ammonia, and it is said that he has in this way obviated the danger of subjecting persons suffering from heart disease to the influence of this anæsthetic. The theory is that the stimulating property of the ammonia on the nervous and vascular system counteracts the depressing action of the chloroform.

Science and Theology—Ancient and Modern.

BY JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE.

Nations have never been formed on such principles. Nations in their infancy aspire to something else than material prosperity. They have beliefs, enthusiasms, patriotisms, with a savor of nobleness in them. Cæsar himself owed his conquests to the self-devotion of his soldiers, his own affection for them, and to his inconsistent idealism. And the experiment of the Roman empire showed that nations can not any more live by such principles after they have arrived at maturity. Coarse minds are brutalized by them. The average mind rejects them, and prefers superstition, however wild. Gibbon considered that, on the whole, the subjects of the empire enjoyed greater happiness in the years which intervened between the accession of Trajan and the death of Marcus Aurelius than at any period before or since; but it was a happiness in which their nature became degraded, and when the shock came of the barbarian invasions they had lost the courage to resist.

It would of course be preposterous to pretend that there was any general resemblance between the state of things under the Roman sovereignty and the present condition of Europe and America. Then, the whole civilized world was held down under a single despotism. Now, free and powerful nations confront each other, each jealous of its rights, and resolute to maintain them; each professing to prefer honor to prosperity. And yet in the long run the fate of nations is determined by the convictions about the nature and responsibilities of man which are embodied in their policy, and are entertained by the ablest thinkers; and everywhere, it may be said, opinions are now professed by men whom we agree to admire, and are accepted by politicians as the rule of legislation, which recall the phenomena of the time when the old order of things perished, as if high cultivation itself was like the blossoming of a plant, the final consummation of a long series of past efforts which precedes a great change. The flower sheds its petals. Seed-vessels develop in the place of it, from which after a long winter there arises a new era.

The nations of modern Europe, like the early Greeks and Romans, formed their original policy on religion. For centuries states and individuals alike professed to be governed in all that they thought and did by the supposed revelation which was given to mankind eighteen hundred years ago. Avowed disbelief of it there was none; of secret, silent misgiving there was probably very little. For practical purposes that revelation was accepted as a fact, as little allowing of doubt as the commonest phenomena of daily experience. The universal confidence received its first shock at the Reformation of the sixteenth century. Just as the original pagan creed was made incredible by the legends with which it was overspread, so Christianity was overgrown by a forest of extravagant superstitions. Conscience and intelligence rose in revolt, and tore them to pieces. For a time all was well. The weeds were gone; the faith of the early Church was restored in its simplicity. The Huguenots in France, the Lutherans in Germany, the Puritans in England and Scotland were as absolutely under the influence of religious belief as the apostles and first converts. Providence to them was not a form of speech, but a living reality. The preambles of the English Acts of Parliament referred always to the will of the Almighty as the foundation of human law. Skeptics, even then, had begun to exist. There were men who, after the authority of the Church had been shaken, had not acquiesced in the authority of a book; and philosophy commenced its search for other grounds of certainty; just as it commenced in Greece before ordinary men had begun consciously to disbelieve in paganism. But in neither instance had these first efforts any wide effect. The time was not ripe for Democritus; it was not ripe for Hobbes or Spinoza. In an age when the massive intellect of Cromwell was satisfied with Protestant Christianity, and hungry village congregations could demand a second hour from their preachers, philosophy might speculate in its closet, but it could not affect popular sentiment. The disintegrating forces, however, worked on below the surface. Puritanism and its ways went out of fashion. The austere virtues of the Commonwealth were followed by folly and dissipation, and free thought again raised its head. A new and enlightened generation turned with shame and penitence from a piety which sent wretched old women to the stake for crimes which had no existence save in the diseased brain of cowardly fanatics. Disbelief in any present exercise of supernatural power extended backward upon the past. The mythologies, the oracles, the auguries of the old world came to be regarded as dreams. The miracles of the medieval church were dismissed as forgery and illusion, and the cures still alleged to be worked at the shrines of Catholic saints were used as an argument, being admitted to be false, to show how these legendary stories had passed into belief. The Old and New Testament resisted longer the dissolving influence. They were protected by the enchantment which still surrounded the accredited records of revelation, and the history of the chosen people was looked on as exceptional and special. But a charm, however sacred, could not long repel the restless efforts of the speculative intellect. If miracles were so inherently improbable that we were entitled to reject without examination every alleged instance of contemporary supernatural interposition, on what ground could we draw a line so rigid between sacred and profane history? The lives of the saints were as full of marvels as the Book of Kings or the Acts of the Apostles; why were we to disbelieve every story which lent support to a religion which we did not like, while we insisted on the absolute truth of each single detail which we found in the Bible? Revelation, it was said, was itself a miracle; the divinely authenticated authority for a miraculous history. Such an answer was a tacit concession that a miracle could not be substantiated by human evidence. The spirit of Democritus had revived in Epicurus; the spirit of Hobbes revived in Hume. The Essay on Miracles threw into words a conviction which had been already formed in every logical mind in Europe. If the supernatural was to be admitted any longer, it must be received by faith; it could not be proved by reason. So far as philosophy had a word to say about the matter, the theological position had been taken by storm. Hume's arguments were desperately resisted, as it was natural that they should be. Ingenious attempts were made to recover the captured lines, but the conclusions demanded were too weighty for the premises. No human skill could make it probable on grounds of reason that while profane history was full of fiction and mistakes, every incident and every word should have been recorded exactly in sacred history. Such a history would be itself the greatest of miracles; and to assume a miraculous book was an act of faith, as Hume said, and it could be nothing else.

In the last century there were no penny newspapers carrying over the world the newest discoveries, with leading articles and criticisms addressed to the million. Philosophic writings had a small and select circulation, and the million continued to think as their fathers had thought. If we can believe Berkeley and Butler, however, their most accomplished lay contemporaries had ceased to believe in Christianity as completely as Pericles and Alcibiades had ceased to believe in Jupiter; and had the political condition of the world remained undisturbed, the doubt would have probably extended downward, and the state of opinion at which we have at present arrived might have been anticipated by half a century. But the growth of Liberalism on the Continent had been swifter than with us. The catastrophe of the French Revolution, with the enthronement of the Goddess of Reason, appeared as the visible fruit of infidelity. The English mind was terrified back out of its uncertainties, and determined, reason or no reason, that it would not have the Bible called in question. It was decided that Hume had been sufficiently answered by Lardner and Paley. The discussion was not to be reopened; and English middle life returned for nearly half a century to the fixed convictions of earlier times.

Behind the banner thus resolutely raised came an effort to restore the influence of religion on the heart and emotions. First, there was a prominent revival of evangelical piety. As the wave of spiritual feeling lost its force, it has been succeeded by superstition and by a less sincere and simple, but still ardent appeal to tradition and Catholic principles. The leaky vessel has not been repaired, for repairs were impossible, but the chinks and flaws in her planking have been tarred over and painted. Stained windows have gone back into the churches, and the white light which sufficed for the simple, truth-loving Protestants has been replaced by the enervating tints so dear to the devotional soul. Organs and choristers, altars and altar ornaments, fine clothes and processions, the mystery of the real presence, in the name of which more crimes have been perpetrated in Europe than can be laid to the charge of the bloody idol in Tauris—we have them even now among us in full activity. The religious mind has set itself with all its might to make things seem what they are not, and turn back the river of destiny to its sacred fountains.

In vain. Practical life has meanwhile gone its way. The principles of the once abhorred French Revolution have been adopted as the rule of political action, even in conservative England; and silently, without noise or opposition, we have taken Jeremy Bentham for our practical prophet, and have admitted as completely as was admitted by Augustus Cæsar, or Trajan, that civil government has no object beyond the material welfare of the people. The will of God has no more a place, even by courtesy, in our modern statutes. Political economy is the creed which governs the actions of public men; and political economy, by claiming to be an interpretation of a law of nature, dispenses with Providence, while it assumes as an axiom that the masses of men are, have been, and ever will be, influenced by nothing else than a consideration of material interest. Eccentric individuals, may have their generosities, their pieties, their tastes for art or science or amusement. Interest is the one constant commanding motive on which the practical statesman can rely. Respectable people fight against the unwelcome truth when it is thrust upon them inconveniently. They believe in political economy, and they believe that they believe in Christianity. Naïvely and unconsciously they betray their true convictions in the language which they habitually use. When the English Liturgy was written, "wealth" meant well-being. Well-being is now money. Ask what a man is worth, the answer is his rent-roll. Has he been fortunate? He has made a good speculation, or he has inherited a "legacy" when he did not expect it. Is the nation "prosperous"? Where should we look but to the rate of wages and the imports and exports? Are we in an age of progress? The income-tax decides. The standard of human value has become again what it was under the Cæsars, and which Christianity came into the world to declare that it was not. People continue to go to church. They continued then to go to the temples. They say their prayers in public or perhaps in private. So they did then. The clergy pray for rain or fine weather, and on great occasions, such as the potato blight, the archbishop issues a special form of petition for its removal. But the clergy and the archbishop are aware all the time that the evils which they pray against depend on natural causes, and that a prayer from a Christian minister will as little bring a change of weather as the incantation of a Caffre rain-maker. We keep to conventional forms, because none of us likes to acknowledge what we all know to be true; but we do not believe; we do not even believe that we believe, the bishops themselves no more than the rest of us; no more than the College of Augurs in Cato's time believed in the sacred chickens.

An energetic people are impatient of insincerity, and the convictions which we all act upon have at last found a voice precisely as convictions of an analogous kind found a voice in Lucretius. We have practically eliminated Providence from the administration of things. The Lucretian philosophy has revived again, reinforced by a vast accumulation of new knowledge, to tell us, as Lucretius did, that the universe can be accounted for without the hypothesis of a Providence. The theory of development, as it is called, does not deny the existence of God any more than Epicureanism denied it. It denies only that the phenomena require the existence of such a being to account for them. For a time, even after the authority of tradition was shaken, science seemed to be on the side of religion. The evidence of design in nature was urged, as it was urged by the Stoics, in proof of a designing mind; and as long as each species of plant and animal was believed to be distinct from every other, each one of them required a special act of creation to bring it into being. Both positions are now abandoned by advanced scientific thinkers. Lucretius' objections are again held to be fatal to "final causes." If the "omnia ex ovo" is not an acknowledged certainty, if we are not yet agreed that we are all descended from a jelly-fish, yet every naturalist of consequence is convinced that the phenomena of life are produced on constant and uniformly acting principles of law; that the history of the animal creation is a history of progressive growth, lower forms being succeeded by higher, as the fœtus in the womb develops into a man, without any sign of the action of any external energizing powers.

Moral and historical philosophy have modeled themselves on the same type. Moral philosophy, based on the necessities of society and general expediency, needs no God or voice of God in the conscience to explain its principles, while the admitted facts that the character of a man depends on his organic tendencies, affected by education and circumstances, have modified, in spite of us, our notions of free will and our definition of moral responsibility. In history, again, ingenious writers discover laws of evolution, causes operating through centuries, determining the characteristics of successive epochs, exhibiting individuals as the plaything of broad and general forces, and reducing still further the limits within which they can be the authors of their own actions. Unchanged in principle, the Lucretian interpretation of life and its conditions is passing swiftly into general acceptance. And now arises the serious question how far these notions will go, and how they will affect such spiritual belief as we still continue to hold? The theory of development may be held, and is held, by many persons who look forward to a life beyond the grave. Can this expectation any longer allege a rational ground for itself, or is it a plant which grew in another soil and lingers now as an exotic in a climate with which it has no natural affinity? Time will show; but meanwhile we may learn something from the history of the past. In the Rome of the empire, religion had less to say for itself than it has now, and science relatively had far greater advantage over it. The print which has been left by Christianity on the character of mankind is too deep to be effaced or disregarded. Yet, even in the Roman Empire, the sciences which mastered the intellect could not master the emotion, and there is an insight of emotion which the intellect cannot explain, but which, nevertheless, does and will exercise an influence which cannot be ignored; and there are virtues necessary to human society which will only grow when emotion is allowed to speak.

The educated Romans had satisfied themselves that there was no hereafter; that Tartarus was a dream, and that at death they faded into smoke. They could discourse eloquently on the good and the beautiful. They could enforce order by the policeman. They could develop useful arts. They could cultivate science and material progress. They could create the condition, in fact, which was so impressive to the mind of Gibbon. But morality, and purity, and charity, patriotism, enthusiasm, even art and poetry, withered under a creed which deprived life of its human interest and the imagination of every object which could kindle it. Very remarkably, even among statesmen like Celsus, who still held to the scientific formula of things, a belief in a future life and future retribution made its way once more against the wind into the position of an admitted truth. The better sort of men clung vaguely to the moral principles of religion; and when paganism was fairly dead, all that had been true in paganism, a belief in God, a belief that the world, after all, was not deserted by a moral government, that our earthly life is but the threshold of our true existence, all this revived in Christianity. Centuries passed before the transformation was complete, centuries of miserable retribution for the long pursuit of a godless, material prosperity. The civilized animals (for animals only they had proclaimed themselves to be) were awakened roughly from their dreams by the fierce inrush of the "Scourge of God" out of the northern forests.

Man's nature is the same as it always was. Science has much to teach us, but its message is not the last nor the highest. If we may infer the future from the past, a time will come when we shall cease to be dazzled with the thing which we call progress, when increasing "wealth" will cease to satisfy, nay, may be found incapable of being produced or preserved except when relegated to a secondary place, when the illusions which have strangled religion shall be burnt away and the immortal part of it restored to its rightful sovereignty. A long weary road may lie before us. Not easily will an inviolable atmosphere of reverence form again round spiritual faith to warn off the insolent intruder. Piety, reverence, humble adoration of the great Maker of the world, are in themselves so beautiful that religious faith might have remained forever behind that enchanted shield if imaginative devotion could have kept within bounds its wild demands upon the reason. Not till Catholics had piled superstition on superstition, not till Protestants had elaborated a speculative theology which conscience as well as intellect at length flung from it as incredible, did the angels which guarded the shrine fold their wings and fly. The garden of Eden is desecrated now by the trampling of controversy, and no ingenious reconciliations of religion and science, no rivers of casuistic holy water, can restore the ruined loveliness of traditionary faith. But the truth which is in religion will assert itself again as it asserted itself before. A society without God in the heart of it is not permitted to exist; and when once more a spiritual creed has established itself which men can act on in their lives, and believe with their whole souls, it is to be hoped that they will have grown wiser by experience, and will not again leave the most precious of their possessions to be ruined by the extravagances of exaggerating credulity.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

Nevertheless, as time went on, this gospel "of the kingdom" could not stand. After the death of Nero, who had cruelly persecuted the local Christians, dire destruction seemed to fall on the wicked city and empire. The Roman armies of Spain, of Gaul, of Italy, of Pannonia and Moesia, rushed into fierce conflict. Four successive emperors fell by the sword within two years; the provinces heard the din of civil war, and learnt that the capitol of Rome was burnt by the contending armies. The summary given by Tacitus, in the opening of his "Histories," shows how reasonable was the idea that the empire was falling, and that (as the Apocalypse represents) the vessels of divine wrath were being emptied upon "the beast," as, in imitation of Daniel, the empire was here called. Surely now at length Messiah was to come riding on a white horse (Rev. xix, 11); yet, alas! he came not; the bridal supper of the Lamb was still postponed. Quick upon these convulsions followed the destruction of Jerusalem. "Judgment began at the house of God," to use the words of Peter, and horrible sufferings fell on the whole population of Palestine; which, in Matthew, are described as "great tribulation, such as was not from the beginning of the world to this time; no, nor ever shall be." Now, at least, beyond a doubt, Messiah will come. Yes! Jesus was believed to have said (Matt. xiv, 29): "Immediately after the tribulation of these days shall the sun be darkened . . . and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." No pettifogging interpretation can obscure language so splendidly clear. The opening words must have been penned while the destruction of Palestine was being consummated. They certainly were not a divine prophecy, for they turned out false. Indeed, the writer makes Jesus say: "As the putting forth of fig-leaves shows that summer is nigh, so will this great tribulation denote that the coming of the Son of man is nigh, even at the doors. This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." The only alternative for us is that this annunciation in Matthew was a human speculation, probably excited by the horror of the times and the effort of Christians to stay their souls on divine support. Nevertheless, years passed and Christ did not come with his angels in the clouds of heaven; so when Luke edited the same prophecy he saw the wisdom of leaving out the word immediately (Luke xxi, 25); yet he left the infelicitous parable of the fig-tree and its interpretation, "This generation shall not pass," etc.

The broad fact, now specially pressed, may be briefly stated thus: "The original gospel taught the speedy return of Christ from heaven in visible glory and power, to establish a righteous rule over the earth." With Paul it was clearly an axiom. When he wishes to dissuade Christians from going to law with one another before heathen magistrates, what is his argument? "Know ye not that the saints shall judge the world? and if the world is judged by you, are ye unworthy to judge the smallest matters? Know ye not that we shall judge angels?"

This goes even beyond the mark. Still, in Paul, the topic never takes such a shape as to stimulate vulgar ambition. The same cannot be said of the doctrine ascribed to Jesus by Matthew. There (Matt. xix, 16–30), when a rich young man has declined to sell his possessions and give them to the poor, as a means of obtaining eternal life and treasure in heaven, Jesus moralizes over his failure; and Peter says: "Behold, we have left all and followed thee; what shall we have therefore?" Jesus replies, according to Matthew: "When the Son of man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Elsewhere Luke (xxii, 28–30) without the despicable question, what were they to get for their sacrifices to him, brings out the same promise: "Ye are they which have continued with me in my trials; and I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

No man of common sense ever used such plain prosaic language without expecting to be understood literally. To invent a spiritual interpretation of such words is against common sense. Whether Jesus did or did not utter them, is too hard a question for me to decide; but they never could have passed as his, in a book accounted sacred, unless a most vivid belief in a literal kingdom, with thrones for the chief saints and a royal eating-table, had possessed the collective Church. Some refer me to Luke xvii, 21, in proof that the kingdom which Jesus proclaimed was to be wholly *internal and spiritual, but (sad to say) through the intense prejudices and stupidity of his disciples they could not understand him; and he did but throw pearls before swine. But since, in the discourses put before us in the three gospels, this verse (representing the kingdom as internal and already come) is exceptional—indeed flatly opposed to numerous and signal texts—such a theory does but avow that the books as a whole are grossly erroneous and deserve no trust whatever; which not only brings out much the same conclusion as my own argument, but makes it more difficult than ever to learn from the New Testament what the true Jesus was, or taught. Paul, who indignantly denied the resurrection of the flesh, would certainly with it have rejected the idea of risen saints literally eating at the regal table; but we find him to urge literally that the saints were to judge the world; so in the Apocalypse, they are to sit with Christ on his throne, and to wear crowns, and be kings and priests, and reign on the earth. To give up this magnificent dream—for Christians believed it, whether or not Jesus had sanctioned it—this delicious expectation of a speedy and total overthrow of human misrule by the direct interference of miracle, was very difficult and painful; but at last the progress of time made it inevitable, in spite of the vast authority of the Apocalypse, as the writing of John the Apostle, who indeed, as the fourth gospel is interpreted, was the specially beloved disciple. The belief in "the millennium" lasted on with the vulgar and with some eminent Christians, after the most thoughtful and educated men of the Church had abandoned it and frowned upon the Apocalypse, just as did Luther. St. Jerome, who is called the most learned of the Fathers, pronounces "the millennium and the earthly rule of the Savior" to be a Jewish error; but he adds that by his disbelief fury will be excited against him in persons of importance. (cerno quantorum in me rabies concitanda sit).

Just in proportion as the Church lost its hold of this primitive gospel, which had kept in union, or at least in decorous amity, minds and doctrines so diverse as those of Paul, James, and John—divisions of opinion became more painful, and sects (which we render heresies) threatened to rend the Church asunder. Then came the earnest and anxious question: "What did the Master himself teach?" a question with which Paul seems never to have concerned himself. Numerous attempts had been made to scrape up reminiscences from hearers, or (probably enough) from the apostles themselves. A plentiful supply of partial accounts responded to the demand, and at length from these materials longer narratives were compiled. To believe four of them was made essential to piety; thus history was confounded with religion.

II.

To claim that we will accept these four accounts as divine writings on the authority of very fallible, indeed evidently unwise individuals, such as Justin and Irenæus, is what no learned clergyman will approve. A vague argument prevails, that the Church is wiser than any one man; and that though no scientific ecclesiastical examination of piously intended books, with the view of fixing an authoritative canon can be pretended, yet the final reception of some books and rejection of others by the good sense and sound feeling of the Christian multitude in the course of centuries, is a sufficient guarantee of those received; free from all suspicion of priestcraft and from all objection based on individual folly. There is certainly weight in this argument, so long as it is limited to deciding what books are edifying. The spiritual sentiment and prevalent moral soundness of the Church, it may well be believed, did on the whole reject the inferior and baser books, and accepted the superior; as it at length rejected the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas, but accepted the Epistles of Paul. But though piety is judged of by piety (for the spiritual man has an instinct for spirituality) this has nothing to do with questions of authenticity, of chronology, and of historical credibility, on which matters the most pious men may be as ignorant and as credulous as children. Nor is it possible to criticise the four gospels without seeing that the writers were utterly incompetent for the task of history and ignorant of its requirements. They are not even aware that when they attest marvelous events, the reader will need to be informed who is the writer, when and where he lived, and what are his sources of knowledge. This alone gives us the measure of their dangerous simplicity. They evidently calculate on unlimited and undiscriminating credulity in the reader. Just look at the first chapter of Matthew. It invests dreams with divine sanctity, and gives no hint when a dream is to be accounted folly, and when it is a divine revelation. No one, then any more than now, believed all dreams to be divine. It reports a dream which (it says) occurred to Joseph, before the birth of Jesus, as basis for believing in a physical miracle of cardinal importance. If a modern writer dealt with us in this style, he would meet only indignation and contempt. But we are brought up in the illusion that because the "sacred" writers were conscious of divine teaching, therefore they had a right to expect their simple word to be authoritative. On the contrary, the preface to the third gospel shows that that writer was not conscious of any supernatural teaching, but merely professed diligence in tracing the tales to their source. If they had meant to pretend to miraculously imparted information, it was their obvious duty to explain this clearly and fully, so as to enable us to judge whether it be our duty to submit and believe. But not once do they suggest that their knowledge of the events and of the speeches comes to them in superhuman channels. This idea is a mere fiction of other people, gratuitously ascribed to them for the convenience of theology.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

*The parables indeed in Matt. xiii, use the phrase kingdom of heaven apparently as equivalent to the external Church of early and late time. Whether this use of the phrase is from Jesus himself, I find very hard to judge. See also Matt. xxiii, 13, which cannot have been from Jesus.

It may interest American patentees and iron manufacturers to learn that Boussingault claims that France was the country where the peculiar properties imparted to pig-iron and steel by the addition of small quantities of chrome was first recognized. He asserts that the researches of Berthier in 1821 were so thorough that they anticipated all the results of any practical importance alleged to have been discovered and applied by investigators and inventors since that time. Boussingault himself finds from his own experiments that chrome without charcoal will not give iron the distinguishing characteristics of steel. The alloy with chrome alone is inelastic and cannot be tempered, but it presents other interesting features.

Mr. Pindar Again.

LEEDS, N. Y., July 3, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Once again I tax your patience with my endless inquiries in regard to the doubts and fears which assail me. In answer to my second letter you admit your Atheistic belief. You say you are willing to believe when you have had positive proofs of a supreme being—a God. You do not believe there is a God because you have not seen him, still you see every day the workings of the great omnipotence in the creation. You see the blade of grass spring up, grow to maturity, and die; you know it grows, because you see it in its different stages of existences. Man, with all his scientific knowledge, cannot combine the four elements and make this simple blade of grass; nor can man, of himself, generate life in any form—still we know life is generated without the aid of man. At some ancient period in the creation of our globe it must have been void of life, either animalistic or human. Now, nature can, with instruments to work with, produce life, I will admit; but please give me your idea of how the first animalistic life was produced on our globe without the aid of a supreme being. Nature herself must have had a beginning, and, if so, by whom or what was she designed? My limited knowledge has not led me to suppose nature was of Phœnixical origin.

Another question is, how can you explain the idea of heathen countries, that know nothing of Christianity or its teachings, worshiping idols, both material and imaginary? Does it not seem evident that a supreme instinct tells them there is a something to worship which their untutored minds cannot comprehend?

I hope, my dear sir, in answering my question regarding a supreme being called God, you will not use the Yankee style adopted by so many Atheists, of asking me who made God, for I tell you now, I do not know, and ask for information. Allow me to express my admiration for the fearless way in which you endeavor to answer all questions, whether from friend or foe, and do not for one moment think I have any the less respect for you because I take the opposite side in religious views, but quite the contrary, as I feel the highest regard for any man who will express his views openly, and not allow a false delicacy to prevent him from saying what he actually thinks and believes. I remain most respectfully yours, WM. H. PINDAR.

REPLY.—We appreciate our friend's fairness and candor, but we fear we may not be able to fully satisfy him on the God question. Probably two of the most difficult things to prove in the world, are, first, that there is a God, and second, that there is no God. The God question is one upon which people never will agree, but upon which they can enjoy the glorious privilege of believing as they think most reasonable. The truth is just here: Nobody knows there is a God and nobody knows there is none. All that can be done is to canvass the probabilities of the case and arrive at the most reasonable possible conclusion. One thing is pretty clear, the more ignorant man is and the less he knows about the wonderful powers and forces of the universe, the more he believes in gods and devils; while the more intelligent he becomes and the more he learns of nature's laws and capabilities, the less need he sees for gods of any kind. The savage worshiping stone and wooden idols does not prove the existence of a God, but rather his own ignorance and lack of reasoning power.

What our friend says about the blade of grass, its growth and decay, falls far short of proving the existence of a personal God. If every blade of grass and every leaf proves a God, an immense number of Gods are brought into existence about this time of year; and if they prove the existence of one God why not millions? Nature seems quite sufficient to cause a blade of grass to grow in the warm spring and summer, but a God would be needed to make it grow when the mercury is twenty degrees below zero.

The growth of vegetation is entirely a natural process, and takes place whenever conditions are favorable, whether a God is present or not. So long as the light and warmth of the sun, with a due amount of moisture, cause the grass to grow, it seems hardly worth while to call in the services of a God to ensure its being performed properly. It is useless to imagine a supernatural being to perform the functions that nature is fully equal to. Man in his primitive condition thought every operation of nature was the work of an invisible God, but as he has developed in intelligence he has learned to think better. Until the universe is inadequate to perform all that is done, it will be unnecessary to invoke the services of a God.

We do not believe that matter, or nature, or the universe, ever had a beginning. It is far more reasonable to our mind to believe that it ever existed in some form than to admit that it could ever come from nothing. There may have been a time when vegetable and animal life did not exist on our globe, but when the soil was formed from decomposed rocks, and rain and sunlight duly fell upon it, the fecundating and life-giving properties of nature were so great that life was the result. It was no more effort for nature to produce the first blade of grass than the second, or the second billionth. We believe nature is the sole author of all existing life, and that for nature or the universe there is not and never was an author.

If the universe, being so wonderful, must needs have had a creator or author, despite the prohibition our friend places upon us, so must his Supreme Being have had a creator or author, and he cannot get away from that conclusion. If it is easy for him to think that God ever existed, why not that the universe ever existed?

Our friend says he does "not know who made God." Let us tell him. It was man. Man has been engaged in the god-making business for many thousand years, and many of the jobs he has turned out in this line have done him very little credit. The first specimens of his handiwork in this way were extremely crude, but as the centuries passed by he improved upon his first efforts. Now he is making up God, depriving him of personality, and constituting him an essence, a principle, or kind of ever prevailing something or nothing that is just as much and just as little in one place as another. That kind of God is so near no God at all that many cannot see the difference. The trouble is, no two persons get up a God just exactly alike. Every one's god is a little different from everybody else's God, and with the advance of intelligence and reason the Gods get thinner and thinner until moonshine is a solid substance compared with them. We do not wish to be irreverent in our remarks, but simply state the facts.

We will repeat what we attempted to say in our last reply to Mr. Pindar, that we would cheerfully try to answer what further questions he might see fit to ask, but the types made us say know instead of answer. Wishing our friend good success in his search for increased light we remain his friend and sympathizer.

Cultured Misrepresentations.

The man of culture in his issue of the 4th inst., has a rather sensible article on "The Heywood Case," in which he makes some very just though hedging remarks, but it seems he could not let the opportunity pass without re-showing his enmity towards us. He uses this language: "Mr. Bennett has wavered, and shuffled, and shifted his ground so often that it is impossible to speak with any certainty concerning it. But his latest position seems to be that all National laws against obscene literature should be repealed and all State laws enforced." The cultured gentleman misses the truth about as widely in this case as in nearly every instance where he refers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, to its purposes and positions. It is unfortunate that it is so difficult for him to adhere to the truth, and among the objects of culture to which he attaches so much importance, it would seem that TRUTH is one of the most useful plants he can cultivate. He will doubtless find it quite as beneficial as the more showy plant of respectability, and far better as a governing principle. We recommend TRUTH to his especial consideration. It possesses a sterling merit that no amount of mere respectability can supply. Let us see how many untruths the cultured misrepresenter has made in the above brief quotation:

1. We have not "wavered." We have been firm and explicit in what we have had to say.

2. We have not "shuffled." Shuffling is not in our line.

3. We have not "shifted ground," but occupy the same ground we have occupied from the first.

4. It is possible "to speak with some certainty" as to the ground we occupy. We submit it to our readers whether we have not made ourselves fully understood upon this subject of Comstockism.

5. While we do not believe that it is any part of the business of the General Government to make or execute laws respecting obscenity, or any part of the duty of the Courts of the General Government to send persons to prison for real or fancied infractions of obscenity laws, whether just or unjust, we have not favored "the enforcement of all State laws." We defy the cultured gentleman to point out a sentence or phrase we have used that can be distorted to that effect. We have said that obscenity, when a crime, should be left with the States to punish, but we have not once said that all our State laws ought to be enforced.

The same miserable, unjust laws which Comstock and the Young Men's Christian Association intrigued and bulldozed through Congress, he caused by the same line of tactics to be placed upon the statutes of this State. It is made a crime punishable with long imprisonment to the extent of five or ten years at hard labor, and heavy fines to the amount of $5,000 or less, to print or publish anything that a Christian or bigoted court and jury may construe to be obscene or indecent; to give any information by way of a newspaper, circular, or pamphlet how a sickly or debilitated mother or wife may use any simple means to prevent an undue increase of family; and the selling of any instrument, however useful and meritorious in itself, and however simple it may be—like a syringe—if it is possible to be used for preventing conception or for any immoral purpose. In many respects the Comstock laws on our State statute books are wrong, and loose, and vague. While they prescribe the most severe penalties for obscenity, they do not define it in the least, but leave it with the informer, the judge, and jury to settle according to their own bigoted and narrow prejudices. We do not believe such laws wise or just, and we are not in favor of their enforcement. We think our grand juries regard them in a similar way. When Comstock arrested Mrs. Dr. Chase—though she had violated one of his execrable laws—and presented her to the Grand Jury, they would not listen to him, and refused to find a bill against the lady. When, some two weeks ago, she caused his arrest for false imprisonment and damages she had sustained from him, he became exceedingly indignant and declared he would cause her indictment. He went before another Grand Jury and told his story of how she had violated one of his laws, and they took no notice of him and utterly refused to entertain his charge. Thus the cultured editor can see how Comstockism has fallen in this market. It is almost impossible for Anthony—when he uses his utmost ability—to get a person indicted for a violation of one of his laws.

6. The high culturist says: "So far as the rights of free-thought and a free press are concerned, Mr. Bennett is thus very evidently and very grotesquely on the fence, affirming them and denying them at the same time." There are no less than three falsehoods in this quotation. We are not on the fence, grotesquely, or otherwise. We have taken decided ground from the first and steadily maintained it. We have not, at the same time, "affirmed and denied" the rights of free thought and a free press. Our enemy cannot show where we have done this.

The cultured man is well understood in his flings in his article of the previous week, about "decent journals," "virulent personalities," "ridiculous side issues," etc., etc. His animus, all along, has been very apparent. His great dislike and ill-will towards THE TRUTH SEEKER led him into a serious error, or a series of errors.

1. When we became convinced that Comstockism, backed as it is by the Young Men's Christian Association, was one of the greatest evils of our time, and felt a solemn duty to oppose it to the extent of our power, the cultured editor saw fit to oppose us and show us to be in fault. It is barely possible he has become convinced that he made a slight mistake.

2. He thought the petition had been drawn up by ourselves, and that he must attack it. The truth is, it was drawn very carefully by a gentleman of far more legal ability and quite as much brains as the cultured gentleman possesses.

3. He thought it would be very respectable to uphold Comstock and his style of doing his dirty work. He could not have committed a greater error. There is not, at the present time, a more unpopular man than Anthony Comstock. The cultured man's attempt to commit the Liberals of the country to his absurd pro-Comstock course was a most egregious blunder, and showed great lack of common perception and the ability necessary for leadership.

4. He thought that by crying out against the great wrong of signing the petition, he could arrest the good work—cause it to die still-born. He made a great mistake. Few petitions have been signed so largely and in so short a time. It was indeed a big success.

5. He thought he could make a good point to prove us guilty of forgery, adducing the same as a reason why the petition should not be signed. The attempt was a failure.

6. He thought he would make a good point by quoting the Rev. Mr. Eldridge and the Christian Union to show that Col. Ingersoll and the seventy thousand who signed the petition were either fools or knaves and aiders of obscenity. He could not have made a worse mistake. His fondness for Rev. Eldridge's foolish and unfriendly remarks induced him to quote them the second time. Is it not about time he gave them to his readers again?

7. On more than one occasion he has asserted that we are "indecent." Even in his last he takes some pains to show the difference between Heywood and ourselves, and says Heywood's position is the only self-consistent, brave, or respectable one. He will have it that we are not "respectable." We don't want the kind of respectability which he cherishes.

8. He has persistently contended that the seventy thousand persons who signed the petition were ignorant of what they were doing, and thereby committed themselves as defenders of obscenity. He could not have uttered a more malicious falsehood.

But we do not care to pursue the cultured gentlemen further, especially during this hot weather, nor to show up his queer vagaries or his mistaken notions of Liberal respectability. We are quite willing he shall maintain his views, however narrow they may be, and we will maintain ours. No one need be told that he entertains a positive hatred for THE TRUTH SEEKER—that has been made apparent to the most obtuse observer; but his bite is not dangerous; his fangs have been drawn, and his venom will do little harm save to fret himself. We would advise the fussy little man not to get unnecessarily excited; the weather is very warm, and his brain may not be able to stand an undue amount of heat and mental excitement. We would prescribe ice, rest, and a trip to the White Mountains. He fills a small, respectable niche that it is well to have filled, and it would be a pity to lose him for some time yet. We suggest that as an experiment he abstain from mentioning us for the next three months. We will assuredly let him alone if he will us. We felt so at first, we felt so after he unmercifully pitched into us, and we feel so still. We would say to the cultured man, Go thy way in peace. We would not harm thee, and only request that thou let us remain in quiet.

It must be confessed that, in some respects, the man is improving. His remarks about Mrs. Besant's and Heywood's cases indicate this improvement. It is not difficult to understand that he saw the mistake he made in taking ultra-Comstock ground, and that to retain a portion of the popularity he covets he must needs take a more sensible course. Hence his Heywood and Mrs. Besant articles. Could he have felt six months ago as he feels to-day, had his enmity for THE TRUTH SEEKER been far less, and had he had a far less amount of respectability "on the brain," it is quite presumable he would have taken a course far different from the one he has ill-advisedly pursued.

If he will say nothing untruthful about us, if he can give up his ignoble prejudices, and if he will be governed by the principle of honest justice, we think he will feel the better for it, and that he will find it preferable to all the respectability, Mrs. Grundyism, Comstockism, and fancy kid-glove culture in the world. But let the cultured man not forget rest and the White Mountains.

THE pledges for the Defense Fund come in some, but we would like to see the number augmented. We will soon publish the names of those who have sent in pledges. Shall we not have more names to add to the list?

What I Don't Believe—Resumed—No. 32.

277. I do not quite believe that the Supreme Deity of the universe resided in the ark or box about four feet long and thirty inches wide which was manufactured of Shittim wood by the children of Israel a few centuries before the establishment of a monarchy in Judea, any more than in any other locality. It is unlikely that he can be boxed up like goods and merchandise.

278. I do not credit the story connected with the removal of the ark from Shiloh by Hophni and Phineas, sons of Eli, that the Jews might be successful in their contests with the Philistines, notwithstanding which movement the Israelites were unsuccessful, thirty thousand of their footmen alone being slain and the two men, Phineas, and Hophni, put to death, and when, worst of all, the ark itself with its precious freight fell into the hands of the enemy.

279. A sad fatality indeed seemed connected with the ark on that occasion, for when a messenger went to impart to Eli, the father of the men Phineas and Hophni, the sad fate his sons had met, he immediately fell over and broke his neck and his daughter-in-law was taken in premature labor and brought forth her son Ichabod. The details of the story seem too extravagant to be true.

280. The continued details in reference to the ark have a very improbable air. The account about the Philistines taking it to the temple of their god Dagon, where it proved a very disturbing element, causing old Dagon to fall over on his face in the night, breaking off or cutting off his hands. It is, perhaps, not strange that the Philistines were glad to send the ark with its mysterious occupant to the town of Ashdod, where it again produced the most unfortunate results—a great destruction upon the inhabitants of the town, causing them to have emerods in their secret parts, etc. It is not to be wondered at that the people of that town were very glad to move the box to Gath, where the effects of its introduction were still worse, if possible, when they of that town were glad to move the same piece of furniture on to Ekron, where consternation and great destruction seemed at once to fall upon the people. Great numbers were said to be destroyed, and those not destroyed seriously smitten with those terrible emerods. It is hard to believe that one moderate sized box could produce such fearful results.

281. The manner which the people of Ekron took to rid themselves of the piece of cabinet ware was singular, if not improbable. After making some golden mice and golden emerods, and placing them in the ark to make some atonement for the indignity of having the box in their territory, they fastened two new milch cows to a new cart, and placed the ark upon it. The calves belonging to the cows were shut up at home, and the cows, without a driver, immediately started for Beth-Shemesh, lowing as they went. It is not strange that when the men working in the harvest fields hard by heard the lowing of the cows and saw the ark coming they were attracted to it and conceived the propriety of making a burnt offering in commemoration of the event.

282. The narrative says that they used the cart as fuel for the burnt offering, which would seem like a piece of extravagance when the country abounded in other fuel which could easily be obtained.

283. It is hard to believe that the burning of the cart and the cows' flesh should have such a maddening effect upon the God in the box that he slew fifty thousand and seventy men upon the spot, just because some one raised the lid of the box a little way to look in and see what was going on there. It would seem very improbable, too, that so many should be at work in one harvest field, or in one locality, so that over fifty thousand of them could be killed off, and leave enough to take care of the corpses. This must have been a typographical error, or a mistake of the original writer, or the copying scribe. I do not believe fifty thousand men were ever killed at one time from one harvest field.

284. If the story is true, I don't believe the act was just. The fifty thousand did not all offend by raising the lid of the ark. It is probable that one man only was quite sufficient to raise the lid, and then to kill fifty thousand and sixty-nine people for the offense committed by one man, would seem a very cruel piece of business indeed. Were our courts and tribunals to act upon that sort of justice the race would soon be exterminated. After this deadly slaughter, the terrible ark was prudently sent to Kirjath-jearim, and consigned to the care of one Abinadab and his son Eleazer, who was sanctified to attend to the mysterious piece of furniture.

285. Many years after the slaughter of the fifty thousand and seventy, and after David had supplanted Saul in the possession of the throne of Israel, the young king conceived the praiseworthy enterprise of moving the ark to his own city. For this purpose he raised a force of thirty thousand chosen men, quite enough, it would seem, to move so small a box. The ark was placed upon a new cart, and the cattle were driven by the sons of Abinadab, but it is possible they were not skillful drivers, or else the road was rough. In going over an uneven place, a well-disposed person named Uzzah, thinking the ark in danger of falling to the ground stretched forth his hand to save it from the mishap. But for his good intention his life was taken on the spot by the mysterious personage in the box. It was a summary proceeding, and I cannot think it was a kind God that was shut up in that ark.

286. It is probably not strange that the little occurrence was sufficient to deter David from taking the ark to his own city and to cause him to change the programme he had marked out, and, instead, to have the ark conveyed to the house of Obed-edom, the Gittite, where it remained three months.

287. By this time everything had become lovely, and then David was enabled to complete the moving of the ark to his own city without any more persons being angrily put to death. David was filled with great joy at the improved state of affairs, and gave way to a great degree of hilarity, sacrificing oxen, fatlings, dancing before the ark with all his might, and even in a state of nudity. His good humor was raised to such a pitch that he generously dealt out flesh, and bread, and wine to all in attendance. The entire story is a crude, improbable affair, and makes the deity which the Jews worshiped a regular monster of cruelty.

288. It is not altogether easy to believe the story of David's killing the giant Goliath with a sling, but as it does no particular harm to credit the story as being true, it may be passed over with a very few words.

289. It cannot easily be believed that the conduct of Amnon, the son of David, was at all proper when, under a plea of illness, for which his sister Tamar was ministering to him, he ravished her in the most sensual manner. It was a very unworthy piece of business in every sense of the word.

290. It is nearly as difficult to believe in the propriety of the conduct of Absalom, another of the sons of David, when he cohabited with his father's concubine upon the housetop and in sight of all the congregation. It would seem that the conduct of the sons of the man who was "after God's own heart" was no better—to say the least—than that of the sons of other men.

Not Pleasant.

We do not like to dun our patrons for what they owe us. We would scarcely ever do so were it not absolutely necessary. But we have to have money or our business must stop. It costs a good deal of money to publish a paper as large as this, and if those who are indebted to us will kindly remit the amount they will do us a special favor. Sums of fifty cents or one dollar will be thankfully received. This applies to new patrons as well as old ones. We will even take the price of the paper for one month—twenty-five cents—at a time. Any way to keep the good work in progress. Remember, we send THE TRUTH SEEKER to trial subscribers three months for fifty cents. Every person, too, who orders the "Champions of the Church," or other books we have for sale, helps us to bear our burdens.

WHAT will poor Abbot do now? He will have to "stand alone" worse yet. Even the N. Y. Tribune, one of the best friends and defenders of Comstock, turns against him at last. Wouldn't The Index man, so promptly ready to pick up any puff of the obscene agent out of any religious newspaper, do well to publish what the Tribune recently said of his favorite? Does he only want him modified, not repealed now?

THERE will be a free lecture at Republican Hall, 55 West 33d St., next Sunday evening, July 14th, by St. Eve, Miss C. Eva Preston. Below are the opinions of a few of those who have heard it.

"Had it come from some illustrious old divine it would be considered something remarkable."—Mr. Brown, Harlem.

"It is chuck full of good things."—Editor Waverly Enterprise.

ABBOT does not like Heywood's theories or his style of presenting them. It is very possible that Heywood does not altogether fancy Abbot's views and the way he presents them; but has not one the same right to express his sentiments that the other has? Should one be imprisoned for being true to his convictions any more than the other? There are many very respectable persons who think Abbot's opposition to Christian dogmas more immoral and more demoralizing to the young than any other form of immorality known. Does it follow, therefore, that he should be sent to prison? The true way to pursue is to allow every person to express his honest convictions, and allow all to read those expressions who wish to. No person is compelled to read The Index who does not wish to; and unless young people read it it cannot possibly do them any harm. So of The Word and "Cupid's Yokes;" those who wish to read them have a perfect right to do so, and none who do not read them will be injured by them in the least. Equal rights and privileges should be the motto of Liberals.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said:

"'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which in various respects had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplace of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."—F. W. NEWMAN, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review.

We see no reason for not indorsing the words of Strauss in his "The Old Faith and the New," as applicable to Mr. Greg and his unanswerable book "Creed of Christendom." They are: "I have never desired, nor do I now desire, to disturb the contentment nor the faith of any one. But when these are already shaken, I desire to point out the direction in which I believe a firmer soil is to be found."

"Mr. Greg is well known as one of the manliest thinkers and writers of the day. In these points he resembles Mr. Leslie Stephen, but his work breathes a more Christian spirit. Mr. Greg is a Christian, though not of the narrow school. He means this book as a defense of Christianity; and although he unsparingly exposes what he deems weak points connected with external evidences, he does so more in sorrow than in anger, and more in love than in sorrow."—Dundee Advertiser.

"MIRIAM'S HERITAGE" is the title of an excellent American story, of nearly two hundred pages, by Alma Calder, lately become the wife of our friend and patron, J. H. Johnston, of this city. Published by Harper Brothers. It is a story of the Delaware River, and is unique in many respects. The most noticeable feature about it is the quaint and doubtless accurate description of life in the lumber region. The writer must be familiar with the scenes described with such life-like effect. There is a thread of story running through it with a sufficient amount of tangles and love-knots. It will interest those fond of a good novel, and it certainly does great credit to the fair writer. Price 75 cents.

Mr. Heywood's Case.

MR. EDITOR: Accept my thanks for generously copying into THE TRUTH SEEKER the article from my pen to which you took exception, and to which you replied in your last issue at considerable length. I will not occupy space in any defense. The readers of your paper can judge for themselves as to the correctness of my position, and the value, justice, and relevancy of your criticisms.

Whatever in your opinion "consistency" demands, I am not among those who think Mr. Heywood's sentence is a just one, and that it served him right to send him to jail. On the contrary, I regard the conviction and imprisonment of Mr. Heywood as an outrage on justice and personal liberty. I am glad that petitions are in circulation asking for his release from imprisonment. Mr. Heywood is an earnest and sincere man, and all who know him give him credit for having advocated only what he believed proper and right. His pamphlet contains sentiments with which I have no sympathy, and is written in a style not to my taste, but it is not an obscene work, and probably never would have been so pronounced by the jury that convicted Mr. Heywood but for a narrow and absurd interpretation of the law by Judge Clark in his charge, an interpretation that would make it a punishable offense to send through the mails a copy of Shakspere or Byron, Homer or Virgil. The unjust sentence of Mr. Heywood illustrates the folly and evil of a law against obscenity without a clear and explicit definition of obscenity. Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

VINELAND, N. J., July 4, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: The other day while in New York I called upon Mrs. Dr. Chase and was sorry to find that her friends had fled. I will not waste time upon vain regrets at the slavery to Mrs. Grundy nor at the character of that old lady, excellent as she might be if we dared to be ourselves, but I do want to ask through your paper if some concert of action cannot be had among those few who dare uphold one in their plain path of duty.

Mrs. Chase has a work to do, and where is any one that can do her work better? She has the ability and the courage, a very rare combination.

That the work this good lady is doing is necessary work, was emphasized by a conversation I had with an elderly gentleman, a friend, whom I encountered in railway traveling yesterday. He had just buried a daughter, mother of four children in as many years, and was regretting the ignorance of husbands. I told him of Mrs. Chase's prosecution, the cause, etc. He was unusually severe, for a Quaker, in his denunciation of Comstock, and regretted that the medical profession had been so backward in taking hold of this subject.

Now, friend Bennett, can you not become trustee to receive some small loans to aid this lady in her most useful career. There are many of us who would be glad to help to the extent of our limited means, and I do not doubt of the complete success of Mrs. Chase if her mission be understood. Yours very truly, EGBERT HASARD.

REMARKS.—We second our friend's suggestion. We have occasion to know that owing to Comstock's attack upon Mrs. Chase her business has been greatly injured and her circumstances much embarrassed. If desirable, we will act as trustee to receive such small loans for the lady as may be consigned to us, and will see that she has every dollar so contributed for her benefit.—[ED. T. S.]

CHAPTER IV.

After these things the strife between the Nazareans and Judeans grew so great that it caused a division between them, and a Nazarean meeting a Judean would kill him.

The trouble increased more and more for thirty years, when the Nazareans, having increased to thousands and myriads, prohibited the Israelites from coming to the greater festivals in Jerusalem.

Then there was great distress among the Israelites, like what it was in the day when the [golden] calf was forged, so that no one knew what to do.

The pernicious religion increased and spread abroad, and there came forth twelve men (bad eggs of foul ravens), who wandered through twelve kingdoms and spread false doctrines among mankind.

Some of the Israelites followed them (for they were men of high authority and strengthened the religion of Jeshu) that they might get themselves hanged for apostles, and that the great body of the Israelites might follow them.

The wise men seeing this most atrocious thing bore it most grievously, for wickedness had sprung up among the Israelites. Therefore every one turning to his companion said, Woe unto us, what sins have we committed that in our time so shameful a thing should happen in Israel, such as neither we nor our ancestors ever before heard of?

Therefore with great sadness and weeping they sat down and with their eyes turned toward heaven said:

We pray thee, O Lord, God of heaven, to give us counsel what to do, for we are entirely ignorant as to what ought to be done. We lift our eyes to thee. In the midst of the people of Israel innocent blood is shed on account of this bastard and son of a separated woman. Wherefore are we stretched on tenter hooks while the hand of the Nazarean prevaileth against us and great numbers of us are killed? But few of us are left, and on account of sins in which the house of Israel is implicated these things have happened Do thou indeed for thy name's sake give us counsel what to do that we may be delivered from the wicked crowd of Nazareans.

When they had thus prayed, a certain man of advanced years from among the elders, whose name was Shimon Kepha [Simon Cephas] who frequented the Holy of Holies, said to the rest, My brethren and people, hear me: if ye approve my counsel I will root out these wicked men from the society of Israel, and they shall have no more any part or heritage with the Israelites. But it is necessary that we should incur the guilt of an offense.

All responded saying, We will take upon us the guilt, do thou render effective what thou hast proposed.

Therefore Shimon the son Kepha,* went into the sanctuary and wrote out the almighty name, and cut his flesh with a knife and placed it therein. Then going from the Temple he drew forth the writing, and when he had learned the name he went away to the chief city of the Nazareans † and raising his voice he cried out, Whosoever believeth in Jeshu let him come unto me, for I am sent by him.

Soon a great multitude drew near to him, as many as the sands of the sea, and said to him, Show us something to confirm to us that thou art sent by him.

And when he asked what sign they required of him, they replied The miracles which Jeshu when alive performed do thou also exhibit to us.

Therefore he commanded them to bring hither a leper; and when they had brought him, he laid his hand upon him and he was healed.

Again he asked them to bring to him a dead man, and when one was brought he laid his hand upon him and he revived and stood upon his feet.

The wicked men seeing this fell down to the ground before him, saying, Without doubt thou art sent by Jeshu, for when he was alive he did these things for us.

Shimon Kepha then said, I am sent by Jeshu, and he hath commanded me to come to you. Give me an oath that ye will do all things that I command. So at once they all exclaimed, We will do all that thou commandest.

Then Shimon Kepha said, Know ye that it was necessary that this enemy of the Israelites should have been hanged by law and according to the prophecy of Esaias, saying, Your new moons and appointed holidays my soul hateth.

Moreover, be it known to you, that he did not delight in the Israelites, even as Hosea prophesied, Ye are not my people. And although it be in his power to sweep them from the earth in one moment, nevertheless he did not wish to destroy them entirely, but desired that the survivors should keep forever in remembrance his hanging and stoning.

Moreover, he underwent those great sufferings and sorrows that he might redeem us from hell.

And now he exhorts and commands you not longer to ill-treat any of the Judeans; but if a Judean saith to a Nazarean, Go with me one mile, let him go with him two miles; and if a Judean striketh a Nazarean on his left cheek, let him turn to him the right also, that in this world they may have their reward, but in the future life may be punished in hell. If ye do these things, ye shall be worthy to live with him in his abode.

Lo this also he requireth of you, that ye do not celebrate the feast of the Passover, but that ye hold sacred the day on which he died; and that instead of the feast of Pentecost ye keep holy the fortieth day after the stoning, in which he ascended to heaven. Instead of the feast of tabernacles let the day of the nativity be made holy; and on the eighth day afterwards observe the memory of his circumcision.

All responded to these words, Whatsoever thou sayest we will do; remain with us now. To which he said, I will abide with you if ye will allow me to abstain from all meat according to his precept, and only take the bread of misery and the water of sorrow. But ye ought to build me a tower in the midst of the city on which I may sit even till the day of my death.

The people answered, We will help thee to keep thy vow. Therefore they built a tower and put him thereon; and every day they brought him his allowance of miserable bread and scanty water even up to the hour of his death, he staying there all the time.

For truly he served the God of our Fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and composed many good hymns which he published through all the region of Israel, that they might be a perpetual monument to him; and he communicated all the verses to his masters.

This Shimon lived on that tower for six years, and when he came to die he commanded that he should be buried within it; and that request they obeyed.

Afterwards they devised a most abominable fraud, and at this very time that tower is to be seen at Rome, and they call it Peter,* that is, the name of the stone, because he sat on a stone even to the day of his death.

After the death of Rabbi Shimon Kepha there arose a man named Elias, a wise man but of corrupt mind, who went to Rome and publicly said, Know ye that Shimon Kepha hath deceived you, for your Jeshu gave to me his commands saying, Go and tell them. Let no one believe that I despised the Law; for whoever wishes to be initiated by circumcision I will allow him; but he who refuses to observe this, let him be plunged in foul water; nor indeed if he abstains from this shall he incur danger.

This also he requireth; that not on the seventh day but the first on which the heaven and the earth were created ye shall worship. And he added many other bad instructions.

But the people said, Confirm to us by a miracle that Jeshu hath sent thee. And he said, What miracle do ye expect? Scarcely had he spoken when a stone fell from a huge wall and crushed his head.

So perish all thine enemies, O Lord; but let those who love thee be even as the sun when it shineth in its strength.

Finis, finis, finis.

SCHOLASTICUS.

* Shimon Kepha and Shimon Bar (the son of) Kepha are undoubtedly the same in this story. And here a suspicion arises that Paul was contemporary with the elder Kepha. In 2 Cor. xi, 32 he says, "In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me." History records but one king Aretas who governed Damascus, and he was contemporary with Alexander Janneus, who died about 79 B.C. Commentators are compelled to guess that an Arabian king Aretas may have governed Damascus at the date of Paul's conversion according to the book of Acts, which contains the only data whereby they fix the period of Paul's ministry. But the book of acts has been abundantly proved to be a fiction, gotten up in the second century. Its statements about Paul are altogether contradictory to his Epistles, and cannot be reconciled therewith. The genuine writings of Paul fit as well a century B.C. as the date commonly assigned to them. His Christ was not the Christ of the Gospels, nor did he know any Peter, but Kepha (Cephas) whose Aramaic name, meaning "rock," was translated into Petros long after his time, in order that the Romish Church might have a "rock" for its foundation.

† What city was this? In Mrs. Blavatsky's profound work "Isis Unveiled" it is called Babylon, apparently quoting from this same Toldoth Jeshu—perhaps another version. Babylon was a greater Hebrew center than Jerusalem, and the Babylonian Talmud far exceeds in volume the Jerusalem Talmud.

* Petra and Petros in Greek mean the same as Keph in Hebrew and Kepha in Chaldee and Syriac, namely, a rock or stone. Keph is a rare word, occurring only twice in the Hebrew Bible (Job xxx, 6; Jer. iv, 29). The first Epistle of Kepha, translated Petros in the Greek version of the New Testament, seems to have been written from Babylon (v. 3.) which commentators have vainly sought to metamorphose into Rome. There is no possible clue to the date of the epistle. Its theology is Pauline and it may have been written more than a century earlier than the date assigned to it by the churchmen. Nor is so early a date at all incompatible with the frequent use of the name Jesus Christ; for the Septuagint had rendered that name familiar to all Greek speaking Jews more than 200 years B.C. Iesoces was the Greek for Joshua or Jehoshua, which meant Savior; and Christos was the Greek for Mashiach meaning anointed, a word of frequent occurrence in the Old Testament. A real or pretended Savior would therefore be called in Greek Jesous and in Hebrew Jehoshua (the name of our Jeshu before he was outlawed by the Sanhedrim); and his royal title must needs be in Hebrew Mashiach and in Greek Christos.

Dr. J. M. Peebles.

THE DISTINGUISHED LECTURER AND TRAVELER TO BE PRESENT AT THE WATKINS CONVENTION.

FRIEND BENNETT: Everybody will be pleased to learn that Dr. Peebles is to be with us at Watkins. Here is his letter accepting the invitation to attend:

HAMMONTON, N. J., July 1, 1878.

H L. GREEN, ESQ., COR. SEC., Dear Sir: Your favor inviting me to attend the great "Freethinkers' Convention," to be held in Watkins during August, was duly received, and, after mature deliberation, I have concluded to be present.

You must certainly know that I am a Spiritualist, and yet, at the same time, I am a Freethinker. I would as soon allow others to chew my food for me as to think or reason for me. The teachings of all Bibles, of all seers, and of all spirits, whether in the body or out, must be summoned to the bar of reason, and weighed by our best judgment. During my two voyages around the world, I witnessed spiritual manifestations among the Bokmans of China and Ceylon. These marvels, no longer local, but cosmopolitan, are not supernatural, but natural to the psychological and spiritual planes of existence.

I hope and trust that this Freethinkers' Convention may tend to promote such concert of feeling and action among all shades of Liberalists, as shall hasten the downfall of superstition and the upbuilding of the temple of divine truth. Respectfully yours, J. M. PEEBLES.

P. S.—To save correspondence, allow me to add that "Glen Park Hotel" at Watkins has reduced board to those attending the Convention to two dollars, and the "Cottage Home," kept by Mrs. H. Gaston, to one dollar. Both very good hotels. Other hotels will keep visitors at reduced rates.

A Special Pleader and the Response.

The following letter from the Rev. F. Courtney of St. Thomas' church to The Tribune in favor of Anthony Comstock and his plan of doing business by decoy letters and false pretenses shows the kind of tactics that the clergy of this city and the country are ready to support. The reply of The Tribune is a noble one, and does that paper great credit.

THE SUPPRESSION OF VICE.

To the Editor of The Tribune, SIR: I am sorry to see the line taken by The Tribune, in an article in to-day's issue, respecting the methods sometimes pursued by Mr. Comstock in order to obtain evidence against parties whom he suspects of transgressing the laws of the State for the preservation of morals. As far as the law itself is concerned, he is completely vindicated by the decisions which are quoted in the article in question, and it would surely be the better course for such a journal as The Tribune to advocate an alteration of the law which allows such precedure, than while acknowledging its lawfulness to weaken the moral support accorded to one who is compelled to resort to such a method. I say "compelled," because the necessary evidence, in these cases, could not otherwise be obtained.

Let the public look at the facts. There are persons engaged in immoral traffic, who use the public newspapers to draw attention by means of advertisements so worded as not to reveal the character of the advertisers (except to those who, like Mr. Comstock, have become experts at detecting such things), trusting to the curiosity of the general public in the first instance to reply to them, and then to the animal passions presently to be excited to bring them a very remunerative correspondence. Such an advertisement being seen by Mr. Comstock, he causes the advertiser to be written to, and on his receiving immoral matter through the mails, he prosecutes the offender for a breach of the law. What other course is to be pursued? Is the society to instruct its agent to wait until some boy or girl has been ruined for life by these inhuman monsters before he attempts to have them stopped in their accursed traffic? And then, are the parents of such boy or girl to be dragged into open court to declare such ruin to the world? Mr. Comstock does not beguile the immoral trafficker into his disgusting business, and then prosecute him for pursuing it; but he suspects a person of being so engaged, and answers his advertisement, thereby procuring legal proof of the correctness of his suspicion, and the court afterwards approves both his suspicion and the mode of proving it fact by punishing the offender and ordering his material to be destroyed.

I have touched upon only one phase of this matter; there are many, each nasty, disgusting, immoral, and outraging private decency and public morals; but the public has to face these things: First, there are people engaged in various ways in promoting vice, and they solicit patronage from children, youth, unmarried, and married people. Second, there is a society organized for the express purpose of stopping this business by prosecuting those whom they can prove to be engaged in it, and thereby protecting public morality. Third, this society employs an agent, Mr. Anthony Comstock, who submits his cases to high legal authority before entering upon any prosecution, and has also the approval of the committee before bringing an accusation. Fourth, in the cases animadverted upon in your article, no other method than that adopted by Mr. Comstock would result in the procuring of the necessary evidence, which means that because you do not approve of the said method, therefore these people, who are notoriously engaged in breaking the law and ruining the morals of the citizens and defiling the purity of our homes, are to be allowed to go on with their abominable work. It is time, sir, that every honest citizen of the United States, every good man who desires the prosperity of his country, every Christian minister, every new-comer who wishes well to America, should give both this society and its agent, Mr. Comstock, the moral support of his name, and his outspoken and generous sympathy; and therefore I beg of you to publish this letter, and to allow me to subscribe myself your obedient servant.

F. COURTNEY.

St. Thomas's Church, New York, June 24, 1878.

[There can be no question of the excellent intentions of the Rev. Mr. Courtney and the gentleman for whom he speaks. He is mistaken, however, in fancying that it is The Tribune which weakens the moral support of Mr. Comstock. The Tribune has gone to great lengths to sustain Mr. Comstock, and has done it, too, at times when he had very little help from other quarters. Mr. Comstock himself, and gentlemen like Mr. Courtney who back him up in ill-advised steps, are the persons who have weakened his support. A significant evidence of that weakening was to be found in the refusal of a recent Grand Jury to bring an indictment in a case where Mr. Comstock had loudly boasted of his possession of absolute evidence. That case, by the way, illustrates much better than any of those Mr. Courtney has suggested the real pith of the objections to Mr. Comstock's methods. He found a woman with good medical education, and, so far as the public knew, of fair standing in the profession, whom he suspected of a willingness to do illegal acts. Thereupon he represented himself to her as a person in need of the illegal aid he fancied her willing to give, and finally induced her to make what he called the illegal sale. Then he had her arrested and subjected to infinite scandal, and, as the end of it all, was turned out of the Grand Jury as having no case, while it is now said his victim is about to prosecute him for libel. Mr. Courtney mistakes the moral sentiment of this community, or of any reputable community, if he supposes that it approves of such procedures.—Editor Tribune].

From the Speling Reformer for May.

Speling Reform.

REFORMASHON, NOT REVOLUSHON.

In seeking tu establish a reform, all clasez ov peepl ar entitld tu just considerashon, and we think it may be questioned whether the rits ov the milionz ov English speeking peepl, hoo, with infinit labor, hav acquired the ability tu reed the comon print freely, hav bin sufishently considerd by fonetishanz. Theez personz far outnumber the forinerz and children hoo ar lerning English, for hooz benefit alone the prezent edūcated clasez ar askt tu lern a new and strānge lūking riten and printed langūage. It wūl seem ōnly fair, that while fonetishanz ar seeking tu lesen the labōrz ov the minority in lerning tu reed and rite, the claimz ov the majority tu an eezily red print and script shūd not be ōverlūkt.

Eny alfabet compozed largely ov new leterz prodūsez a print which is un-English in appeerans, dificult tu reed, and repulsiv to all clasez exept tu filolojists, hooz daily studyz leed them tu feel at home amid the mōst grotesk representashonz ov spōken langūage. Hence the sērius efurts that hav bin made ov late yeerz, bōth in England and America, not tu revolushonize English speling by the introducshon ov new leterz, but tu reform it by employing simply those leterz which ar now in use.

The Anglo-American method ov revized speling differz from uther scemez, in that after tāking a fonetic bāsis it haz espeshal referens tu prezerving a strong resemblans tu the comon print and script. This iz an esenshal condishon tu sucses. The new speling must be acsepted and uzed by teecherz and personz ov culture jeneraly, and by the press tu sum extent, before the comon peepl wil consent that it shal be taut tu thair children in scools; and in order tu make th new speling aceptable tu thoze hoo now reed and rite with fasility, the diferens between the fonetic and ordinary print and script must be redūst tu the smallest posibl degree.

Dr. Temple, Bishop ov Exeter, Eng., formerly Hed Master ov the fāmus boyz scool at Rugby, sez: "A sosiety must be formd ov edūcated peepl, hoo wil plege themselvz, both in rīting and printing, tu discard the prezent sistem. The succes ov such a sosiety wūd grately depend on thair mākıng the minimum ov change. Ther aut tu be no new caracterz and ōnly the introducshon ov a few iacritical marks." The same opinions hav bin exprest by a large number ov teecherz and riterz in America as wel as England. Mr. Arthur Gilman, in the Atlantic Munthly for Februery, iz very explisit on this point; and ēqualy so ar Profesorz Brumell, Vail, and Goodwin in their publisht statements.

But, in constructing a fonetic alfabet without new leterz, ther ar several things tu be garded agenst. Ferst, the employment ov too meny markt leterz, which giv a spoted appeerans tu the printed page, besidez grately increesing the lābor ov script. It is hard wurk tu get all the i'z crost and i'z doted in comon rīting, at prezent, and therfore the use ov addishonal markt leterz shūd be redūst tu a minimum; for it iz reely preferable tu rite an added leter than tu go bak and make a diacritical mark. And yet, secondly, the use ov too meny vowel diagrafs iz tu be ovoided. They ar objecsh nabl becauz thay ad tu the length ov meny wurdz; az, labor, which iz increest by an addishonal leter tu laibor, being tu beeing, lion tu lieon, focus tu fœcus, duly tu dively.

Tu produce sufishent harmony between the fonetic and comon print, it will be found needful that, at leest during a transizion period, equivalents and modifying leterz shūd be allowed tu reprezent, in sum casez, th markt leterz which primarily denote the long vowel soundz, and also for sum consonants. Theze digrafs and alternativ leterz, being used under rule, the labor ov lerning tu reed and ēven tu spel wil be but a trifl az compared with the prezent "no rule" sistem, tho the extreme simplisity ov a strictly fonetic and singl leter alfabet iz departed from. In the reprezentashon ov homonimz also, which meny think it best tu prezerve tu some extent, the equivalent leterz wil serve a gūd purpus.

The folōing rulez, subject to revizion az thay may be found faulty, wil enābl the rīter or compozitor tu uze the Anglo-American Alfabet freely and consistently. The small figurez, intersperst throo the alfabet abuv, refer tu the rulez.

1. ä—a, before r not folōd by a vowel, takes the sound ov ä, and need not be markt.
2. ä—a, when final, soundz like shortened ä.
3. â—Before r not folōd by a vowel, o has the sound ov â.
4. ll—ll modifiez a prēseeding a, making it â.
5. aw—aw iz retained before aded silablz.
6. qu.—qu iz the equivalent ov cw.
7. k—k iz uzed when its sound occurz before ē, e, ī, i; âlso at the end ov monosilablz, and iz retained before a sufix.
8. e—e reprezents the natūral vowel u before r, in wurds in which that sound iz now denoted by e, i or y, az "mercy. sir, myrrh;" while u iz employd in wurdz whare the same sound iz now denōted by o or u, az "word, curb."
9. y—Final y iz retaind before all suffixes; but y chānjez tu ie before an aded consonant; az "deny, denies, denied."
10. n—n natūraly takes the sound ov ng before k in the same silabl.
11. ō—Except in "to," no short vowel soundz terminate wurdz, but i and a sounding short â; therfore unmarkt e, o, u, when uzed in ending wurdz, wil denote thair respectiv long soundz.
12. o—Unacsented ŏ, which iz a short sound, can be denōted by o.
13. ce, ge—The use ov ce and ge for s and j shūd be restricted tu thoze soundz when final, unles the aded silabl beginz with a consonant.
14. ù—"To"= , occurring so frequently, may be riten without the mark over u, az âlso the aded silabl "ful."
15. y—In ion az in sum uther cāsez, the proper sound carez for itself.
16. zh—Before ū and i, z becumz zh.

GENERAL RULEZ.—Unmarkt singl vowel leterz denote short soundz. For the long soundz it iz best tu uze the markt leterz whenever the equivalent dīgraf wūl lengthen the wurd, and when the mute e, which lengthenz the sound ov the unmarkt caracter, becumz vōcal by an aded leter; az "bite, biter." The representashon ov an obscure or doutful sound is, for the prezent, best left unchānged from the common speling. A few wurdz are riten exepshonaly, az "off, thou, ōn," becauz utherwize thay sudjest a rong wurd tu the non-fonetic reeder.

In the Anglo-American print, wurds ar speld by sound, and useles leterz ar omited, az propozed in every fonetic skēme; but a leter which servz tu modify anuther leter under a serten rule iz not considerd useles, tho it may be deemed silent. Thus the final e modifiez a prēseeding unmarkt vowel by māking it denote its long sound; it prezervz the fūzūal appeerans ov the wurd and savez the riting ov the diacritic mark.

From our English Correspondent.

BRECON, WALES. June 17, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I left the land of liberty on the 27th of April on the steamer Spain, and after a wet and somewhat rough trip we landed at Liverpool on the morning of the 8th of May. I proceeded to my native city on the 9th. I found the season extremely wet and cold, yet the country was looking fresh and green everywhere. My first surprise was the extreme dearness of all edibles when compared with American prices, and I subsequently found this was the case all over the country. Again, I found it utterly impossible to find or buy any poultry, even in the largest cities except in the first-class hotels, restaurants, or coffee-shops, and in many cities and towns in the hotels only, and at that, very scarce and very dear. Respectable lodgings also very dear, and hard to be found except in principal hotels. In fact, go where you will, you find everything scarce and dear.

But as regards railroad and steamboat travel, they are simply disgraceful and disgusting to any one's feelings who has had that exquisite privilege of traveling much in the free, social, and enlightened land of America. The wretched English railway cars open from the sides into small, miserable, dirty pig-pens, each cross car seat holding five persons, ten in each compartment, and twenty if necessary. These pens are four feet wide, seats wood, and generally without any covering, and you sit opposite each other, knees between opposite thighs, and no one cares where smoking is. The first and second-class compartments just the same, only have the seats covered with plain "leather cloth." Steamboats differ but very slightly. I might add that on the railways no provisions at all are made to provide passengers with water, fire, or private accommodation, regardless of all sickness or distance. I find that in all cities and towns throughout England and Wales, so far, there is very great want of work and food. Tens of thousands are suffering dreadful hardships in spite of the great inducements offered to army volunteers. The habits and morals of the working-classes are really contemptuously vulgar and ignorant, and of a very sordid, dirty type. Please don't call me an Englishman. I'm American! Except Messrs. Huxley, Tindall, Darwin, and their sample philosophers, poor England is clearly two centuries behind America. It is most contemptibly and completely overrun by the blasted mythology supporting royalty and monarchy at the point of the bayonet. It is indeed engroaning and enslaving all mental growth and social enlightenment.

In continuation, I must say the "great London" to me is detestable. It is built with the most reckless disregard of system and order. The roads, alleys, lanes, courts, etc., (for streets are very rarely known) run every conceivable, tortuous way—the names of the same only to be found with a Directory, which is quite as scarce, as it costs £3, about $15. The very odd-shaped, irregular buildings are composed of a very unwelcome, disagreeable, dark material, impressing one with gloom. Streets very generally narrow, and paved with block-stone, not so good as on Broadway. Horse cars (tramways) very, very rare; only two lines in London. Their place is supplied by 'busses, hansoms, and the nasty, dirty, underground city railways, dark and suffocating as you ride in their miserable pigeon boxes. In London, a stranger must ask his way every block. And as to Hyde, Kensington, Green, St. James, and Regent's Parks, they bear no parallel to Central, Fairmount, etc., in America, and are really unworthy of being denominated "public parks," as there is no attempt made to invite or receive the public, barring royalty and aristocracy, surrounded by glittering helmets and shining breastplates (armor). There are very rarely any seats, except thousands of chairs, which are two and four cents each, seated so as to view liveried monarchy driving around the parks. In no one instance is there a house, summer arbor, recreation-place, or any attempt to welcome the poor or shelter them from the rainy climate; but if you can't pay for a chair, you must keep constantly walking. To spare your valuable space, let me briefly say, all railway (tramway), 'buss, and hansom drivers and conductors must buy a yearly royalty (license) before they can obtain work, and you must pay restaurant waiters, as they are licensed also, and charge you from two to six cents a meal to wait upon you; while you must pay from two to six cents for a theatre programme, and from two to twenty-four cents for a railway time-table with little or no information. Any one coming to London should be provided with Harper's illustrated map if they want to find their next door neighbor.

Yours fraternally, EDWARD C. SWAN.

Letter from and Letters to E. H. Heywood.

CELL 52 THE JAIL, DEDHAM, MASS., July 2, 1878

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Herewith I send you two messages—one from E. L Hammond, an old Abolitionist in whose family I staid when, twenty years ago next October, with Wm. Lloyd Garrison, I went on my first anti-slavery lecturing trip in western Massachusetts, and one from John Orvis the old time Brook Farmer and life-long Socialist who knows my labor reform work during the last fifteen years.

E. H. HEYWOOD.

FLORENCE, MASS., June 27 1878.

Friend E. H Heywood: Yesterday's Springfield Republican brought the news that you were in Dedham Jail, and it seemed rather glad it was so, "because you was a bad man, any way" I said to myself, What is the matter now, that a man free from rum and tobacco should be in prison, perhaps to preach to the "spirits" there? A book is it? and what of the book? of what material is it made? what matter does it contain so explosive that a judge in old Massachusetts is afraid of it? Please drop me a line or two in reference thereto. Tell me where the thing can be found that should so alarm the dignity of the old commonwealth. It is true I have not traveled your road, and therefore do not know just what you have been guilty of, but I have seen you loom up once in a while, colors all flying in the breeze as if all was right. Is there any newspaper report of your trial? An old Abolitionist in jail is too bad unless for a principle, and then it is good, for it sets the world talking as of old. The jail in Dedham is a good pulpit, so let it slide, let it slide. Justice is the cardinal virtue of the greatest being I have any conception of. I do not think you are a very bad man, when Ewren Wright says it is not so. Now if you were a tobacco user or a rum user, I would be indifferent and expect that Judge Clifford had made out a case, but believing your life to be pure, I hope all well; and no doubt it is for the best that you are where you can do the most good. I do not know what your ism is. That I know you to be a friend to humanity is true, as far as my knowledge goes. Let the echoes be heard among the hills. E. L. HAMMOND.

JAMAICA PLAIN, June 29, 1878.

My Dear Mr. Heywood: One of the saddest days of my life, in a personal sense, was that of last Tuesday when I stood in the United States Court-room and listened to the atrocious sentence pronounced against you in the name of morals and of law, and when I bade you good-bye in the Marshal's office. The world all that day seemed a mockery; life a horrible mirage, full of tantalizing forms of liberty, hope, and ideal purification, which the evil genius uses to entice earnest and inspired souls into desert wastes, pitfalls, and traps. It seemed to me, all that day, as if liberty and light—the sun himself—had quit this outer world and gone with you into that felon's cell. So be it then; so it has ever been. A wicked world puts out the light of life and walks thereafter in the shade of death. Henceforth your dungeon will be the sun of liberty and truth for all honest men and women until the hinges of your accursed prison-doors melt under the indignation of outraged law and you come forth again in freedom and in honor.

I had never seen or read your book, which is pronounced obscene by the United States Judges, until the day you were sentenced. Josie gave me a copy at Mrs. Kendrick's. That afternoon I read it, and with every sentence my surprise grew more intense to think any lady could see obscenity in the book. Every page, and almost every line, glows with religious earnestness to save men and women from self-abuse, and from abuse by one another and by society.

But the truth is, you were not condemned because anybody believes your book obscene. It is made the pretext for silencing you in other matters dearer to the oppressing class than social purity—their privilege to rob by forms of extortion now respectable, but which if you were free would soon be made as odious as piracy or chattel slavery. This is apparent to day, and will become more and more so.

The Boston Transcript of June 27th gave clear evidence of that. I cut out the slip intending to send it with this letter, but it has got lost somehow, which I regret. The pith of it was this, that if your friends hoped to make your case a martyrdom, they were welcome to try their best—that while you might assail the rights of property and attempt to arouse the outcasts of society against social order, you would find there are pure laws against obscenity. In my view, the worst feature of the case is the influence of the property class against you from the labor point of view. Who may be the next victim we cannot now see, but you are not the last. The conflict thickens, but woe unto them who begin it and who abuse the right under forms of law.

Faithfully, JOHN ORVIS.

The following letter to Mr. Heywood is from a distinguished and well-known Boston Liberal lady.

329 TREMONT ST., BOSTON, MASS., July 1, 1878.

MY DEAR FRIEND: I have not written you because I knew that you had suffered no dearth in this regard and was not likely to in the first days of excitement, and that my letters would come in better when everything had settled down into comparative tranquillity. I have taken Proudhon's picture out of its frame over the mantlepiece and put your picture in its place with the motto in illuminated text, "Knowledge is power," above it. From that eminence you look serenely down upon friends loyal to their heart's core, whose every effort is consecrated to your service and to that of free speech and free press. On Sunday evening I told my audience that I had resolved henceforth to "know nothing but E. H. Heywood and him unjustly imprisoned," till we had effected his release. The sentiment was loudly cheered. You will see that a good beginning has been made toward the Faneuil Hall meeting.

I expect to see you next week if not before, as I desire to see for myself what can be done to add to your personal comfort. Meanwhile believe me utterly devoted heart and brain to the cause for which you suffer. John Brown sanctified the gallows, you have made imprisonment respectable. Our rooms are regarded as the "Heywood headquarters," all interested coming here for news. Albert desires to be cordially remembered to all, and we hope to be sometimes thought of. If there is anything that you specially desire that is in our power to procure for you, please name it and we will see that you have it. I enclose extract from The Investigator concerning yesterday's meeting, etc. Moses Hull has written me concerning you, and is all aglow with indignation. You will hear from him shortly. I am very busy and can only add that Kitty sends her love and a kiss to Mrs. Heywood. Yours always, LAURA KENDRICK.

Letters from Friends.

AN ORTHODOX GROAN.

"The moral sentiment of this city closes the saloons because it is wrong to tempt men with liquor, and it turns out in masses to hear the sacred teachings of Christianity repudiated and ridiculed by a confessed Infidel.—The Ottawa Republican, Ottawa, Kansas.

The Liberal Club of Ottawa, engaged the services of W. F. Jamieson to give a course of five lectures. Some of the clergy advised their people to keep away from such lectures. Opprobious names were hurled from the pulpit at the Infidel. But in spite of warning, the people flocked to hear. Hence the groans of the pious, which The Republican echoes.

In another column was the following: "The 'Liberal' lecturer, Prof. Jamieson, who is, of course, nothing else than an Infidel, has been drawing crowds. Forest Park, last Sunday, was attended by hundreds to hear him. He is a very pleasant speaker; is eloquent, logical, interesting—but we object to his lectures. Such views as his ought not to be permitted public expression. We will not undertake to say whether or not his theories are correct—possibly his doctrines may have logical support—but all the same they should not be preached. They are simply calculated to break down all reverence for things holy, and to loosen the restraining holds with which Christianity checks our waywardness."—Republican, June 27.

In the same number is a notice of the lecture of T. De Witt Talmage, the great Brooklyn divine, who was largely advertised to speak the following Monday evening:

"Two hundred people, out of a population of four thousand, turned out to hear one of the brightest, wittiest, most enchanting speakers of the whole country!"

And Rev. Talmage is orthodox to the core. If the clergy were more generous in according Infidels a hearing, they might receive a larger hearing themselves.

W. F. JAMIESON.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM A DAMPHOOL.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: So you regret the controversy with The Index, do you? I don't, then; but I very well know who does, and that is Comstock. If ever a bad man received a thorough ventilation before the public, he is the man, and the "petition" discussion has helped to do it most effectually. Each from his own standpoint, and both together; where your bold TRUTH SEEKER sheet has been denied a hearing, the more truckling Index has been hailed and devoured by the weak-kneed and doubting as a champion against the foe, till they are beginning to find themselves "damned with faint praise" to their eternal overthrow. To-day Comstock can't tell who has hurt him the most, you or Abbot. You have been most direct, pointed, severe, but your paper has been read by persons who already knew of his villainies. Abbot, with his cultured milk and water apologies, or rather semi-apologies for Comstock, has circulated among those who find your paper too tonic for their cultured souls; but the mild emetic, persistently plied, will have its perfect work in time. Abbot is cultured, is he? And with it a trace of the old sophism that many of us have not quite yet outgrown? All the better; his sugar-coated pill will go down where weak stomachs would reject the cruder potency. He will reach readers who dare not read the fearless TRUTH SEEKER, and they will ponder and wonder what Bennett will reply to such assaults, and they will sneak and borrow THE TRUTH SEEKER just to see how the battle rages, and what is said on both sides, and the whole truth will get a hearing—but this course gives Comstock fits all round! The worst thing that can be done to him is to advertise him! Let Nast once get hold of him and serve him a la Tweed and his career of usefulness is ended. Millions of readers who never saw Tweed could have recognized him in a moment among a thousand. If Comstock had been thus publicly known, he would have been hustled out as a moral buzzard from that den of ill-fame without ceremony. I will be one of any number of citizens to contribute five dollars or more towards paying Nast for a true picture of this Comstock in the scene where he drew his revolver on naked, defenseless women, and let it then be electro-plated and sent to every newspaper in the land that has the back-bone to publish it. Can Comstock object to the publication as "obscene" pictures of his own design and execution?

So you are not as "cultured" as Mr. Abbot. I am glad of that, too, for you can be touched with the infirmities of us who never had the opportunity for "culture" furnished by the purloined sweat of somebody else. Strike your sturdy blows for truth, and for the friendless uncultured of earth! We shall love you for that, no matter about your "culture." But we must love Abbot, too, with all his education. He is identified with a large school of peculiar thinkers who believe they are doing right when they make haste slowly. Perhaps it is well. Nature ordains that transitions shall not be too sudden. The impatient young mother who wishes parturition accomplished within one minute must be told that if she could have her wish granted, it would destroy both herself and her child. Let us all study patience. If you scold or abuse Abbot a little, and he you, don't imagine that it is going to hurt Liberalism, or yourselves either. Neither will lose a true friend. The Index, The Positive Thinker (which I take), and others, are but very necessary steps down from stilted heathen mythology and superstition to the level, solid plane of truth and scientific common sense. Let them ease the descent and break the fall.

BRADLEY, ME., July 1, 1878.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: It is not because I feel no interest in you, the cause, or THE TRUTH SEEKER, that I have so long remained silent. I feel the same deep interest in your work I ever have felt, and here authorize you to always place me among the friends of the most radical reform. My mind for over a month past has been especially taken up with the greenback gospel. I have spoken once (and sometimes twice) nearly every day since my arrival in this State, nearly two months since. The greenback iron is hot now, therefore I pound it rather than any other.

Never since the days of Torquemada has there been such a violent persecutor among the people as Anthony Comstock. I am glad for every blow THE TRUTH SEEKER hits him. He is probably the most treacherous villian alive to-day. I don't know but that I am a little surprised at the position taken by Francis E. Abbot, but not much either. I have watched his course for the past ten years; he is a thoroughly inconsistent man. Between T. C. Leland and yourself, he stands a chance to get his eyes pretty thoroughly opened. Keep on; if you do not enlighten the "cultured editor," many others, through your efforts, are getting their eyes opened.

Poor brother Heywood has received his sentence. One hundred dollars fine and two years' imprisonment at hard labor is the penalty for trying to enlighten the people! O beloved America! "Land of the noble free!" Who would not fall in love with freedom when they see such illustrations of it as we have here. A man, a gentleman, a scholar, undertakes to enlighten the people on "sexual self-government," and Comstock, aided by the hounds of State, takes advantage of an unjust law, and after putting him through a farce called a United States Court, locks him up. After such exhibitions as this, who wonders that old conservatism is afraid of the commune. How long will the people endure such iniquity in the name of law? In heaven's name, I would welcome the commune—anything that would free the people from such unjust oppression.

We have a case in this State about as bad. Seward Mitchell and Josie Chase have lived together for the past five years, asking no law save that of heaven to sanction their union. Early in May they were arrested by those who were jealous of Miss Chase, for no other reason than because she was a "free woman," and were by the trial justice unlawfully sentenced to sixty days in separate cells in the Norridgewock jail. I have visited them and also received several letters from them. They are happy.

How soon it may come your turn, Mr. Editor, or mine, I do not know; of one thing I am fully convinced, that is, our enemies are only awaiting an opportunity. Again, I ask, how long will people endure such oppression? I am one of the seventy thousand, and have about made up my mind to never sign another petition. "They have rights who dare maintain them." As ever, MOSES HULL.

OSAGE, IOWA, June 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You may count me into that Defense Association to the extent of five dollars, though I do not expect to be able to raise it before Oct. 1st, but I expect it will be of quite as much value to you after that date as at any other time. Yours truly,

H. ELLINGSTON.

P. S. On looking over your list of books I find some with no price given, such as Ingersoll's works. Now I have an eye on several of these very books when I feel able to purchase them, so please mention their price in some of your issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER. By the way, that article on Sunday-schools, by Ella E. Gibson in your issue of the fifteenth, is very sensible, and I naturally look to that Freethinkers or Liberal Convention that meets in August, to take some steps toward the organization of Liberal Sunday-schools. Why not? We may as well make proselytes in that way as the enemy. If Liberals are too scattered for such a purpose, cannot some means be devised to colonize them in suitable localities in the different States.

H. E.

Ingersoll's works are $1 25 per volume. His new volume contains, "Ghosts," "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," "Centennial Oration," "Farming in Illinois," and "Extracts from his Political Addresses." Both volumes are substantially and very handsomely bound.

WALTON, IND.

MR. EDITOR: Our town has been waked up by a Liberal lecture given by our friend W. S. Bell. We have never had such an out and out radical lecture, and of course it created in the streets and stores a great deal of talk—more talk than discussion. The Liberals in this place took great pleasure in listening to Mr. Bell's able and gentlemanly style of handling his subject. This was particularly noticeable when one of the ministers present attempted to make a few criticisms upon the lecture. The effort on the part of the clergyman turned out in a few minutes to be a feeble failure, and many of the church people were soon ashamed of their champion, and the general desire upon their part to adjourn the meeting was complied with.

The common opinion among the religious in this town, has been that Freethinkers are a class of "enthusiasts" and "lunatics;" such epithets have been hurled at me for years, and I have often had to stand almost alone. Now you may be sure it gave me unbounded pleasure to listen to the able discussion and defense of the cause of Freethought as set forth by W. S. Bell. I am sure this Liberal lecture must lead to good results. We must have more of them, and we shall have a demand for more copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER in this community. Times are hard just now, but we think when the crops are harvested we can get up additional subscribers for your paper. We will also try to buy many of the Liberal books and pamphlets which you have for sale.

Yours, D. ENGLER.

DETROIT, MICH., July 2, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: I see by your last issue that Bro. Green asks for singers for the Watkins meeting. I will come and sing for expenses, viz, railroad fare both ways and board while at Watkins. (I reside now in Detroit.) My sister, Mrs. J. H. Harter, and daughter can be procured on the same terms. They reside at Auburn, N. Y., and with them we can give you all the vocal and instrumental music desirable. Mrs. Harter's daughter is a fine solo singer, and A No. 1 organist and pianist. Yours, P. O. HUDSON,

The "Liberal Sankey."

PRATT, July 1, 1878.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: Some one has sent to me a copy of The Index, of June 27, containing an article from Mr. Underwood upon the obscenity law, and the approval of the editor of The Index upon said communication, and a denial of ever stating that the 70,000 signers of the petition were in favor of obscenity. Now, why cannot the editor of The Index have the honesty to acknowledge that the only difference between Mr. Underwood and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is this: Underwood thinks the United States should regulate this matter, and Mr. Bennett thinks the individual States should regulate it. Otherwise, their views are precisely alike. What ails Mr. Abbot, anyway?

Respectfully, JAMES M. PRATT.

DALLAS, TEXAS, July 2, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: With this I send you an order for $4.50. For this amount send books, etc, as per enclosed list I could not help admiring, though deprecating all dissensions among Liberals, the able manner in which Theron C. Leland quashed that bag of "culchah," F. E. Abbot. Mr. Abbot is undoubtedly suffering from a bad attack of "weak knees" I think he would soon get over it if he desisted from further attack on the petitioners, and would go, soul and heart, bone and sinew, into the fight against Anthony Comstock and his worthy acolytes of the Y. M. C A. (Young Men's Catchpenny Association)

Yours in anti-Comstockism, GEO. CRETIEN.

NEW ORLEANS, July 1, 1878.

MY DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I can't tell you how I am pleased with your paper, for it would require more words than my poor lame arm will allow me to write. I am certain you will succeed, for you have all the elements of success: honest purpose and fearless courage to tell the truth and stand by it when told. Every Radical north and South will sustain you. I have never told you how much I enjoyed your "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion." Your plain home truths were of a telling nature, so much so that I lean to the opinion that this discussion had more to do with your arrest than did the "Open Letter" or "How do Marsupials Propagate their Kind?" for it is natural we desire our friends to see our efforts for good. So long as your paper was unnoticed by the orthodox, well; but Bennett's friends read the discussion, and of course Mr. Humphrey's friends wanted to see how well their pastor had scored the Infidel. There they lay, antidote and poison side by side, but like the little girl in the Black Crook, who performs the sweet little drill, most people preferred Infidel poison to orthodox reason. So when you were preparing for an open discussion with Mr. C. R. Teed, I think Mr. Anthony Comstock felt it was time to interfere and put a stop to your discussing religious questions before another pastor's friends got hold of your sound common sense arguments, in answer to Mr. Teed's involved and knotty "spiritual, scientific meanderings," that never reached anywhere, and that no mortal could tell what they meant to reach, while the answers to him were as plain as "the nose on the man's face." I hope, if my life is spared, to try and get subscribers for you. I will try this summer all I can. I do not now see my way clearly, but I hope to aid in throwing off the hard-pressing yoke of religious superstition from those who come after me. We must have a revolution. Time will decide whether it is to be one of reason and cool wisdom or of bayonets and hot blood. It is grand to live in times like these, one can hear the grim rolling of the fast-turning wheels of the gods. What a farce it is, this play of governing in America. Our poor, honest men, the very bone and sinew of the land, cannot meet and organize and support a candidate to help them, but every paper in the land is calling attention to the fact and striving to incite the people against them by exciting the fears of the timid. The whole machinery of government is a net-work of rings, monopolies, frauds, and thieves, from the Gulf of Mexico to the pines of Maine. Government has gone beyond its legitimate duties, which simply consist in protecting the weak against the strong; instead, it is helping the strong to grind the weak. There is not a man living that does not know that if this thing we call "a Government," can at once be relegated to its proper place, business, labor, and capital will soon settle their differences, and settle them amicably. I enclose an article cut from one of our city papers, the Times, that shows the tendency of our people to call on the military without due reflection. A republic has nothing to fear so much as calling out or learning to depend on the military.

I read with a sense of contempt an article in a paper last week, speaking of Sherman calling out the military, and saying he would require no better soldiers "than the men who fought him from Atlanta to the sea." Bah! we had soldiers on both sides as brave as ever shot a gun or drew a sword, but I hate war. Brutes fight, men reason. All of our past training has taught us a foolish love of arms. Women forget the agony of the dying bird in the brilliancy of its plumage. I hate war, it is brutal; not that I am a coward, for six as brave soldiers as ever lived went into the Confederate service that had learned to use their guns under my instruction. Two gave their lives, one an arm, and one a leg, and two came out sound and well, but not in love with the military.

Unshackle reason and put down the old Jewish love of slaughter, and we go far toward an establishment of human brotherhood.

Go on in your good work, and only get up another discussion with an orthodox clergyman. Jamieson's debates and your discussions answer our cause just as those holy tracts serve the Christians, which they so freely scatter around. A man, a member of the Young Men's Christian Association, had the impudence to send me a half dozen of the things not long ago. Very truly your friend,

MRS. E. L. SAXON.

REVISED SPELLING.—ITS FAILURE, ITS SUCCESS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 4 1878.

Thirty years ago Andrews and Boyle published in New York city a weekly newspaper in the phonetic type. A little later the Longleys started one in Cincinnati. There was no lack of enthusiasm in favor of phonetic spelling but in about five years the reform was as dead as Julius Cæsar. In England a fortune was spent in vain. In 1850 a Fonetic Bib'l was printed in Lundun, and a score or more of copies were presented to the leading phoneticians of America. The leaves of my copy are uncut, and I doubt if the book is as much read as Andrews Universology.

In December, 1865, Edwin Leigh, ex-Reverend, ex-Doctor, and ex-Phonetician, then of St. Louis, but now of Brooklyn, called at my office in New York, and showed me what he called his Pronouncing Orthography, exclusively for primary schools. Retaining the present spelling, he printed the silent letters in hair lines, and by varying the forms of the other letters, without the use of parasitic signs, he presented to the eye the spelling unchanged, and to the ear the exact sound. For example, his name was represented by L—e (with a varied form indicating e long), and i-g-h in hair lines, so that the reader would know his name was not Lye, nor Lige, but Lee.

At once I saw that he had solved the problem, How to do it? He and I, and many others had given up the phonetic reform as a failure, at least during the present generation, but he had now invented and patented a bridge over which little children could run with glee while veteran phoneticians could calmly wait and let future generations receive the great salvation. Dr. Leigh was sanguine that his system would soon prevail in the schools. I told him it would take five years. After twelve years of patient and persistent labor he has attained what he hoped for in less than five; but complete success is now certain. The children's primers are reprinted in his pronouncing orthography, and the child learns in one year what used to require two.

And now a new effort is made to reform the spelling by going only half way, and using only the letters in common use. THE TRUTH SEEKER and other papers print specimens of the revised spelling, and in that way it is hoped that a final and complete reformation will be effected. I wish I could hope so too, but I cannot. Will the thinker, the philosopher, read articles printed in the revised spelling unless the theme itself is interesting? Will not the fastidious and cultured reader frown upon such primitive orthography? Will not everybody be offended at seeing paper spelled paiper?

Now, therefore, let this method of propagandism be abandoned. Let the friends of the revised spelling keep it out of the sight of the learned, and place it before the eyes of the ignorant. How, they will ask, can this be done? I answer, Print a series of children's stories and popular tales for the imperfectly educated, comprising the majority of adults and all the children who read at all. Print Jack the Giant-Killer, and Cinderella, Robinson Crusoe, and Uncle Tom's Cabin, all in the revised spelling. Replace the long words by short ones, and sell the literature as cheap as possible. If in five years the publications are not read in every log cabin and negro hut in the land, then I am no prophet.

WM. HENRY BURR.

NEW WINE IN OLD BOTTLES.

MONTGOMERY, MICH., June 28, 1878

Religion, nor politics, nor anything else needs reforming more than English orthography, more correctly, heterography. Each letter has from one to ten sounds, and there is about an average of five sounds which gives us no less than from ten to two hundred different ways of spelling every word of ten letters in the English language. As there are only forty words spelled as they are pronounced, the orthography of no word is any guide to the orthography of any other word, however much alike they may be. It is sad to think that reformers have so much to say about politics and religion, and so little to say about this evil in our educational system which contradicts every principle of philosophy. Caricatures upon an improved spelling render the subject none the less painful. The system offered in THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last several weeks is identical with one offered by Mrs. Burns, and very similar to the one advocated by Stephen Pearl Andrews. That Mrs. Burns has systematized stenography and offered improvements in the methods of teaching it, I have no doubt (I have only seen a few advance sheets of her book which she kindly sent me), but her "Speling Reform without New Leterz" is horrid to me. To be sure, it is not as treacherous as our common spelling, but it brings with it much of the furniture of the old system. The letters have the same rascally caper of changing their names and assuming as many aliases as occasion may demand, while often their "absence is visible" where their presence is required. To illustrate: I find in this "reformed orthography" that the sound of e as in meet, has three signs, as in leeve, female, he, besides being silent.

a—4—alw*ays* say fāmus, Lock*sley*, br*ain*.
ah—1—b*ard*.
aw—4—sm*all*, t*ank*, ălways, wārm.
oh—1—d*on't*.
oo—2—sc*ool*, wŭman.
ih—5—b*ee*a, iz, pret*yest*, f*e*rce.
eh—1—rest.
ah—2—hănd, hăz.
oh—1—not.
uh—2—l*ŭv*, s*er*.
ooh—2—l*ŭking*, n*ew*.
i—2—s*iz*, t*y*.
oi and on, each one as in voice and don't.

Here are fourteen sounds represented in thirty-two different ways, and this is frequently done by the vowels changing places with each other. Each of these letters represents several sounds, or no sound at all, as the caprice of the writer may wish. To be sure, this is not quite as bad as the old system which represented some two hundred and forty sounds with five vowels and one consonant, or, rather, those letters put themselves in that many shapes to represent some fourteen or fifteen sounds, but why abort the work we undertake? In reading an article I find such spelling as the following: "Employed," "next," "expressed," "exact," "examination," "place," "case," "brain," "nails," "hair." If I were going to spell these words without new letters, I should spell them thus: "Emploid," "nekst," (or necst), "ekspresst," "egzakt," "egzaminashun," "plas," "cas" (or kas), "bran," "nalz," "har," or if the i was necessary to distinguish the sound of the a from its other sounds, I should have it uniform in all the words.

I know it is difficult to represent about forty sounds with twenty-six letters, three of these being useless, but by giving other names to c, g, v, x, and inserting a, e, c, m, w, and doubling o, and probably some other letters for vowels and dipthongs, and by adding h to t, d, s, and z, for th, dh, sh, and zh, we can manage pretty well. Yet it is in no way satisfactory. If each reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will send ten cents to Elias Longley, and get a copy of his monthly Phonetic Educator, and examine the beautiful and scientific orthography advocated therein, it would not be hard to prevail upon them to each contribute their mite for a ten or twenty dollar font of phonetic type with which to adorn the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We should then have a spelling reform against which no argument could be made. It is a pity that all our reform papers could not afford a column of phonetic reading each issue.

KAYSVILLE, UTAH, June 21 1878

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am glad to see the spelling reform introduced into the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some fourteen years ago I was called by the Mormon authorities to assist in making a new phonetic alphabet for the use of the Mormon people. I arranged the twenty-six letters of the English alphabet in a manner to subserve the purpose they desired, and changed but little the face of the written and printed page, but it met with no favor; afterwards they adopted the "Deseret alphabet." I will write the rest of this letter in the alphabet above alluded to.

GLEN HALL, PA., July 3, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: To-morrow will be "the glorious Fourth." Glorious Fourth! We should think so. Wherein glorious? Because, one hundred and two years ago, America, that then was, shook off her allegiance to the British yoke. Is it that which makes glorious the fourth of July? They did nobly and well thus to rise in the majesty of their individual national freedom and assert their independence. But are there no yokes on the necks of the people to-day which ought to be broken, no oppressions, no usurpations of rights? What think ye? Of only one will we speak—religious usurpation, the tyranny of priestcraft, a broken pledge to the people, where religious liberty has been promised to all; where the nation's hands are stretched out to all the world with inscribed on its escutcheon, "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

O America, shame on thee! O treacherous government, that favors one religious institution above another, and fosters one in preference to another! O people, who would betray their own liberties in permitting the enactment and enforcement of partial laws made and executed in the interests of any religious association whatever; who would be bribed, and bribe, in the name of "Almighty God," the nation to its own destruction by foisting upon it a national religion, and that religion evangelical Christianity! Awake, O ye Liberals! fly to the rescue—the rescue of yourselves and posterity from the burdensome laws already imposed upon you! And will ye submit till ye are bound hand and foot in the galling chains of heathen martyrdom in the name of Christianity? Comstock Christianity, in the name of the Young Men's Christian Association! and not the Continental Congress, but the Congress of the United States of America!

Hark ye, oppressors; listen to one note of warning. If ye persist in your mad undertaking, legalizing unjust persecutions, appointing your inquisitors by the nation's representatives, and paying them from the nation's exchequer, restricting the liberties of your citizens, arresting them in their workshops, places of business, homes, and families, fining and imprisoning them for no crimes except liberty of thought and act; if ye go on, as ye have begun, in the interest of the Christian and the Christian God; ye will thrust upon this people the worst war the civilized world has ever known.

And O ye freethinking portion of the community, have ye no responsibility in this matter? Will ye sit idly by and behold the cloud—much larger than a man's hand already—rising and spreading over the entire horizon, and not make one effort to stay—to prevent the devastating storm? Will ye suffer the little band of active Liberals and Freethinkers to be scoffed at, beaten, maltreated, persecuted, and put to death, and not utter one protest? Will ye see reform's noblest and most self-sacrificing workers trodden down by the strong many, and not fly to the rescue? How can you do so? Your own liberties and the liberties of your children are at stake. Fly, then, to the rescue! Suffer not the few, who are struggling, to be overcome by the foe. Join their ranks, and swell the army of recruits already in the field. Hasten to the work; enough is there to do. Open your heart, your purse, your hand, and your homes; redeem the time, for even now comes the bugle-call from a thousand hills. Even now the sound reverberates from the grottos and glens. The cascades and waterfalls catch up the echo from afar, "Come, and help us! Come, O come!" And will ye refuse? Behold the call; listen, it comes from your sister State, New York to Pennsylvania, imploring you to come over and help them; yea, help them to help yourselves. How soon will ye echo back, "We will come"? And not to you alone, but to all the thoughtful in these United States has the sound gone forth, "Come up to Watkins, N. Y., August 22d, 23d, 24th, and 25th, and there let your light shine, in the darkness of this nineteenth century, in favor of free religious liberty in every sense of the word. Do not hide your light under a bushel; do not fear to identify yourselves with the religious patriots of the revolution of ideas and creeds now being waged. Tarry not by the way! Hesitate not, for we have need of ye. The enemy is mighty and strong. He has enlisted on his side of the contest the Government of our land and all its forces and emissaries, the means and influence of the wealthy and powerful; ancient customs, myths, and traditions; present public sentiment, popular prejudice, and the admirers of show, ostentation, parade, and "let me alone in my faith, the faith of my fathers."

Yes, brothers and sisters, arouse yourselves, and be not deterred from, or alarmed by, the cry of the multitude who shout "Infidel," for so shouted they at your fathers (of reform and science) who were before you. Let them shout, for the winners of truth will be yourselves in the end, even should the nation forget its sacred trust and sell itself to the Christian fanatics, who would steep in blood the liberties bought at such a fearful price one century ago, when first went up the Declaration of Independence from our ancestors in that long persistent cry, "Give us liberty or give us death!"

Free Speech.

The following report of the Heywood meeting held in Paine Hall on June 30th, is from the Boston Herald:

In response to the announcement in the papers that all friends of free speech were invited to be present at Investigator Hall, Paine Memorial building, Appleton street, Sunday, June 30, at 2:30 P. M., about 100 people were assembled there. About one-half of the crowd were followers of Heywood, the balance were Freethinkers, Atheists and idlers, whose curiosity had prompted them to attend the meeting. The presiding officer, Horace Seaver, introduced as the first speaker Professor Wetherell, who, after reading the law of March, 1873, in relation to the sending of obscene matter through the mail, and after expressing his opinion on the necessity of the law, argued at some length on the vast amount of evil which had been prevented by the many prosecutions which had been made, and the large amount of benefit the community has derived from the suppression and destruction of the enormous quantity of obscene literature with which this country was at one time flooded. He was followed by Mr. Verity, who, taking the opposite side of the question, succeeded in eliciting a storm of applause from the Heywood clan. In illustration of the immoral tendency of various books, he read three passages from "Cupid's Yokes," and compared them with the same number of quotations from Samuel, ii, of the Scriptures, to the disparagement of the latter. This act of irreverence received the approbation of the blear-eyed advocates of Free-loveism, who made it manifest by a loud and continued round of applause. His argument was that the government had no right to infringe upon the moral and social views of mankind, and that this law was an infringement upon those views. The meeting then was devoted to hearing the views of any person who desired to speak, and quite a number availed themselves of the privilege, the followers of Heywood holding him up as a martyr, and the other side defending the law, some of them declaring their opinion that it was a righteous sentence. In the lively argument which ensued on the subject of Anthony Comstock's scarred cheek, the perspiration and words flowed freely, and no definite conclusion was arrived at in the matter, one party claiming it as an honorable trophy of the work in which he was engaged; the other insisting that it was a mark of the just retribution of an injured man, who had been betrayed by this modern Judas, as they denominated Mr. Comstock. Upon motion of Mr. B. R. Tucker, the following committee was appointed to devise ways and means for holding an indignation meeting for the purpose of making some kind of a protest against the imprisonment of Ezra H. Heywood: B. R. Tucker, J. P. Mendum, J. R. Spinney, J. M. L. Babcock and Mrs. Laura Kendrick.

AT the annual conversazione of the Institute of Civil Engineers held on June 3, at South Kensington, London, Mr. H. Edmunds, Jr., exhibited the phonoscope, an instrument which attracted the greatest attention. It may thus be described: A Geissler tube 8 inches long is rotated by means of a small electro-magnetic engine. Placed below and in front of the tube is a small Rhumkorff coil, with a make-and-break controlled by a telephone. Whenever a person speaks or sings into the telephone, the tube, previously dark, is instantly illuminated, exhibiting a dazzling display of ever varying colors, in the shape of a fiery wheel.

Go to your bosom, knock there, and ask your heart what it doth know that is like my brother's fault; if it confess a natural guiltiness, such as his is, let it not sound a thought upon your tongue against my brother.—Shakspere.

Sunset on Sebec Lake.

The robin, in the soft spring rain,
Is singing loud his glad refrain,
Where pushing leaf and grasses gay
Are freshening brightly day by day.

The river runneth full and strong,
Chanting its old triumphant song;
The air is full of prophecy
Of golden hours that are to be
When swallows to the eaves shall come,
And in the blossoms bees shall hum,
And field and hill shall ring with song.
"In summer, when the days are long."

But through it all I seem to hear
The wild loons calling far and near;
And waves low lapping 'round a boat
Midway upon a lake afloat.
No other sound is in the air—
A sunset flush is everywhere—
Gold, amber, rose, and scarlet, change
To purple mist, slow, soft, and strange.
That drifts adown the circling hills,
Till all the silver valley fills.

On the dim, western shore, below
A rugged hill, our camp-fire glow
Is but a spark to light the gloom;
Our tent a speck of purple bloom;
The figures of the rowers take
The tint of sky, and wood, and lake;
Behind us calls the mocking loon,
And rises full the autumn moon,
As through the purple dust we float.
Silent, in an enchanted boat.

Piscataquis Observer. ANNA BOYNTON.

What Care I?

My enemies condemn,
And friends grow shy;
When I am in the right,
Then what care I?

If conscience but approve,
Let bigots rail,
For my reward will come,
And truth prevail.

What were this life to me
If I must kneel
With head beneath the weight
Of custom's heel?

Then let my foes revile,
My friends pass by;
I will not sell my soul
And live a lie!

By actions good or ill
We rise or fall;
Who stand not for the right
Are cowards all!

Where duty leads the way,
Let me be found;
I know my feet shall rest
On solid ground.

My church is all mankind,
And here I pray,
With reason for my guide
To light the way.

Let carping bigots fight
O'er forms and creeds;
But let me prove my faith
By noble deeds.

Then let them howl and rave,
Backbite and lie;
If I am in the right,
Then what care I?

A VOICE FROM THE WEST.

MR. EDITOR: I am sure hundreds of your readers will be pleased to read the following letter from one of the greatest Liberal workers of the West. H. L. G.

LINCOLN, NEB., June 27, 1878.

FRIEND GREEN: I have received your kind invitation to be present at the gathering of Liberals to be held in Watkins Glen in August, and shall take great pleasure in accepting. It will be a nothworthy occasion, one which no Liberal can afford to neglect. Never before has such a gathering of leading Freethinkers been held in America, and if it fulfill your expectations, it cannot but make a deep and lasting impression on the minds of all thinking people. It is to be hoped that many of our leading Liberals in the West will attend, and that from East and West, North and South, the Liberals of America can look into each other's faces, grasp each other's hands, and hear the voices of those whose names are as familiar as household words. I am rejoiced that we can have the opportunity of mustering our battalions and showing the quality of our soldiers enlisted for the war in the contest against superstition and bigotry. I am rejoiced that those of such diverse views can meet on a common platform, and, laying aside differences, unite to promulgate a religion of humanity and lay the foundation for a national Church peculiarly American and yet which welcomes the emancipated of all nations. Brothers in the West, from the valley of the Mississippi and the plains of Kansas and Nebraska, from the mountains of Colorado and Wyoming, let us make an effort to annihilate space and join in this grand rally in favor of free thought and free speech. Yours fraternally,

W. E. COPELAND.

Letter from Mr. Tucker.

OFFICE OF The Word, CAMBRIDGE MASS., July 1. 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Will you kindly state in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that during Mr. Heywood's imprisonment, his paper, The Word, will be published at Cambridge, and edited by myself, that it is my aim to increase its circulation and the frequency of its issue, so that Mr. Heywood may be better able to prosecute his work when he comes out of prison than he was when he went in; and that all who wish to co-operate with me in this by extending pecuniary aid in the shape of monthly contributions may address me at Cambridge, Mass. Sincerely yours, BENJ. R. TUCKER.

A Handsome Compliment to W. S. Bell's Pamphlet.

"Christianity is based upon the physical, bodily resurrection of Jesus, a perfect fallacy as every Spiritualist knows. Destroy that basis of fact, and the entire superstructure topples to the ground." "If Christ be not risen" says Paul, "then is our preaching vain?" Mr. Bell has in this pamphlet probed the Scripture narratives of this stupendous occurrence to the bottom, searchingly analyzed it in all its details, and let the full flood of rational truth flash athwart the darkened maze of self-contradiction, blind credulity, and nescient absurdity in which it is involved. Undoubtedly this is the most complete and comprehensive digest and exposé of this churchal dogma yet given to the world, and it is calculated to be of much service in the emancipation of the human mind from cramping subjection to this darksome superstition. The question of the spiritual resurrection of Jesus is not broached by Mr. Bell, and, presenting as it does an entirely different view of the case, it [the spiritual resurrection] may be of great utility to us in the solution of the origin of the myth of his material bodily resurrection.—The Spiritual Offering.

"Career of Religious Ideas."

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I have just been reviewing Hudson Tuttle's excellent work, "The Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate, the Religion of Science," which I had read with great interest as it appeared week after week in the columns of the beloved TRUTH SEEKER. The book is so very good that I am at a loss what to say that shall express my approbation of it. The wide and varied scope of its researches in the comparison and discussion of all the various religions of the far back past, on up to the now and to-day, and the description of their origin, progress, and development, reminds one of the great work of Volney, "The Ruins of Empires," but this book of Mr. Tuttle's has a new and added freshness because of the new outgrowth of science, of evolution, progress, and development, which has been woven in so artistically all along every one of its one hundred and forty-five pages, each of which contains real gems of thought, as well as facts, proofs, and arguments, which are forcible and strong enough to convince even a Jesuit that gods and Bibles, sons of gods and demons are all man-made myths, and destined to fade away before the keen, telling blows of practical, reasoning thinkers, as clouds drift before the wind. Had he totally eliminated the words God and religion from the "ultimate" I should have been still better pleased. For these old theological terms the future has no use. They convey no real meaning of anything that actually exists, any more than do the words, fairy, nymph, or dryad. If God does not mean a personal being it really means nothing. If religion does not mean creed, faith, and belief in the supernatural, it means nothing. It is better to use words that are appropriate to the new order of things, and let those old terms stay where they belong, as parts of the old mythologies they represent.

"The Religion of Science" is a misnomer, and we who are working to destroy all religions and replace them with scientific facts should let the words which belong exclusively to their domain go with them. But aside from this little imperfection the book is one which any Infidel should be proud to be the author of, and had Hudson Tuttle never written anything else, this work alone would have made him famous, noted, and renowned. With a couple of short quotations from the volume itself, I will close, hoping every reader will be as delighted with it as I have been. And if they read it carefully, I know they will, for it is a perfect mine of facts and ideas carefully and systematically arranged, and all dressed in a beautiful, winning style that charms and pleases, while it leads one on steadily to "the ultimate":

"All—Brahmin, Buddhist, Persian, Moslem, Jew, Catholic, Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist, down to the smallest and most obscure sect, are equally willing to sanctify and prove their dogmas with their lives. Martyrs are the cheapest product of mankind, and the most meaningless. They have sealed with their blood the greatest follies with a zeal which proves nothing but their ignorance and fanaticism."

"The Church with its hollow shams shall perish; but morality, the growth of intellect, freed from gross and perverting idolatry, shall achieve a nobility of character unknown before."

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Dr. Chase and Anthony Comstock.

The following remarks and extract from the Constitution are from the editorial columns of the N. Y. Star. We fear the editor is too charitable in his reflection upon the only society which would not be disgraced by supporting Comstock. Its actions show that it cares very little for the rights of any upon whom its displeasure may fall or whom Anthony may pronounce obscene:

"Among the many wise provisions of the Federal Constitution there is none more dear to the American than Article IV. of the amendments, which declares as follows:

'The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.'

"The Society for the Prevention of Crime must necessarily conduct its proceedings in deference to the spirit and letter of this most precious provision of the fundamental law. That in every case it means to do so there can be no doubt, and when it fails, the failure is to be attributed to the zeal or ignorance of its representatives.

"These reflections are inspired by the complaint of Mrs. Sarah B Chase, M.D., of No. 56 West Thirty-third street, against Anthony F. Comstock, charging him with unjustly and unwarrantably causing the arrest of the plaintiff, putting her to great inconvenience and trouble, disparaging her reputation, destroying her business, and willfully, maliciously and wrongfully searching her private residence, to her great distress and damage. This is a formidable indictment, and if the allegations are true the offender ought to be punished to the full extent of the law.

"Mr. Comstock will probably meet the charges of malicious and wrongful acts by a general denial, and plead his authority to do what he did under the law establishing the society in whose name the alleged offenses were committed. The trial of the issue thus raised will be watched with special interest, because Mr. Comstock's acts in other cases have been the subject of some very severe comment. The complaint of Mrs Chase contains statements which make a legal definition of the limits of the authority of the society very necessary. Mere suspicion ought not to expose a private citizen to the loss and humiliation of which she complains. Where a power so odious as that of making domiciliary visits is exercised, the evidence of the crime suspected ought to be such as to establish a reasonable presumption of its existence. The article of the Constitution above quoted shows how jealously the authors of the American Government guarded the sanctity of a man's home, and at this late day it will not do for us to overlook the vital importance of the great principle for the preservation of which they so sagaciously provided."

SUMMER SUNDAYS.—In spite of the disreputable way in which the climate is behaving, it is safe to assume that the Sundays of summer are on their way hither and will soon be upon us. Those are the Sundays upon which we go to Long Branch, to Coney Island, and where not, drink lager beer to repletion, and bathe in salt water until we are saturated with sunshine and ozone. If this is remembering our Creator in the days of our youth, and keeping holy the Sabbath day, we may be said to do it contentedly, for certainly the suburbs are more and more enjoyed on Sunday as the revolving years come round. Our citizens are not growing more puritanical: they are growing less so. They take more to heart, year after year, the maxim of Christ, that the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath, and, consequently, they make such modifications in its observance as advancing civilization seems to render imperative. It requires either a good deal of senselessness or a good deal of moral force to escape entirely from religious conventionalities and lead the life dictated by common sense. But it can be done, and we think that the serious people of the United States, and more naturally those of New York, are learning how to solve the problem.—Telegram.

KIDDER'S

SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

To His Excellency, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States:

SIR: Whereas Mr. E. H. Heywood, a citizen of Massachusetts, a man of education and deep convictions, a graduate of Brown University, and highly respected by a large circle of persons, editor of a newspaper called "The Word," and publisher of tracts, pamphlets, and books, has been tried in the city of Boston, in a United States Circuit Court, and sentenced by Judge Clifford to two years' imprisonment and $100 fine for sending one of his pamphlets through the United States mail, the charge being that certain expressions in said pamphlets are obscene:

Now therefore we, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, beg to set forth the following facts and considerations, and ask your Excellency to exercise the power of pardon vested in you to meet cases of manifestly unjust punishment:

1st. The pamphlet in question was written and published with good motives, with the intent to promote true morality, and is not obscene in any sense of that word. It is written in as pure language as any work on physiological and social subjects; and contains less that is calculated to offend than the classic literature of the last two or three centuries, found in all our libraries, and circulating freely and without question in the United States mails; and not nearly as much that is objectionable as is contained in the frequent reports of divorce and other trials, which are published broadcast in the great daily journals and sent through the U. S. mails without restraint or question. Mr. Heywood, therefore, is sentenced to undergo a long imprisonment for no real offense and for doing less than other publishers and citizens of the United States are doing daily with impunity. Therefore we, your petitioners, seek at the hands of your Excellency a remedy for this very partial administration of the law.

2d. The freedom of the press is the one point, the world over, that should be the most jealously guarded by a free people. At no other point is power so tempted, or so apt to encroach; and no other freedom so inexorably exacts the full traditional "price"—"eternal vigilance." This freedom is guaranteed for the very purpose of protecting new and unpopular truths. This is the very source of much of social and intellectual progress and is the deadpoint in the struggle between truth and error. That which is popular, may almost be said to need no guarantee of freedom—it protects itself. It is the unknown or newly discovered truth which as much requires a tariff of protection, while it is new and unknown, as any growing manufacture in a young State requires it.

In this view the noble utterance of one of the earliest and most illustrious of your predecessors, James Madison, will greatly help to guide your action. He said on a memorable occasion: "It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The freemen of America did not wait until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

And now recently these views are anew and most cogently sustained by the United States Supreme Court. One of the points decided in the late case of Jackson, dealer in lottery tickets, is: "Regulations against transportation in the mail of printed matter which is open to examination, cannot be enforced so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is essential to that freedom."

That decision was made after the trial of Mr. Heywood but before his sentence. His pamphlet and his whole case come within that decision—that freedom of the press shall not, "in any manner," be interfered with—and your Excellency is most urgently but respectfully requested to grant him, in your clemency, the benefit of that decision now; and relieve him from his fine and imprisonment by your pardon.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc., etc.

Odds and Ends.

A CALIFORNIA philosopher has extracted the following reply from a schoolboy to the query, "How is the earth divided, my lad?" "By earthquakes, sir."

A NEWLY imported Hibernian, employed on a farm a few miles north of this city, tilted up a bee-hive the other day to see what the bees were doing under there. He knows now.

THEAR is style among the ladies of Alaska as well as anywhere else. They grease their noses with a mixture of oil and coal-dust; and the blacker the nose the more stylish it is.

THE editor of a Virginia paper was asked by a stranger if it was possible that little town kept up four newspapers; and the reply was, "No, it takes four newspapers to keep up the town."

A HAPPY deliverance for hundreds who have more wife than they want is found in the Anti-Fat of a patent medicine man, who guarantees that his preparation will reduce the weight of a fleshy person five pounds a week.

THE agricultural papers are howling to know how shall we keep the boys and girls on the farm. Well, suppose you hide their clothes. Years ago, when we hid a boy's clothes when he was in swimming he generally staid right there until night or the clothes came.

A CORRESPONDENT wants to know what lying in state means. Ahem! Yes, well, Claudia, there are two kinds. One is when a great man dies, and the other is when a great man lies. If you shouldn't understand this, write again. If you should, write and explain it to us.—Bridgeport Standard.

WE have never been able to understand how it is that a woman who is apparently deaf when her husband asks her where that half dollar is which he left in his pantaloons pocket before going to bed, can hear the wail of her two weeks old baby down two flights of stairs and through three deal doors."

AUT CÆSAR AUT NULLUS.—Architect; "What aspect would you like, Mr. Smithers?" (who is about to build a house.) Mr. Smithers: "Has Muggles" (a rival tradesman) "got a haspect? 'Cause, mind yer, I should like mine made a good deal bigger than 'is."

"WHAT was the principal element of my success?" asked a reformed milkman of wealth at a workingmen's convention, the other day, and behold, his modesty overcame his assurance when a ragged boy from the gallery answered back, "Water, you old cheat!"

MRS. SKINNER ON WOMAN'S RIGHTS.—The following are the opening sentences of an address on this subject by Mrs. Skinner:

Miss President, felleo-wimmin and male trash generally: I am here to-day for the purpose of discussing woman's rights, recussing her wrongs, and cussing the men.

I believe both sexes were created perfectly equal, with the women a little more equal than the men.

I also believe the world would be happier to-day if man had never existed.

As a success man is a failure, and I bless my stars that my mother was a woman.

I not only maintain these principles, but maintain a shirtless husband as well.

They say a man was created first. Well, s'pose he was. Ain't first experiments always failures?

If I was a betting man, I would bet $2.50 they are. The only decent thing about him was a rib; and that went to make something better.

And then they throw into our face about taking an apple. I'll bet five dollars that Adam boosted her up the tree and only gave her the core.

And what did he do when he was found out? True to his masculine instincts, he sneaked behind Eve's Grecian bend, and said, "'Twasn't me; 'twas her;" and woman has had to father everything mean, and mother it, too.

What we want is the ballot, and the ballot we're bound to have, if we have to let down our back hair and swim in a sea of sanguinary gore.

Now that the phonograph makes it possible for sounds to be canned the same as beef, milk, lobsters, fruit, etc., missionary sermons can be bottled and sent to the South Sea Islands, ready for the table, instead of the missionary himself.

THE POWER OF MUSIC MODERNIZED.

How sweet the moonlight sleeps
Upon this citizens' savings bank,
Whose shutters are up, and whose
President and Cashier have gone to that country
With which we have no extradition treaty!

Here will we sit, and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears, along with ants and bugs
And other merry wanderers of the night.
Sit, Jessica, here upon my overcoat,
And wake Diana with a hymn.

Do thou but note a wild and wanton herd
Of youthful and unhandled colts,
Fetching mad bounds, snorting and neighing loud,
If they but hear perchance a trumpet sound,
Or any air of music touch their ears,
You shall perceive them make a mutual stand,
Their savage eyes turned to a modest gaze,
Transfixed by the sweet power of music.

You doubtless have observed, too,
That when a herd of youthful and unhandled
Colts, or broken-down plough horses, catch
The far-off sound of a church choir
Where the minister and the congregation
Join in the chorus, they will get away from it
Or break their necks.

But this, dear Jessica, is not music,
Oh, no; not by a long shot!
The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not moved with a concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treason, stratagems, and spoils,
Or to hold office under the United States Government.
Let no such man be trusted
Further than you might throw a bull by the tail.

Gems of Thought.

TRUTH is as impossible to be soiled by any outward touch as the sunbeam.—Milton.

TITLES, indeed, may be purchased; but virtue is the only coin that makes the bargain valid. Burton.

THE tongue of a fool is the key of his counsel, which in a wise man wisdom hath in keeping. —Socrates.

IN adverse hours the friendship of the good shines most; each prosperous day commands its friends.—Euripides.

A WOUND from a tongue is worse than a wound from the sword; the latter affects only the body —the former, the spirit, the soul.—Pythagoras.

LIBERTY of thinking, and of expressing our thoughts, is always fatal to priestly power, and to those pious frauds on which it is commonly founded.—Hume.

LOST, yesterday, somewhere between sunrise and sunset, two golden hours, each set with sixty diamond minutes. No reward is offered, for they are gone forever.—Horace Mann.

THERE is nothing too little for so little a creature as man. It is by studying little things that we attain the great art of having as little misery and as much happiness as possible.—Johnson.

THERE are those who hold the opinion that truth is only safe when diluted, about one-fifth to four-fifths lies, as the oxygen of the air is with its nitrogen. Else it would burn us all up.—Holmes.

THE great moments of life are but moments like the others. Your doom is spoken in a word or two. A single look from the eyes, a mere pressure of the hand, may decide it; or of the lips though they cannot speak.—Thackeray.

I CONSIDER it a mark of great prudence in a man to abstain from threats or any contemptuous expressions, for neither of these weaken the enemy, but threats make him more cautious, and the other excites his hatred and a desire to revenge himself.—Machiavelli.

WHEN God lets loose a thinker on this planet then all things are at risk. There is not a piece of science, but its flank may be turned to-morrow; there is not any literary reputation, nor the so-called eternal names of fame, that may not be revised and condemned.—Emerson.

TRUTH is tough. It will not break, like a bubble, at a touch; nay, you may kick it about all day, like football, and it will be round and full at evening. Does not Mr. Bryant say that Truth gets well if she is run over by a locomotive, while Error dies of lockjaw if she scratches her finger?—Holmes.

YOU can imagine thistle-down so light that when you run after it your running motion would drive it away from you, and that the more you tried to catch it the faster it would fly from your grasp. And it should be with every man, that when he is chased by troubles, they, chasing, shall raise him higher and higher.—Beecher.

How silent, how spacious is time, what room for all, yet without place to insert an atom—in graceful succession, in equal fullness, in balanced beauty, the dance of the hours goes forward still. Like an odor of incense, like a strain of music, like a sleep, it is inexact and boundless. It will not be dissected, nor unraveled, nor shown.—Emerson.

ACCORDING to Democritus, truth lies at the bottom of a well, the depth of which, alas! gives but little hope of release. To be sure, one advantage is derived from this, that the water serves for a mirror, in which truth may be reflected. I have heard, however, that some philosophers, in seeking for truth to pay homage to her, have seen their own image and adored it instead.—Richter.

TIME, the cradle of hope, but the grave of ambition, is the stern corrector of fools, but the salutary counselor of the wise, bringing all they dread to the one, and all they desire to the other; but, like Cassandra, it warns us with a voice that even the sagest discredit too long, and the silliest believe too late. Wisdom walks before it, opportunity with it, and repentance behind it; he that has made it his friend will have little to fear from his enemies, but he that has made it his enemy will have little to hope from his friends.—Colton.

IF the Christian will tell us why he disbelieves in the story of Romulus drifting down the Tiber in a basket and being rescued by a wolf, we will tell him why we do not believe in the similar story of Moses in the bulrushes. If he will tell us why Romulus could not have been suckled by a she wolf, we will tell him why we think ravens and crows could not feed a superanuated old prophet. If he will tell us why he does not believe in the marvelous feats ascribed to Hercules, we will tell him why we do not believe in Samson and his exploits. If he does not believe in the story of the immolation of Iphigenia, why should we believe in that of Jepthah's daughter? If he will tell us why he does not believe in the historical words of the Indian Avator Chrishna, and of his miraculous birth and mission, we will tell him why we do not believe in the biblical record of the Judean Avator, Christ Jesus, and his miracles. In short, if he will tell us why he does not believe in Brahma, Allah, and Jupiter, we will tell him why we do not believe in his God, or Lord, or any other Mumbo Jumbo in the Universe, or any invisible intangibility created in men's imagination; or why we do not believe in thousands of the other Bible stories and Bible characters which have been plagiarized, pillaged, stolen, and adopted, with very little alteration, from old heathen mythologies.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 29. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, July 20, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

CHICAGO claims a population of nearly 540,000, and Bishop Cheny, in discussing church failures to reach the masses, declared that only 50,000 were habitual worshipers in sanctuaries.

MILAN has had another cremation, the body of Mme. Adelaide Olivier of Paris having been reduced to fine ashes in three and three quarter hours, and returned to her native city in an urn.

THE educational institutions of New Zealand are magnificently endowed with lands which will ultimately make them very wealthy. Fully 600,000 acres are altogether set apart for this purpose.

A YANKEE who had won a fat turkey at a raffle, and whose pious wife was very inquisitive about his method of obtaining the poultry, satisfied her scruples at last by the remark, "the Shakers gave it to me."

DESPATCHES from Fiji give an account of a great earthquake at Tanna, New Hebrides, which raised the land along the shore and harbor about twenty feet. Millions of fish were thrown up and destroyed.

OF the 45,000,000 of the inhabitants of the United States only 8,000,000 are communicants; and of these fully 5,000,000 are women, leaving but about 3,000,000 communicants in the entire country of the male persuasion.

ELDER JOBBINS of Michigan has given his views of the millennium. He says: "My idea of the milleanium is when religion won't cost a cent for its support." The average clergymen's idea of the millennium is when salaries will not be less than $5,000 per year with no vacancies.

HIPPARCHUS, in 128 B. C., made a catalogue of 1,022 stars, all that can be seen with the naked eye. Flamstead, with telescopes, made another of 2,884; Bode, in 1800, of 27,000; and Lalands, same year, of 50,000. Herschel computed 50,000 in nearly six degrees of the milky way.

THE Christian at Work speaks of some of the young ministers as "theological calves that are skipping all over the country, just turned loose from the seminaries." Are not those who employ them at round salaries to talk two or three hours per week also calves or sheep?

IN Litchfield, Conn., is an old tombstone with the inscription: "Sacred to the memory of inestimable worth of unrivaled excellence and virtue Mrs. Rachel, wife of Jerome B. Woodruff and daughter of Norman Barber, whose ethereal parts became a seraph May 24, 1835, in the 22 year of her age."

LOUIS XIV., going to mass one Sunday, found that the congregation consisted of his own immediate attendants and the officiating officer of the chapel. He asked Fenelon the meaning of this extraordinary lack of attendance. "The fact is, sir," said the Archbishop, "I let it be supposed you were not coming to-day, that you might judge how many come to worship God as compared with the King."

WHEN Edison gets through with the Metropolitan Elevated Railway, let him try his hand on the metropolitan church choirs. If he can bottle up the noise which some of these choirs make, and ship it to some distant and desolate place, he will be doing a good Christian work. For devotional effect African camp-meetings can beat them out of sight and hearing, even though the musical culture of the African be small.

MR. PERKINS was a Boston widower, having lost two wives. Miss Carlton was a spiritualistic medium. She went into a trance, and the spirits of the two dead wives, speaking through her, said that she and Perkins ought to marry. Of course Miss Carlton was astounded, after coming to herself, on being told of the communication she had delivered, but she was willing to obey. The ceremony was performed the next day.

DR. D'UNGER, the Minneapolis physician whose cinchona recipe for the cure of drunkards recently attracted attention, is out with this one for consumption: One-half pound finely cut up beefsteak (fresh); one drahm pulverized charcoal; four ounces pulverized sugar; four ounces rye whiskey; one pint boiling water. Mix all together, let it stand in a cool place over night, and give from one to two teaspoonfuls liquid and meat, before each meal.

SOME of the people of the churches have become uneasy on hearing that the Legislature of this State passed a bill providing for the taxation of church property in which fairs, festivals, concerts, or lectures are carried on, with a view to making money. The Governor did not sign the bill, and so it did not become a law. The brethren who want to carry on the show business in church are as free to do so as they have been in former years.

THE National Baptist has discovered that "the peculiar doctrinal aberrations of the Rev. Blauvelt were doubtless due to a diseased mind." Other religious papers which entertain views contrary to those of Mr. Blauvelt have expressed similar opinions. How odd it is that they did not, at the time Mr. Blauvelt promulgated his doctrines, detect the "diseased mind." Instead of which, a number of these papers combatted them just as if they supposed their author was sane.

THE curate of Siapiccia, Sardinia, was not at breakfast on a recent morning. The door of his room was forced open by the police. The bodies of the clergyman and a servant girl were found on the floor. Her skull had been fractured with the butt end of a pistol, which lay by the side of her antagonist, whose left hand was still clutching her hair. In her hand was a knife, with which she had stabbed him five times. This statement is a suggestive one and more creditable to the girl than the pastor.

THE GODS.—In all ages men have made gods, gods have made devils, and devils have made sin. Some have built their gods in the skies, others have made them of wood, stone, silver, or gold. The black races make their god black, the white make theirs white. Any god is just what man makes him. One made of a stick of cord wood and set away in the wood-shed answers a good purpose. Ours wears calico, and has soft blue eyes and brown hair. Sweet lips, too.—Seymour Times.

A TRUE PREDICTION.—The following appeared in the editorial columns of the New York Herald previous to the death of James Gordon Bennett: "The approaching conflict between labor and capital will, in its culmination, be marked by a revolutionary reconstruction of governments and laws the most radical and the most beneficent in the history of mankind; and this revolution will not be so much the work of strikes and barricades as of common sense and general enlightenment."

SOMEBODY has discovered in the prophecy of Isaiah an allusion to the railroad eating-houses of modern times: "And he shall snatch on the right hand and be hungry; and he shall eat on the left hand, and they shall not be satisfied." If the prophet had stood at one of the lunch counters on any of our great trunk lines and heard the yell of "ten minutes for refreshments," he could not more accurately have pictured the situation. The application of Isaiah's prophecies to the railroad eating-houses are more pertinent and obvious than to the coming of Jesus. By a little clerical ingenuity those old prophecies can be made to apply to almost anything.

THE Vermont Congregationalists have been discussing the religious papers, the discussion arising on a resolution to the effect that all good people ought to read some religious paper. The brethren sought to arrive at a harmonious opinion as to what constitutes a valuable religious paper, and which of the sheets clamoring for public favor ought to be taken and read. It was in vain. Every speaker had different notions from all the other speakers, and the Vermonters are as much in the dark as ever as to what religious organ they ought to subscribe for. Many of them will settle the matter by not subscribing to any. We recommend them to send for THE TRUTH SEEKER. They can rely upon it with all safety.

THE Presbyterian Banner speaks of "clerical dead-heads that wrap themselves up and snore as they are whirled along in the car of progress." Whom can it mean? The Independent asks, "Where shall the Rev. John Miller go?" This is a conundrum which Mr. Miller himself gives up, for he tells his Presbytery that he does not know where to go. The Alliance says that "if theology were as unreliable as history, or as visionary as science, it would have few advocates at present." The Interior says that some of its own remarks on the vexed question of feminine preaching "have been frank, manly, chivalric, Christian-like, and sensible." The Methodist says of the opening of the camp-meeting season, that "Paul, Apollos, and Cephas are advertised to be present and to participate in the preaching matters." THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is an Infidel paper, says that it has not seen any proofs of the existence of God, and must consequently be an unbeliever.—Sun.

TWO ILLINOIS deacons turned some calves loose in the same pasture. Two of the calves happened to be so much alike that no man could tell one from the other. One of these two disappeared. Each deacon thought the remaining calf his own. At last one of them sold the calf, and the other one insisted that it was his calf, and that the proceeds should be paid to him. There was a stormy dispute between these two deacons, and each threatened to go to law against the other. After letting the breeze blow for a while, they concluded to refer the matter to the minister, with power to make a satisfactory settlement. The minister advised them to put the $16 which the calf had sold for into the missionary treasury, and assured them that if they had any doubt in their minds as to which of them it was who was giving the money, the Lord knew all about it, and he would settle it justly and equitably. The Board of Missions got the $16 and entered it "calf money."

"GOD wills it so," sang the Right Rev. Dr. Coxe, beating time with a crosier, as the Czar's troops started for Constantinople. Were they not soldiers of the cross, champions of Christian civilization, marching to the rescue of their brethren ground down by the heel of the Infidel? What enterprise more deserving of the tuneful benediction of an American Episcopal Bishop with a talent for rhyming? It would be interesting to know what the Right Rev. Dr. Coxe thinks of his pious crusaders now, in the light of the information brought back to Constantinople by Consul-General Fawcett. Eighty-eight villages are reported to have been sacked and laid in ashes; and many others made the scene of horrible cruelties. And these are not the deeds of Bashi-Bazouks, but of Christian Bulgarians and Cossacks, and the victims are not Mussulmans alone, but fellow Christians who have been ill-advised enough to prefer the rule of the Sultan to that of the white Czar!

THE POPULATION OF FRANCE, AND HOW IT IS REDUCED.—Dr. Brochard estimates that France has lost through preventable causes fully 10,000,000 children in the last fifty years. The official returns made to the Government Commission of Inquiry indicate that the average mortality among infants under a year old in 5,000 communes is 51 per cent. Cardinal Donet, archbishop of Bordeaux, who by means familiar to the Catholic clergy has been making inquiries in his diocese, and has persuaded other bishops to do the same, puts forth a statement to the effect that in these figures there is no exaggeration. It was not enough that in France infants were, through negligence or design, being killed off at a rate greater than in any other country; it was proved that the proportion of still-born children was enormously and suspiciously higher among the unmarried mothers than among the married—an almost sure sign of foul play. A Pall Mall correspondent states that the French Chambers will soon be asked to consider a philanthropic scheme for the revival of turning-boxes in the foundling hospitals. A turning-box is a moveable contrivance into which a mother desirous of abandoning her child to public charity may place the infant without being asked any questions. She rings a bell, the box revolves, and the child disappears forever so far as she is concerned. These boxes were in use in most French towns until about twenty years ago, when a movement was started to abolish them on moral grounds; but now a reaction has set in, under the form of a panic produced by the increasing number of infanticides. Mothers too poor or too heartless to bring up their offspring must have facilities for consigning them to the State, or it is found that they leave them to die.

THE Rev. Elias Mead, of Jersey City, is on trial for lying, talking scandal, and the use of unwarranted authority.

FOUR of the officers of the collapsed Teutonia savings bank of this city have been arrested. A good beginning.

THE Secretary of the Navy is on his annual tour of inspection. At present he is looking over the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

GRAY, the forger, who absconded several years ago with several hundred thousand dollars, has been brought back.

DR. CARVER, the California rifleman, broke 5,500 glass balls in 500 minutes last Saturday. The best shooting on record.

THERE were four meetings of the Nationals in this city last Monday evening. They differ about men, but are sound on principles.

ABOUT one thousand German Socialists and Labor Reformers of this city met at Turtle Bay Park last Sunday. The party is growing.

MR. BEECHER preached his last sermon before his vacation on the 14th. He is going to California to add by lecturing to his pitiful salary of $20,000.

THE Viceroy of Canton has issued an order that all engaged in alluring Coolies from the country shall be punished with instant death. Life is cheap in China.

COLLECTOR ARTHUR, of this port, has been removed, and Gen. E. Merritt, lately Surveyor, appointed in his stead. Naval officer A. B. Cornell, also, has given place to Col. S. Burt. Both will begin duty at once.

THE Orangemen were bulldozed by the Catholics and Mayor of Montreal into giving up their procession. Consequently no blood was shed, but many windows were broken by the pious followers of St. Peter. Near Montreal two boys were killed. There was a riot at Hirshaw, Scotland, and also one at Belfast, Ireland.

A TREATY of peace has been signed at the Berlin Congress, the provisions of which guarantee the autonomy of Bulgaria and Roumelia, under the suzereinty of the sultan. The inhabitants are to enjoy religious liberty. Bosnia and Herzegovina are to be occupied by Austria. Montenegro, Servia, and Roumania are to be independent, with certain restrictions. Religious freedom throughout Turkey is guaranteed by the Porte, which also gives immunity to the "holy places" and to the "pilgrims" who may wander into its domains. England is occupying Cyprus with a strong force, and the Mediterranean is now practically controlled by that power. The Congress has dispersed, and most of the delegates returned home.

THE Indians who were lying in wait for Howard have found him. He has driven them further into the wilderness, killing several and capturing a large amount of stock. He is now on his way to Mount Idaho in pursuit of hostile Indians. Gov. Chadwick, of Oregon, has called for volunteers to fight the hostiles. Gen. Miles had a battle with 500 of them, defeating them. Stupendous frauds have been discovered at Crow Creek agency, Dakota. The agent, Livingston, has stolen everything he could from both the Indians and Government. He was appointed at the solicitations of the Episcopalians, to whom he gave fonts and stained glass windows for the chapels. The treatment of the Indians by the Christian sects is not an eminent success. It is far from honorable.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"That piece makes me think of one I wrote for our Virginia paper here," said Edith, "only mine was just contrary to it. I'll run in and get it, as it will be a good supplement to it."

So Edith went into the house, and soon returned with a scrap-book, in which were neatly pasted all the articles she had ever written for the press, as well as the notices, comments, editorial puffs, etc., which she had received. For you must know our Edith was an authoress as well as a music teacher. Opening the book, and turning a few leaves, she said, "Here it is," and read as follows:

"SIGNS AND MOON THEORIES.—A PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

"'Oh, merry spring hath pleasant hours,
And dreamily they glide,
As if they floated like the leaves,
Upon a silver tide.'

"As the warm, sunny, spring days come now and then, dropping, as it were, right out of Paradise, everybody is on the qui vive about garden-making, running and sending hither and thither for all varieties of seeds, searching almanacs and consulting wise old grandmothers as to the right sign or best phase of the moon in which to plant them.

"Now, being rather fond of experimenting, and 'going back on' old fogy notions, I got a brilliant idea in my head, one spring, that I would go precisely contrary to all these old, 'true,' and well-known signs, and see what would be the consequences. Well, the results were so extraordinarily surprising that I will relate a few of them for the benefit of future skeptics, doubters, and would-be wiseacres.

"The cabbage and lettuce, not being perceptibly affected by signs, did very well, but the peas would insist on running along the ground instead of climbing up my nice rows of brush, and every pod persistently worked its way down into the earth and took root, so that we hadn't a single pea to eat all that season.

"The onions all run up to stalks, some higher than the tree tops, and the roots ran equally as deep in the ground. Hoping to find tubers or bulbs proportionate, we dug one up with infinite labor and toil, but not an onion rewarded our search, so that we had none of this fragrant but healthy esculent wherewith to grace our board. The cucumber vines bore none but male flowers, and the vines themselves ran so luxuriantly that it took half an hour every morning to trim them up sufficiently to keep them within their own allotted space. We tried to pull them up after finding them so barren; but it was no use, the roots grew in proportion to the vines, and were, consequently, inextricable; but the surplus tops, which were daily cut, made us twenty loads of good manure; so that crop paid.

"The bean patch became such a thicket of barren, tangled, worthless vines that we made it a daily task to call into service all the lamps, candles, and lanterns, and collect together every unoccupied person on the premises to explore them for lost chickens, dogs, cats, and even children. Our little toddler of two years old was lost for twenty-four hours, and, when found, was so wound about with vines that it took half a day to cut her loose; her mouth was so bound up that she couldn't even cry aloud, and it was a week before she got well of the deep gashes cut into her flesh by the intertwining tendrils.

"We called in a lot of neighbors one day and cut the whole patch down, but we found that a dozen new ones came up in the place of every one that we cut down; so we never tried that experiment over again, but waited for the frosts of winter to exterminate it; but it persisted in living on until one cold night when the mercury went forty degrees below zero, and that finished it; so we had a regular jubilee over its demise.

"Our potatoes not being in the sign which makes things grow down, but in that which tends to produce tops, grew into large shrubs, which bore on their branches huge green colored tubers, the sun having the effect of thus changing the natural hue, and, as a consequence, converting them into rank poison. Tomatoes, on the contrary, grew under ground and were of a dull, brown color, and had a horrid ugly flavor and an earthy taste, so that even the pigs refused to eat them.

"Our cabbage-plants, which grew beautifully in the seed-bed, being transplanted precisely in the wrong time of the moon, all ran up to stalks, some of them growing forty feet in height, and what few leaves grew upon them all turned downwards for fear of making heads.

"The carrots, parsnips, beets, radishes, and salsify had fine sprangley roots like grass, while the tops throve luxuriantly, and everything else acted in a like contrary manner.

"I remember we set out a peach-tree, in the old of the moon, just for an experiment. Well, we thought nothing more about it till one day in the following September, when we were all sitting on the piazza taking a quiet 'nooning,' we were suddenly startled by hearing an unusual, yet musical, sound in that part of the garden. We hurried to the spot, and were astonished at a most singular metamorphosis; every branch and limb of that peach-tree had been converted into nots and notlets, and the extreme end of each one of these had its mouth wide open, and from every mouth darted golden flames, and from these flames issued low, sweet, harmonious strains of the most entrancing and intoxicating music. The ground beneath the tree was agitated like a boiling cauldron of sea-green silk, and every spear of grass was tipped with rosy flames which emitted the sweetest and most exquisite fragrance. Not daring to trust ourselves upon the soft, heaving ground beneath the tree, we threw a rope over the top of the tree and drew it from the soil; and, to our surprise, we found the whilom roots had all become branches full of leaves of every shape, color, and hue, and loaded down with the loveliest and most beautiful fruit imagination could conceive of. They were larger than our largest apples, perfectly round, and transparent as the purest crystal, and vieing with the rainbow in hue. In taste, they seemed to be a mixture of the best part of the pear, plum, pineapple, and strawberry. The fragrance was sweeter than all the perfumes of Araby condensed and commingled into one. We had hardly eaten, each of us, one of these delicious peaches, when we were startled by a loud report, and all at once the tree seemed to be converted into thin air, and disappeared, root, leaf, branch, and body, from our view. I think it must have been 'forbidden fruit,' so quickly was it taken from us; but our 'eyes were opened' to the folly of going any more in opposition to the 'signs and moon theories,' and forever hence forward we shall feel obliged to 'carry the stone in one end of the sack,' as our fathers did before us, and believe in all those unfailing 'truthful' signs which we have so conclusively proved by the rule of contraries."

The reading of these humorous burlesques started the little group off on a lively discussion as to the reality of moon theories, signs, etc.; and, strange to say, there was not a believer amongst them. Edith said her mother used to be a great hand to plant in the signs, and always consulted the almanac, even when planting flower-seeds. She said if one wanted double flowers, they must plant when the sign was in the twins, and for vines to run up, it must be in the head, etc.

Myra said she meant to try the plan of doing everything in exact opposition to all signs. She thought it such a good argument against the old-time belief.

"You see girls," said she, "there are so many people, even in this enlightened age, who take a thing for granted when other folks believe it, that they seldom try to examine for themselves whether it is true or not. Like young robins, they open their knowledge-boxes, or rather gudgeon-boxes, and swallow whatever is put therein, myth, fable, fiction, fact, or any other sort of mental pabulum, be it nutritious food, dry sawdust, or rank poison; and, to sort of nullify all this, it is necessary that some one should act, as well as talk; and this is why I try in all ways to live right out my creed, faith, and belief in actual works."

The Trapper's Heaven.

A BACKWOODS IDEA OF THE FUTURE STATE AND ITS ATTRACTIONS.

"Friend," said the trapper, "the Scriptur' says that the Lord will app'int a day in which the vagabonds and them that have done evil on the arth will git a gineral overhaulin'; and the idee is sartinly a reasonable one. Now, when that day comes, don't ye fail, friend, to be on hand, and do ye put in yer case as strongly as ye can when the matter of their creatin' comes up. Ye'll find me somewhere in the crowd, for I've got one or two things that will have to be attended to myself, not matters of any great weight, for I have ginerally kept the account pretty well squared as I went along; but there is a sneak of a half-breed up on the Canada line, nigh the head waters of the St. Regis, that's got two pelts that belongs to me if there is any ownership in trappin' and his case will sartinly come up in the jedgment, onless I can manage to git time to take a journey to the north end of the woods once more. And ef I do, the Lord needn't pay any special attention to him, for I know the p'nts of the case, and I have a pretty good idee of sech matters. And ef I can get up to the Canada line, and the vagabond hasn't moved out of the country, I'll settle the matter in a jedicious manner. But I sartinly advise ye to be on hand at judgment and make them rogues give back what they stole from ye. And ef ye git into a little discussion over the matter and ye want any help—ye see, ye bein' one and they bein' several—ef they should git noisy, ye might want a leetle help," and the old man moved his chair a trifle teward his guest in the simple earnestness of his confidential tender of assistance.

"I don't see," said the girl, "what good a scientific reputation will do one in heaven."

"Hoot!" said the trapper. "Magnet, you don't understand these things. A man's reputation is his reputation wherever he be, as I conceit; and it goes with him as the skin goes with the duck, whether he dives or flies. Friend, don't ye mind what the girl says, for she be a girl; but ye jest stand up for yer rights, and ef ye want any help, as I was sayin', any man to swear ye are right in yer charges, or to put in a few licks after the verdict is given——"

"But, John Norton," said the girl, interrupting him, "you don't suppose we are going to have bodies in heaven, do you?"

"Bodies? Of course I do," said the trapper. "Lord, Magnet, how is a man goin' to git along without a body? Why, we couldn't see each other if we hadn't bodies."

"But, John Norton," said the girl, again in her earnestness interrupting him, "if we do have bodies they won't be at all like these, but a great deal better."

"Better!" returned the trapper. "There can't be a better body, Magnet, than this one. Why, I've lived nigh on to eighty year and I never knowed a pain in my life, nor an ache, save sech as a man gits in a scrimmage or in battle, or sech as he gits in his stomach when meat is scarce and he is onnaterally hungry. Ye see I know what I'm talkin' about, Magnet. A man who talks from an experience of eighty year isn't guessin' at the thing. No, no! The Lord can't make a better body than he gin me at birth; leastwise I'll be parfectly contented ef he'll give me another as good as this has been, and keep it runnin' forever."—Murray's Adirondack Story.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

The laws of inheritance and adaptation known to us are completely sufficient to explain this exceedingly important and interesting phenomenon, which may be briefly designated as the parallelism of individual, of palæontological, and of systematic development. No opponent of the Theory of Descent has been able to give an explanation of this extremely wonderful fact, whereas it is perfectly explained, according to the Theory of Descent, by the laws of inheritance and adaptation.

If we examine this parallelism of the three organic series of development more accurately, we have to add the following special qualifications. Ontogeny, or the history of the individual development of every organism (embryology and metamorphology), presents us with a simple unbranching or graduated chain of forms; and so it is with that portion of phylogeny which comprises the palæontological history of development of the direct ancestors only of an individual organism. But the whole of phylogeny—which meets us in the natural system of every organic tribe or phylum, and which is concerned with the investigation of the palæontological development of all the branches of this tribe—forms a branching or tree-shaped developmental series, a veritable pedigree. If we examine and compare the branches of this pedigree, and place them together according to the degree of their differentiation and perfection, we obtain the tree-shaped, branching, systematic developmental series of comparative anatomy. Strictly speaking, therefore, the latter is parallel to the whole of phylogeny, and consequently is only partially parallel to ontogeny; for ontogeny itself is parallel only to a portion of phylogeny.

All the phenomena of organic development above discussed, especially the threefold genealogical parallelism, and the laws of differentiation and progress, which are evident in each of these three series of organic development, and, further, the whole history of rudimentary organs, are exceedingly important proofs of the truth of the Theory of Descent. For by it alone can they be explained, whereas its opponents cannot even offer a shadow of an explanation of them. Without the Doctrine of Filiation, the fact of organic development in general cannot be understood. We should therefore, for this reason alone, be forced to accept Lamarck's Theory of Descent, even if we did not possess Darwin's Theory of Selection.

CHAPTER XII.

LAWS OF DEVELOPMENT OF ORGANIC TRIBES AND OF INDIVIDUALS.—PHYLOGENY AND ONTOGENY.

In our considerations hitherto we have endeavored to answer the question. "By what causes have new species of animals and plants arisen out of existing species?" We have answered this question according to Darwin's theory, that natural selection in the struggle for existence—that is, the interaction of the laws of Inheritance and Adaptation—is completely sufficient for producing mechanically the endless variety of the different animals and plants, which have the appearance of being organized according to a plan for a definite purpose. Meanwhile the question must have already repeatedly presented itself to the reader, how did the first organisms, or that one original and primæval organism arise, from which we derive all the others?

This question Lamarck answered by the hypothesis of spontaneous generation, or archigony. But Darwin passes over and avoids this subject, as he expressly remarks that he has "nothing to do with the origin of the soul, nor with that of life itself." At the conclusion of his work he expresses himself more distinctly in the following words: "I imagine that probably all organic beings which ever lived on this earth descended from some primitive form, which was first called into life by the Creator." Moreover, Darwin, for the consolation of those who see in the Theory of Descent the destruction of the whole "moral order of the universe," appeals to the celebrated author and divine who wrote to him, that "he has gradually learnt to see that it is just as noble a conception of the Deity to believe that he created a few original forms capable of self-development into other and needful forms, as to believe that he required a fresh act of creation to supply the voids caused by the action of his laws."

Those to whom the belief in a supernatural creation is an emotional necessity may rest satisfied with this conception. They may reconcile that belief with the Theory of Descent; for in the creation of a single original organism possessing the capability to develop all others out of itself by inheritance and adaptation, they can really find much more cause for admiring the power and wisdom of the Creator than in the independent creation of different species.

If, taking this point of view, we were to explain the origin of the first terrestrial organisms, from which all the others are descended, as due to the action of a personal Creator acting according to a definite plan, we should of course have to renounce all scientific knowledge of the process, and pass from the domain of true science to the completely distinct domain of poetical faith. By assuming a supernatural act of creation we should be taking a leap into the inconceivable. Before we decide upon this latter step, and thereby renounce all pretension to a scientific knowledge of the process, we are at all events in duty bound to endeavor to examine it in the light of a mechanical hypothesis. We must at least examine whether this process is really so wonderful, and whether we cannot form a tenable conception of a completely non-miraculous origin of the first primary organism. We might then be able entirely to reject miracle in creation.

It will be necessary for this purpose, first of all, to go back further into the past, and to examine the history of the creation of the earth. Going back still further, we shall find it necessary to consider the history of the creation of the whole universe in its most general outlines. All my readers undoubtedly know that from the structure of the earth, as it is at present known to us, the notion has been derived, and as yet has not been refuted, that its interior is in a fiery fluid condition, and that the firm crust, composed of different strata, on the surface of which organisms are living, forms only a very thin pellicle or shell round the fiery fluid centre. We have arrived at this idea by different confirmatory experiments and reasonings. In the first place, the observation that the temperature of the earth's crust continually increases towards the centre is in favor of this supposition. The deeper we descend the greater the warmth of the ground, and in such proportion, that with every 100 feet the temperature increases about one degree. At a depth of six miles, therefore, a heat of 1500 degrees would be attained, sufficient to keep most of the firm substances of our earth's crust in a molten, fiery, fluid state. This depth, however, is only the 286th part of the whole diameter of the earth (1717 miles). We further know that springs which rise out of a considerable depth possess a very high temperature, and sometimes even throw water up to the surface in a boiling state. Lastly, very important proofs are furnished by volcanic phenomena, the eruption of fiery fluid masses of stone bursting through certain parts of the earth's crust. All these phenomena lead us with great certainty to the important assumption that the firm crust of the earth forms only quite a small fraction, not nearly the one thousandth part of the whole diameter of the terrestrial globe, and that the rest is still for the most part in a molten or fiery fluid state.

Now if, starting with this assumption, we reflect on the ancient history of the development of the globe, we are logically carried back a step further, namely, to the assumption that at an earlier date the whole earth was a fiery fluid body, and that the formation of a thin, stiffened crust on the surface was only a later process. Only gradually, by radiating its intrinsic heat into the cold space of the universe, has the surface of the glowing ball become condensed into a thin crust. That the temperature of the earth in remote times was much higher than it is now, is proved by many phenomena. Among other things, this is rendered probable by the equal distribution of organisms in remote times of the earth's history. While at present, as is well known, the different populations of animals and plants correspond to the different zones of the earth and their appropriate temperature, in earlier times this was distinctly not the case.

We see from the distribution of fossils in the remoter ages, that it was only at a very late date, in fact, at a comparatively recent period of the organic history of the earth (at the beginning of the so-called cænolithic or tertiary period), that a separation of zones and of the corresponding organic populations occurred. During the immensely long primary and secondary periods, tropical plants, which require a very high degree of temperature, lived not only in the present torrid zone, under the equator, but also in the present temperate and frigid zones. Many other phenomena also demonstrate a gradual decrease of the temperature of the globe as a whole, and especially a late and gradual cooling of the earth's crust about the poles. Bronn, in his excellent "Investigations of the Laws of Development of the Organic World," has collected numerous geological and palæontological proofs of this fact.

These phenomena and the mathematico-astronomical knowledge of the structure of the universe justify the theory that, inconceivable ages ago, long before the first existence of organisms, the whole earth was a fiery fluid globe. Now, this theory corresponds with the grand theory of the origin of the universe, and especially of our planetary system, which, on the ground of mathematical and astronomical facts, was put forward in 1755 by our critical philosopher Kant, and was later more thoroughly established by the celebrated mathematicians, Laplace and Herschel. This cosmogeny, or theory of the development of the universe, is now almost universally acknowledged; it has not been replaced by a better one, and mathematicians, astronomers, and geologists have continually, by various arguments, strengthened its position.

Kant's cosmogeny maintains that the whole universe, inconceivable ages ago, consisted of a gaseous chaos. All the substances which are found at present separated on the earth, and other bodies of the universe, in different conditions of density—in the solid, semi fluid, liquid, and elastic fluid or gaseous states of aggregation—originally constituted together one single homogeneous mass, equally filling up the space of the universe, which, in consequence of an extremely high degree of temperature, was in an exceedingly thin gaseous or nebulous state. The millions of bodies in the universe which at present form the different solar systems did not then exist. They originated only in consequence of a universal rotatory movement, or rotation, during which a number of masses acquired greater density than the remaining gaseous mass, and then acted upon the latter as central points of attraction. Thus arose a separation of the chaotic primary nebula, or gaseous universe, into a number of rotating nebulous spheres, which became more and more condensed. Our solar system was such a gigantic gaseous or nebulous ball, all the particles of which revolved round a common central point, the solar nucleus. The nebulous ball itself, like all the rest, in consequence of its rotatory movement, assumed a spheroidal or a flattened globular form.

While the centripetal force attracted the rotating particles nearer and nearer to the firm central point of the nebulous ball, and thus condensed the latter more and more, the centrifugal force, on the other hand, always tended to separate the peripheral particles further and further from it, and to hurl them off. On the equatorial sides of the ball, which was flattened at both poles, this centrifugal force was strongest, and as soon as, by increase of density, it attained predominance over the centripetal force, a circular nebulous ring separated itself from the rotating ball. This nebulous ring marked the course of future planets. The nebulous mass of the ring gradually condensed, and became a planet, which revolved round its own axis, and at the same time rotated round the central body.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Christianity threatens men with damnation if the use of their reason leads them to conclusions unfavorable to its claims. The Romish Church, claiming to be an infallible standard in the matters of faith, requires unconditional acceptance of her teachings, whatever reason may seem to teach. The Protestant denominations boast that they take the scriptures for their guide, that they encourage the study thereof, and the exercise of private judgment respecting their teachings; at the same time they declare that disbelief of, or doubt concerning them is a crime, punishable, if not repented of, with eternal torment; that rejection of any of the prominent doctrines of orthodoxy is attended with the greatest danger—danger of being damned; that when the scriptures and reason clash, the latter should be subordinate to the former. Thus does Protestant, as well as Catholic Christianity discourage investigation and love of truth, by instilling into the mind unmanly fears respecting the consequences of coming to conclusions in conflict with accepted dogmas. How can a man, educated to believe a system that forbids doubting—the beginning of all wisdom—regarding its truth, make an impartial examination of its claims, or the claims of other systems opposed to it, or investigate without fear or favor questions that are related to it?

Materialism by teaching that there can be no higher authority than the enlightened reason of man, to which all other standards should be subjected, that there are no subjects too sacred to be investigated, that skepticism regarding questions admitting of reasonable doubt should be encouraged rather than condemned, necessarily promotes free inquiry, untrammeled investigation, a fearless exercise of reason, and a steadfast love of truth.

Christianity teaches that woman is man's inferior and enjoins submission on her part. Both the Old and the New Testament teach this. The latter teaches that as the Church is subject to Christ, so should wives be to their own husbands in everything, (Eph., v, 22-23), that the husband is head of the woman as Christ is head of the Church; that woman should not be permitted to speak in public, but to be under obedience, as also saith the law; that they should not be permitted to teach but to learn in silence with all subjection, for the reason that "Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived but woman being deceived was in the transgression" (1 Tim., ii, 11-15.) Christians of this liberal age are getting ashamed of these teachings, which did woman such infinite harm in the early ages, when woman was regarded as a degraded being, so low, indeed, that she was forbidden by a council from taking the sacrament in her naked hands; but the idea of the subordinate position of woman is an essential part of the Christian system, which plainly teaches that while man was made for himself and the glory of God, woman was made specially for man, and that through her came sin into the world. Theodore Cuyler, of Brooklyn, was brought before an ecclesiastical court, and tried, convicted, and censured for allowing a lady to occupy his pulpit. His accusers acted consistently.

Materialists, rejecting the teachings of Moses and Paul, say that woman is man's equal and companion, that there should be no feeling of superiority or inferiority on account of sex. While the Church has perpetuated from generation to generation the notion of woman's subordinate position, has endeavored to circumscribe her sphere of action and usefulness, to shut her out from places of honor and trust, and to close every avenue of employment by which she could acquire a competency in life, Materialists have, consistently with their views, labored to overcome the influence of the Church respecting woman, and to emancipate her from the trammels which centuries of ignorance and superstition have imposed upon her.

The sacred books of Christianity sanction human slavery and oppression. The God of the Old Testament expressly commanded the buying and selling of men and women. The New Testament, although written when slavery existed in every province and almost every family in Rome, contains no word in condemnation of this institution. On the contrary, Paul, the great apostle of the Gentiles, of whom it is said, he had not shunned to declare "all the counsel of God," (Acts xx, 27,) said "Let as many servants as are under the yoke, count their masters worthy of all honor" (1 Tim. vi, 1, 2, "Servants be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle but also to the froward, "(Titus ii, 9). "Let every soul," says Paul, "be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God; whosoever, therefore, resisteth the powers, resisteth the ordinances of God, and shall receive to themselves damnation." (Rom. xiii, 1.) "Submit yourselves," says Peter, "unto every ordinance for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the King as supreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers." (1 Peter xi, 13.) Neither Christ nor his apostles ever taught the injustice of slavery, or the inalienable rights of man. Slavery existed in Rome for nearly a thousand years after the establishment of Christianity, and the number of slaves in the Roman Empire under Christianity was greater than under Paganism.

As rationalism has advanced, these teachings have lost their prominence, although they may fairly be considered a part of the Christian system.

Materialists, rejecting the so-called "divine" standards and consecrated errors of the past, long ago taught the wrong and injustice of slavery, and by opposing the notion that all power is from God, and that "kings rule by right divine" they have encouraged popular government and social freedom. In France and England, and Germany and America, Atheists have been the warmest friends of freedom, and the most unyielding foes of slavery and despotism. While the churches were encouraging slavery in this country, the "Infidels" generally were educating the people up to an appreciation of its unjust character, and pernicious influence. Christianity, adding meanness and falsehood to its crimes against reform and progress, now claims the credit of having prepared the people to abolish slavery, when the fact is, the whole influence of the system was in favor of slavery, and its advocates brought the teachings of the Bible to sustain it, until the progress of liberal and humane sentiments produced a change in public sentiment.

Christianity commands us to take no thought for the morrow and refers us, as evidence that God will take care of us without work, to the lilies of the field, which "toil not neither do they spin." Once this injunction was carried out, and immense multitudes wandered over Europe, or lived in monasteries, diverting the mind from industrial pursuits and prolonging the darkness that hovered over Christendom. Nowadays, Christians "honor the command more in the breach than in the observance." And to act with seeming consistency, they put an interpretation on the teaching which makes it unexceptionable, although in obvious opposition to the meaning intended by Jesus, and understood by those who followed him about Judea.

THE composition of Tula silver, which was long kept a secret, has been at length discovered. It consists of nine parts of silver, one part of lead, and one part of bismuth. The metals, in the proportions stated, are melted together, and when saturated with sulphur the alloy takes on a beautiful steel-blue tint.

PROF. ASA GRAY, in the Journal of Science and Art, says it is remarkable that the barberry, which up to this time has not spread into the interior, was so prolific in Massachusetts as early as 1764 that the province, on June 10th of that year, passed an act "to prevent damage to English grain arising from barberry bushes."

IN a paper on the crystallization of silica in the dry way, P. Hautefaville states that tungstate of soda exerts more energetic action than phosphate of soda, even at lower temperature, thus permitting its employment for the production of the numerous silicates, more or less fusible, associated with silica in rocks.

NO. XXII.

BOTANY.—CONCLUDED.

My Dear Readers: Another week of very hot weather has passed by, and I am aware that many of you feel oppressed and exhausted with the protracted heated term. It is popularly supposed that I am able to endure a very high degree of heat, and I am free to say that I am not aware of being put to any inconvenience by any amount of caloric I am necessitated to endure. You are not organized and constituted just as I am, and I am aware that you are far more susceptible to the high temperatures than one constituted like myself. There is a very consolatory consideration to be indulged in in connection with this heated weather, and that is, that it will be of very limited duration. In a few weeks it will be as cold as you can reasonably wish, and in still a few more weeks you will be blowing your fingers to keep them warm, and slapping your shoulders and sides to quicken the circulation of the benumbed sanguinary fluid. Patience under the visitation of all discomforts and inconveniences is an excellent quality to cultivate. It is a plant which for real utility is not excelled by any recognized in the science of botany which we have been considering. It is highly probable that the subject of botany is a little dry and heavy, or that there is too much detail in it to suit all of you. It cannot be expected that you will all take the same amount of interest in the study of this branch of natural history that I do, so I feel admonished to hasten on with the points I wish yet to touch upon, and let this letter suffice for what I now have to say upon the subject of this interesting study.

I closed my last in the consideration of the sexual organization of plants, and more especially with the female organs. I have a little more to say in continuation of this branch of the subject. The style proceeds from the summit of the carpel and may be regarded as a prolongation of it in an upward direction. It consists not merely of the midrib, but of the vascular and cellular tissue of the carpel, and when carefully examined is found to be traversed by a narrow canal in which there are some loose projecting cells, a continuation of the placenta, constituting what is called conducting tissue, which ends in the stigma. This is particularly abundant when the pistil is ready for fertilization. The form of the style is usually cylindrical, more or less filiform and simple; sometimes it is grooved on one side, at other times it is flat, thick, angular, compressed, and even petaloid, as in iris and canna. It may be smooth and covered with glands and hairs. These hairs often aid in the application of the pollen to the stigma and are called collecting hairs. These hairs during the upward development of the style come in contact with the already ripened pollen and carry it up along with them ready to be applied by insects to the mature stigma of other flowers. The styles of a syncarpous pistil may be either separate or united; when separate they alternate with the septa; when united completely they are called simple. When the union is partial then the style is said to be bifed, trifed, multifed, according as it is two-clift, three-clift, many-clift. The length of the style is determined by the relation which ought to subsist between the position of the stigma and that of the anthers, so as to allow the proper application of the pollen. In some cases the ovary passes insensibly into the style, as in Digitalis, in other instances there is a marked transition from one to the other. The style may remain persistent, or it may fall off after fertilization is accomplished and thus be deciduous.

The stigma is the termination of the conducting tissue of the style, and is usually in direct communication with the placenta. The stigma consists of loose cellular tissue, and secretes a viscid matter which detains the pollen and causes it to protrude tubes. This secreting portion is, strictly speaking, the true stigma, but the name is generally applied to all the divisions of the style on which the stigmatic apparatus is situated.

Transformations of the pistil are of frequent occurrence, and depend generally on a portion of a certain number of carpels and on adhesion of various kinds. Pistils of a succulent nature sometimes assume the form of a pod, like that of a pea. Occasionally stamens are changed into carpels, and at other times the carpels are transformed into stamens and bear pollen.

The ovule is the body attached to the placenta, and destined to become the seed. Ovules are most usually produced on the margins of the carpellary leaves, but are also formed over the whole surface of the leaf. In other instances they rise from the floral axis itself, either as terminal buds or as lateral buds. The position of the ovule relative to the ovary varies. When there is a single ovule, which has its axis vertical, it may be attached to the placenta at the base of the ovary, and it is then erect; or it may be inserted a little above the base, on a parietal placenta with its apex upwards, and then is ascending. It may hang from an apicular placenta at the summit of the ovary, its apex being directed downwards, and is inverted or pendulous; or from a pariental placenta near the summit, and then is suspended.

When the pistil has reached a certain stage of its growth it becomes ready for fertilization. Pollination having been effected, and the pollen-grain having reached the stigma in angiosperms, the summit of the nucleus in gymnosperms, it is detained there, and the viscid secretion from the glands of the stigma in the former case, and the moisture of the ovule in the latter, induce the protrusion of the intine as a pollen-tube through the pores or points of perforation of the grain, many or few tubes being formed according to the number of pores. The pollen-tube or tubes pass down the canal through the tissue of the style when present, and reach the interior of the ovary in angiosperms, and then pass to the micropyle of the ovule, one pollen-tube going to each ovule.

The granular protoplasmic matter in the pollen (fovilla) is transmitted to the embryonal vesicle, and fertilization is effected. Consequent upon this, after a longer or shorter period, those changes commence in the embryonal vesicle which result in the formation of the embryo plant, the ovule also undergoing changes which convert it into the seed and fit it for a protective covering and a store of nutriment for the embryo. Nor are the efforts of fertilization confined to the ovule; they extend to other parts of the plant. The ovary enlarges, and, with the seeds enclosed, constitutes the fruit, frequently incorporated with which are other parts of the flower, as receptacle, calyx, etc.

After fertilization various changes take place in the parts of the flower Those more immediately concerned in the process, the anther and stigma, rapidly wither and decay, while the filaments and style often remain for some time; the floral envelopes become dry, the petals fall, and the sepals are either deciduous or remain persistent in an attenuated form; the ovary becomes enlarged, forming the pericarp; the ovules are developed as the seeds, containing the embryo plant. The term fruit is strictly applied to the mature pistil or ovary, with the seeds in its interior. In popular language the fruit includes all those parts which exhibit a striking change as the result of fertilization. In general, the fruit is not ripened unless fertilization has been effected, but cases occur in which the fruit swells and becomes, to all appearances, perfect, while no seeds are produced. Thus there are seedless oranges, grapes, and pineapples. When the ovules are unfertilized, it is common to find that the ovary withers and does not come to maturity; but in the case of bananas, plantains, and bread-fruit, the non-development of seeds seems to lead to a larger growth and a greater succulence of fruit.

When the fruit is mature, and the contained seeds ripe, the carpels usually give way either at the ventral or dorsal suture, or at both, and so allow the seeds to escape. The fruit in this case is dehiscent. But some fruits are indehiscent, falling to the ground entire, and the seeds eventually reaching the soil by their decay.

By dehiscence the pericarp becomes divided into different pieces, or valves, the fruit being univalvular, bivalvular, or multivalvular, etc., according as there are one, two, or many valves. The splitting may extend the whole length of the fruit, and the dehiscence being apicilar. Sometimes the valves are detached only at certain points, and thus dehiscence takes place by pores at the apex, as in the poppy, or at the base, as in campanula. Indehiscent fruits are either dry, as the nut, or fleshy, as the cherry and apple. They may be formed of one or several carpels. In the former case they usually contain a single seed, which may become so incorporated with the pericarp as to appear to be naked. Such fruits are called pseudo-spermous, or false-seeded, and are exemplified in the grain of wheat. In such cases the presence of the style or stigma determines their true nature.

Fruits may be formed by one flower, or they may be the product of several flowers combined. In the former case they are either apocarpus, of one mature carpel, or of several separate fur carpels; or syncarpous, of several carpels, more or less completely united. These different kinds of fruit may be indehiscent or dehiscent. When the fruit is composed of several flowers united, it is usual to find the bracts and floral envelopes also joined with them, so as to form one mass. Hence such fruits are called mullible, confluent, or athocarpous. The term simple is perhaps properly applied to fruits which are formed by the ovary of a single flower, whether they are composed of one or several carpels, and whether their carpels are separated or combined.

Simple fruits are either dry or succulent—the pericarp, in the former instance, remaining more or less membracious in its structure, and sometimes being incorporated with the seed, while it is in the latter thick, succulent and fleshy, or pulpy. The nut or glans is a one-celled indehiscent fruit with a hardened pericarp, surrounded by bracts at the base, and, when mature, containing only one seed. In the young state the ovary contains two or more ovules, but only one comes to maturity. It is illustrated by the fruits of the hazel and chestnut, which are covered by leafy bracts in the form of a husk, and by the acorn, in which the bracts and receptacle form a cupula or cup. The parts of the pericarp of the nut are united so as to appear one. In common language the term nut is very vulgarly applied both to fruit and seeds.

The drupe is a succulent, usually monospermal and unilocular, indehiscent fruit, with a pericarp easy distinguishable into epicarp, mesocarp, and edocarp. The term is applied to such fruits as cherry, peach, plum, apricot, mango, walnut, nutmeg, and date. The edocarp is usually hard, forming the stone, (putamen) of the fruit, which encloses the kernel or seed. The mesocarp is generally pulpy and succulent, so as to be truly a sarocarp, as in the peach, but it is sometimes of a tough texture, as in the almond, and at other times is more or less fibrous, as in the cocoa-nut. In the almond there are often two ovules formed, only one of which comes to perfection. In the walnut prolongations from the edocarp, which is of two layers, extend into the substance of the seed, and give rise to its characteristic, convoluted lobate appearance. In the raspberry and blackberry several drupes or drupels are aggregated so as to constitute an etærio.

The follicle is a dry monocarpellary unilocular, polyspermal (many-seeded) fruit, dehiscing by the ventral suture. It is rare to meet with a solitary follicle forming the fruit. Specimens of folicles are found in hellebore, aconite, delphinum, magnolia, liriodendron, etc.

The legume or pod is a dry monocarpellary unilocular polyspermal fruit, dehiscing both by the ventral and dorsal suture. Prominent samples are the bean and the pea.

The berry (bacca) is a succulent syncarpous polyspermal unilocular indehiscent fruit with seeds immersed in the pulpy mass, formed by the placentas. The name is applied to currants, gooseberries, etc.

The pepo or peponida embrace such fruits as the gourd, melon, and other varities of the cucurbitaceæ. The hesperidium is the name applied to oranges, lemons, shaddock, etc. The pome embraces apples, pears, quinces, hawthorns, etc. The name capsule, is applied to the fruit or seed of the colchicum, lily, iris, henbane, monkey-spot, etc. The siliqua is a term for the seed pods of the cruciferous plants, as wallflower, cabbage, turnip, kale, etc. The sorosis is a term applied to pineapples, bread-fruit, jack-fruit, etc.

Thus I might detain you very much longer in describing the various forms and descriptions of fruits and seeds, and with other branches of botany, but I presume I have already detained you long enough. If you remember what I have told you, you will do extremely well, and I will not burden you further in this direction now, but in my next take up another subject. I thank you for your patience and kind attention to what I have had to say about plants and botany. There is much more I would very willingly talk to you about, but we would have to stop some time, and perhaps right here is as good a time as we will find. I part with you now overflowing with good feelings towards you and abounding with the kindest wishes that you may not suffer unduly from extremes of the weather or the prevailing hard times that beset you. Next week we will meet again in a spirit of cheerfulness and delight.

Believe me ever your friend, Lucifer,
Vulgarly called "Splitfoot."

Comstock Still at Work.

In May, Comstock attempted to secure the indictment of Dr. Sara B. Chase for selling a syringe, but the Grand Jury before whom he presented the case threw it aside as wholly unworthy their attention. In June, Comstock importuned District Attorney Phelps to allow him to go before the Grand Jury for that month and present the same, with additional evidence against Dr. Chase; but the District Attorney, seeing that the Grand Jury for May had acted upon the case and dismissed it, did not grant Comstock's demand. But, with characteristic persistence and enmity, Comstock went before the Grand Jury for July, without consulting the District Attorney or any one in his office, with a bill of indictment already drawn up against Mrs. Dr. Chase, and induced the Grand Jury to sign it. When this was learned, Assistant District Attorney Rollins went before Judge Sutherland and stated the facts, showing that the Grand Jury for May had taken the case under consideration and duly dismissed it He did not deem it best to again open it; and as Comstock had gone before the July Grand Jury without the knowledge of the District Attorney and presented the case over again which had been once dismissed, and, as it were, surreptitiously obtained an indictment, he requested that the Judge set the case aside and order a nolle prosequi. This the Judge very properly granted, and thus Mr. Comstock was thrust out of court in disgrace. It may well be understood that he is in bad odor with both the Judge and the District Attorney and his assistant. He would now have to appear with a very strong case for them to pay any attention to it. Nearly all the city papers contained notices of Comstock's sharp practices, with comments decidedly unfavorable to him. We append what appeared in The Tribune, preceded by a letter from Comstock to that paper, written in bad taste and worse grammar, before he made his last ignoble attempt against an already deeply-injured woman. By the editorial remarks of The Tribune it may easily be seen in what esteem Comstock is now held by the press of this city. It will be remembered that that paper was, but a short time ago, considered extremely favorable to Comstock:

COMSTOCK TO THE TRIBUNE.

To the Editor of The Tribune.

SIR: I have just seen the card from the Rev. F. Courtney and your editorial notice underneath it. While expressing great gratitude to that gentleman, and indorsing most heartily what he says of the work and its imperative demands upon all good citizens, and the weighty reason for carrying on the work, no matter what opposition, or discouragement or the sources from which these emparenments come. I would also, say that you, Mr. Editor, are laboring under a great mistake in reference to my methods. There has (sic) recently appeared in your papers, certain Editor*ials* that have (sic) not amounted to any specific charge, but rather insinuated that there might be something wrong; which "insinuations" have done me great injustice, and prejudiced the cause before the public. You say

"He found a woman with good medical education, and, so far as the public knew, of fair standing in the profession, whom he suspected of a willingness to do illegal acts. Thereupon he represented himself to her as a person in need of the illegal aid he fancied her willing to give, and finally induced her to make what he called the illegal sale. Then he had her arrested and subjected to infinite scandal, and as the end of it all, was turned out of the Grand Jury as having no case, while it is now said his victim is about to prosecute him for libel."

What are the facts? Complaint came to me from most reliable authority, that the person referred to was lecturing to women and young ladies in the lecture-rooms of some of the churches in Brooklyn, that she in these lectures advertised her unlawful article to prevent conception. (On the day of arrest this person admitted in the presence of your representative, that she advertised them only in her lectures, that she had been very careful to keep out of the clutches of the law, and was also careful not to fall into Comstock's hands either.)

I called on this person, without any disguise, and did not represent myself as a person in trouble, but did ask for one of her articles such as she had had over to her lecture in Williamsburgh and shown to ladies there. I purchased one of these articles to prevent conception, to be used with solution of sulphuric acid. With a witness again, the second day I called and purchased another one, and that was my method. You do not say one word of disapproval because young ladies had these incentives to crime offered to them and brought to their attention. You allow them freedom to buy. (My attention was first called to the fact of one young woman being ruined and internally ulcerated by using one of these articles.)

You do not object to her selling, but you object to my buying, in order that I may thus secure evidence in a strictly legal manner to stop such nefarious proceeding.

It is true one Grand Jury has failed to indict. They called but one out of four witnesses. They ignored the fact that the law says, "Any article whatsoever for the prevention of conception," and with positive evidence that she sold for such unlawful purpose, with three other witnesses to corroborate this fact, with her own confession of guilt before the magistrate and others, I admit that one Grand Jury failed to indict.

That is a matter for the consciences of those gentlemen under their oaths. I would not exchange places. This much I am ready to do—to prove a violation of law on part of this woman by most positive and clear evidence. Let the present Grand Jury subpœna all the witnesses, and the Justice at the Tombs, and ascertain the facts. If this cannot be done, then I ask that a committee of three or five of the ablest lawyers in this city be appointed before whom the facts be laid so far as the public is concerned, and let them say if any improper thing was done. I am most happy to say, if the community will wait and suspend judgment a little, that the Supreme Court will soon decide whether I had probable and just cause for arrest or not.

Many slurs and insinuations have of late been made against me by the papers of this city. I say to you, as I say to the world at large, if you have any charges against me, submit them to the Executive Committee of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and you can very easily find out the facts. I will cheerfully furnish the minutest detail of any or all of my cases at any time I am deemed in the wrong, and the proper demands are made. The work must go on. Your attacks only make it more difficult. Please do me justice by publishing this.

Very truly yours, ANTHONY COMSTOCK.

New York, July 5, 1878.

JUDGE SUTHERLAND'S DECISION.

Charges were made against Mrs. Dr. Sarah B. Chase by Anthony Comstock, and he procured her arrest and induced the publication of articles severely condemning her. But the Grand Jury, in May, unanimously ignored Mr. Comstock's charges, and refused to find a bill against her. In the following month Mr. Comstock applied to the District Attorney for leave to go again before the Grand Jury, which was refused. Nothing daunted, Mr. Comstock went, without consultation with the District Attorney, before the July Grand Jury with two indictments drawn by himself, and the present Grand Jury signed these indictments. Yesterday, Assistant District Attorney Rollins stated these facts to Judge Sutherland in the Court of General Sessions, and moved that the indictments be quashed. Judge Sutherland granted the motion, the following indorsement being entered on each indictment:

"The within case was fully considered by the May term of the General Sessions and unanimously dismissed. Mr. Anthony Comstock made an application to Mr. Phelps for an opportunity to present the case again to another Grand Jury. The District Attorney did not think such a course wise, for reasons which he stated at length on the papers containing an abstract of the evidence. These papers, with the original complaint, across which was marked by the secretary of the Grand Jury 'dismissed unanimously,' are, and have been since May 11, on file in the clerk's office of the court.

"Without consultation with the District-Attorney, and without informing the Grand Jury of this prior dismissal, Mr. Comstock went before the Grand Jury and procured this indictment, to which, by leave of the Court, the District Attorney enters a nolle prosequi."

THE TRIBUNE'S REPLY.

The Tribune has again and again defended the general purposes of the work which has (unwisely perhaps) been committed to the discretion of Mr. Anthony Comstock. Of late it has been compelled more than once to express its doubts as to the wisdom with which Mr. Comstock conducted the work. In a card written a few days ago, he resented, with some heat and doubtful grammar, any question of the entire correctness of his methods, repeated his charges in the particular case in which the Grand Jury had thrown them out, and boasted of his purpose yet to make them good. We print elsewhere his letter, together with yesterday's record of judicial proceedings in the case. The one seems to dispose pretty effectually of the other; and we now repeat, with somewhat more emphasis, the warning to the members of this society, that they must either teach Mr. Comstock more discretion or lose a good deal of the cordial support they have hitherto received from the better portion of the public and the press of New York.

One thing follows: the Society for the Suppression of Vice, to which several honorable gentlemen are attached, will have to drop Comstock from their employ or share with him the ignominy he has brought upon himself and upon them.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

Father Sanna-Solaro, in a memoir on the same subject, argued that if the Sun is taken to be the principal source of atmospheric electricity, the facts, otherwise most difficult to co-ordinate, immediately link themselves into the chain of phenomena, conveying with them, so to speak, their own explanation. Father Sanna-Solaro is, in my opinion, one of the highest anthorities on meteorogical subjects, and his work upon the "Causes and Laws of the Movements in the Atmosphere" may be studied with profit.

VI.

At the same time there is anything but an unanimity of opinion as to whether the Sun is the main cause of the electricity by which we are surrounded. M. Faye, in a very able treatise in support of his own theory, says: "We know that there is a fundamental difference between electricity and heat or light. The greater the vacuum the more rapid is the propagation of light and heat, so much so that certain specialists, supposing a material medium to be necessary, propounded the idea of filling the infinity of space with absolutely imponderable ether. But electricity requires ponderable matter in order to manifest itself in the shape of currents or of simple force, attractive or repulsive. Electric experiments carried on in a place where there is an approach to a void, are very feeble in their results, and they come to a full stop in a laboratory where a complete void has been created. Thus, I repeat, the electric agencies in question must be conducted in a ponderable space. Now, we have seen that if the celestial regions are furrowed in all directions by numberless corpuscles, shooting stars, aerolites, remains of comets, and even, perhaps, by solar hydrogen, etc., these small masses of ponderable matter, accomplishing their distinct orbits around the Sun, could not possibly form a continuous mean like the air in which we set electricity into action.

"I should not have thought it necessary to insist upon this idea, but that my colleague, M. Becquerel, had recently brought it into prominence by his endeavor to connect the Sun with our own atmospheric electricity. M. Becquerel admits that the solar mass is incessantly emitting hydrogen which becomes diffused in space, conveying with it its own electricity, essentially positive, and communicating it to the stars on its passage, without, however, coming in contact with their atmospheres. I do not intend to discuss these ideas, merely wishing to point out that the hydrogenous emanations of the Sun would not constitute a continuous mean capable of serving as a vehicle of communication to electric repulsions or attractions. Repulsed from the Sun by the supposed electricity of the chromosphere, or rather, perhaps, by the repulsive force of the photosphere, these molecules would also be endowed with rotatory speed; they would, therefore, describe hyperbolic curves convex towards the Sun, and branching towards all parts of the universe. Thus they would speed along in separate directions, gradually getting further from each other, without being capable of exercising the mutual reactions which constitute an electric mean or a gas."

M. Becquerel still maintains his theory that the Sun is the probable origin of electricity, and has answered M. Faye's arguments in a treatise laid before the Academy of the Sciences, in November, 1872.

VII.

Before proceeding further, it will be as well to explain what is meant by the solar atmosphere, and the phenomena to which it gives rise. This atmosphere is double; the first part, which envelops the centre of the Sun, is called the photosphere. Like the region which it surrounds, it is the seat of vast chemical processes. As it radiates towards the celestial region it loses a portion of its heat, while the gaseous bodies which it contains, becoming cool and condensing into vapor, relapse into the interior of the Sun, to return afresh into the photosphere, and recommence the same transformation. Such is the explanation given of the first atmosphere by those who are of opinion that the Sun has no solid nucleus—an opinion which is generally accepted in the present day, and the reasons for and against which will be found below.

The solar photosphere, according to Father Secchi, must contain vapors of every variety, which, owing to their extreme levity, must attain a great altitude. If a large number of bodies, looked upon by mineralogists as elementary—precious metals in particular—have not been discovered in the Sun, it does not follow that there are none, for it may well be that these metals, owing to the great density of their vapors, are detained in profound regions inaccessible to spectrum analysis. The following is the nomenclature given to substances known to exist in the Sun, arranging them in the order of their atomic weight from the lighter to the heavier: Hydrogen, sodium, magnesium, aluminium, silicon, potassium, calcium, chromium, manganese, iron, copper, zinc, and barium.

Beyond this luminous envelope or photosphere, which forms the apparent limit of the solar disc, is an atmosphere properly so called, transparent, but endowed with a sufficient power of absorption to arrest a part of the solar rays. It is not of uniform altitude, attaining the maximum of height at the equator and near the spots, and the minimum at the poles.

This atmosphere, which completely envelops the Sun, is almost entirely composed of hydrogen of a very high temperature; it also contains a small quantity of sodium and magnesium vapor, and even of vapor of water. In it may be noticed aggregations of rose-hued patches, analogous to the flames which may be seen round the moon's disc during the solar eclipses, and which are known as red protuberances. Hydrogen is the main element of these phenomena.

VIII.

Father Secchi points out that, by virtue of the law of superficies, the inner strata of the sun must have a rotatory motion more rapid than the outer ones, and that the friction has not perhaps set up a motion of identical character throughout the whole mass. The points situated at the equator must be vested with a speed greater than those nearer to the poles, as is proved by the motion of the spots. He admits, at the same time, that the exact theory of circulation in the solar mass is not yet completely solved, and that we must for the present put up with hypotheses on the subject.

It also results from his observations, that the length of the solar diameter is to be decided by the amount of activity of the sun itself, and that the diameter of the disc is least where the activity is greatest. This unlooked-for conclusion concords with the general comparisons that have been made between the length of the diameters and the number of the protuberances.

The Sun is the seat of explosions which seem to be connected with the production of spots. Father Secchi has even succeeded in obtaining some definite information as to one of these phenomena, the results of which he laid before the Academie des Sciences August 5, 1872.

This phenomenon occurred at 3.30 P. M. on the 7th of July, 1872. At 2.40 P. M. there was nothing but a small luminous jet; the internal motions of the incandescent vapors were so intense that the luminous clouds were seen to change in shape in a moment; and at 4.15 P. M they had reached an altitude ten times greater than the diameter of the Earth, or, in other words, of 79,000 miles. This eruption lasted two hours, and was repeated the next day at the same point in the Sun. Father Secchi adds, that at the same date an Aurora Borealis was seen at Madrid and many other places in Europe, and the phenomenon was also accompanied by violent magnetic perturbations in many places.

The zodiacal light also extended [illegible] an unusually wide space, whence he concludes that the various phenomena are connected with each other, and that the great motions of the solar photosphere have their counterpart upon the earth.

The National Defense Association held a meeting in Science Hall on the evening of the 11th inst. Among the action taken was the discussion of Comstock's third attempt to effect the indictment of Dr. Sara B. Chase, and the opinion prevailed that something should be done to assist her in the prosecution of Comstock. Other matters in connection were duly considered. The following cash receipts and pledges for the Defense Fund were reported.

Synopsis of all Religious Beliefs.

BY MRS. E. L. SAXON.

Greece is the oldest European nation. Its history extends a little more than one thousand eight hundred years before Christ. No settled religion was theirs, for colonies from Egypt, Phœnicia, and Thrace settled among them. Their thoughts were cheerful and poetic; no anchorite preached torture for the good of the soul, and, among nations, Greece in her youth seemed to be a gay and bounding athlete ready to spring forward in a joyous dance. They had no sacred books. Minos, their first lawgiver, was believed to have received them direct from Jupiter. The poems of Hesiod and Homer were regarded as inspired by the muses, and the mythology of Greece and Rome is filled with stories of gods and goddesses mingling with men. A direct special agency controlled all things. Their deities were spirits of planets, and all familiar with mythology know its teachings or stories. They made offerings to the gods to propitiate them on all occasions; Jupiter, Bacchus, Ceres, and Apollo, being the principal ones. From Egypt they had an order of priests, descendants of Esculapius, the god of medicines. An image or healing serpent was kept in their temples, and the staff of this god is still represented as wreathed with one. Women were admitted to the priesthood. It was customary to sometimes sacrifice a human being to the gods. The story of Iphigenia sacrificed at Aulis to propitiate the anger of Diana, is familiar as the similar one of Jephthah's daughter in our own Bible.

The old Braminical idea of the atonement prevailed in Greece and Rome. Cicero says, the force of religion was so great that some have voluntarily sacrificed themselves to the gods, for the good of their country. Any one to read the history of Greece and Rome near the time of Christ will see how strong was the belief in a mediator.

They observed all religious rites, handed down by their fathers. In the vestibule of the temple stood a vase of holy water, with which all were sprinkled as they entered. A similar practice lives in our Catholic churches.

The Eleusinian mysteries in honor of Ceres, were very sacred, and celebrated with great magnificence. One to Bacchus was held on the twenty-fifth of December. Later, when Persian ceremonies were introduced, one to Mithras was held on the same day. In Greece theories escaped from beneath locks and keys of priests, philosophers discussed them freely, and from their different beliefs many sects sprung. They, too, taught the maxim of Confucius, "Do not to others what you would not should be done to you." Pythagoras brought knowledge of varied kinds from Egypt, and his scholars founded a sect of philosophers, whose theories tinctured the minds of men for ages, even to the present day.

In the teaching of Socrates, this sentence occurs, "The Deity sees all our acts, and is everywhere present, and takes care of all; if men believe this they will abstain from base actions, even in private." He made frequent allusions to a demon that accompanied him from his youth. We speak of demons as evils, the Greeks did not, and Socrates called his "a divine voice or supernatural sign." It would protract this article beyond all due bounds, to name the various learned men who claimed to have what was called supernatural intercourse with other beings, and to enumerate the various laws that were passed against what was called theurgy or magic. Since the foundation of the world the immaterial has sought intercourse with material beings, and as we look over the lapse of ages and read their records, one can only wonder why it seems so strange to us now. It is said, "the boy is father to the man." When worship is simple it is pure Deism, one great and powerful God. So it was when men's hearts were pure, so it will be again when men's hearts are enlightened, and their minds become broad enough to see that God has unfolded his goodness and greatness to man as his needs required. When men were far apart changes were slow to come; we communicate now with all the known world, one vast brotherhood; our religion is progressive, it appeals to all hearts, it satisfies all cravings, it is taking to itself the wings of the morning and sweeping to the uttermost parts of the earth. Let us make it beautiful, let us hold it pure, let us purge it of all shame, and make it lovely to behold. Men to be Spiritualists must be spiritual in thought and deed, and let every act be such as angels might behold.

I have now to approach the Jewish religion, from which our own is taken, and in the notice of it will treat it as I have the others, simply as a matter of history, for all religions in every nation were believed by their followers to have come directly from God, as sincerely as the followers of our own have believed the same of theirs. It has ever been deemed a wicked thing to question it, and the least doubt expressed regarding it led at once to the charge of Infidelity. Reason is a flower of the spirit, it blooms and its fragrance is liberty and knowledge. It was truly said by a brave Deist seventy years ago, "That the Bible was more read and less studied than any book in the world."

The history of the Jews begins with Abraham, the tenth in descent from Noah. The supposition is that he was born in Chaldea, and accustomed to their worship. According to Josephus he published the theory of one God, and being a man of wisdom and sagacity, he tried to change the opinions of others, for which he was persecuted by the people of Chaldea, and Messapotamia, that by the assistance and command of God, he fled to Canaan. He afterwards went into Egypt during a famine, and learned much of the Egyptians and their religion, but Josephus starts out by saying he will write nothing but what is in the sacred books, and the list he gives as canonical is the same that we have in our English translations, but he certainly gives many accounts that are in their tradition. Afterwards he declares, "I have delivered every part of this history, as I found it in the sacred books." I shall not enter into any account of the sacred books, so far as contrasting or comparing them; they are open to all. I shall only refer to them in connection with other religions and explain how they were handed down to us.

To return to Abraham. We read he returned from Egypt "with sheep, and oxen, asses, and men and maid servants." Hagar, one of these, afterwards became his concubine, and it is upon her son he first performed the rite of circumcision. Faith in spirits is plainly shown by frequent mention of angels, which in Hebrew means "a messenger." Wherever he journeyed, Abraham erected an altar and sacrificed. A prevailing opinion with ancient nations was, that human sacrifice was acceptable; he once came near offering his own son. Manetheo states in his history, that Moses was of Helliopolis by birth, and his name Osarsiph, from Osiris, the God; that he was the priest who ordained the Jewish polity and laws and changed his name to Moses. Such is the Egyptian story, and Josephus quotes it to prove his ancestors were of the shepherd kings. The story entire is too long for quoting in full.

Whether Moses was ever an Egyptian priest we can never kuow; he certainly did lead his people away from Egypt, and teach them the worship of one God, still his form of worship as prescribed bore strong resemblance to those with which he was and had been familiar. When asked by his people the name of their God, he said, "Jehovah," a word which contains the present, past and future tenses of the Hebrew verb "to be," and signifies "I am, was, and will be." On a very ancient temple in Egypt has been found the inscription, "I am whatever is, was, and will be." This name was held in the greatest reverence by the Hebrews. The Hindoos and Egyptians were also scrupulous about pronouncing the name of their great God.

Egyptian judges wore a breast-plate containing the image of two deities, ornamented with jewels, the names of these gods, truth or justice, and light or manifestation. When learned Jews translated their manuscripts into Greek, they translated "Urim and Thumain" into words signifying "Truth and Justice." This was the breast-plate Moses ordained the priests to wear. The Tabernacle was constructed on the same principle as the Egyptian temples. It faced the east, had a tub of water for ablution, had an outer enclosure, and an inner sanctuary, or "holy of holies," veiled from the congregation by a veil of purple, scarlet, and blue.

In the inmost temple of the Egyptians was a chest or shrine, surmounted by an image with wings. In the sanctum of the Hebrews was a chest plated with gold, and overshadowed by cherubims with wings touching each other. It is now the opinion of scholars that cherubims were the winged-bulls so common in the temples of Egypt and were so sacred in Chaldea. The word cherub, in Hebrew, means a plough. The ark had rings, through which staves were passed to be carried on the shoulders. In the ancient temples of Egypt, sculptured processions show the priests carrying these in the same manner.

In Egypt priests and kings were anointed with sacred oil. Moses prepared and consecrated oil to anoint the priests with, and laid it up in the tabernacle. In Egypt the priesthood was hereditary; so, too, with the Hebrews. In Egypt land was set apart for the priests; so, too, with the Hebrews. The priests in Egypt, alike with the Hebrews, both wore pure white linen and performed many ablutions. In both governments the priests decided everything—both were theocratic. In Egypt the new moon was welcomed, and offerings made to Isis; so, too, did the Hebrews, and made offerings to Jehovah. Sculpture in Egypt, long before the time of Moses, shows them offering mules, asses, turtledoves, and young pigeons; the same was prescribed as an offering by Moses. Egyptians believed in the fumes of incense, and sacrificed gratefully to their gods; so, too, did Moses, who says, "The Lord smelled a sweet savor."

Egyptians, with solemn ceremonies, laid their sins on a bullock, and removed the head far from them. Moses ordained the sins of the priesthood to be laid on the head of a bullock, and to be afterwards sacrificed; and those of the people on the head of a goat, to carry off their sins—the scapegoat. Both people attached peculiar sacredness to cows. Moses burned a red heifer, "flesh, bones, blood, and dung," the ashes to be used in purification. In Egypt, from time immemorial, it has been a custom for travelers to carry a serpent's image wreathed round a pole. Serpents' images of silver and brass abound in their temples, supposed, in some way, to be connected with the healing art. Sacred books say Moses made a serpent of brass and set it on a pole, and all who were bitten looked on it and lived.

Egyptians hated swine; so, too, did the Hebrews. Why Moses was not circumcised is not stated. He did not circumcise his son until about to return into Egypt, and then it was done by Zipporah, in evident anger and by compulsion. That Moses had not been is evidently implied.

Doubtless, many more resemblances would be found in the records of Egypt had they come down to us uninjured. Moses discarded all inferior deities, and led his people to believe that Jehovah dwelt in their midst. But that he had example of one great and invisible God among the Hindoos is proved by the extract from the Veda: "There is one living and true God, everlasting, without parts or passions, of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness; the maker and preserver of all things." Moses makes him mercilessly cruel, angry, and vengeful, with passions like men, as too many instances will show. He had to control an idolatrous people; how much so is shown by their worshiping the golden calf in his short absence in the mount. It was only be terrors undefined that he could control them. The law given by Moses to the people was not the law afterward laid up in the ark. He gives the first in a speech to them when he comes down from the mount. The supposition is that he has the same which he broke in anger. The next set he receives after breaking the tables is filled with ceremonials and observances different from the first. Any one at all conversant with the Bible knows how quickly the Jews turned after strange gods. In the reign of Josiah, son of Anson, the strange statement is made that the priests, in counting out the money that had accumulated, announced to the king that he had found "the book of the law." The pious young king seemed ignorant of the existence of such a book; and, when he learned from it that the worship of such images as he worshiped was prohibited by Jehovah, he rent his clothes in grief and terror.

The memorable captivity of Babylon happened four hundred and sixty-seven years after David, and five hundred and eighty-eight before Christ. The captives carried to Babylon were allowed to mingle with the people, and Nebuchadnezzar had many of the higher classes of lads instructed in the schools of the Magi in all Chaldean learning. It was there they studied interpretations of dreams and astrology in connection with prophecy. Daniel, and his kinsmen of the line of Judah, were in these schools; but Daniel clung to his religion, as did many of these tenacious people, until Cyrus gave them permission to return and rebuild their temple. It is stated that forty thousand men, with their families, returned, belonging, most of them, to Benjamin and Judah. It was to the latter prophecies pointed, and from him, it is supposed, they now took the name of Jews. The other tribes, carried captive into Syria, were called Samaritans, and much idolworship had crept into their law. The descendants of Judah refused to be friendly with them, and provoked a bitter enmity from the Samaritans which continued to the end of their history. From the building of the temple, under Cyrus, we hear no more of idolatry. Their prophet had, all along, told them their sufferings had come. From this, they restored their temple, and their hearts were fired with the hope of the deliverer so long promised. Their ark was gone, the shechina no more appeared over the mercy seat, the Urim and Thumain were lost—still they observed ancient rites with as much exactness as possible.

The restoration of the old ritual of worship devolved upon Ezra, a descendant of the priests, who is praised as "a ready scribe in the law of Moses." The Jews held him in high esteem, and he gathered the fragments of writing, old traditions, and old records, assisted by a council of one hundred and twenty learned elders, called "the great synagogue." A series of these ecclesiastical councils continued until the reign of Alexander the Great. It was necessary that the law of Moses should be understood. Like the code of Menu, it contained both civil and religious usages, and regulated trade, worship, and inheritance. A reference to the book of Ezra, and Nehemiah, shows the working of the law as expounded by Ezra. All planet-worshipers peculiarly observe the seventh day, but the Jews regarded it as a sacred day because thereon God rested after the creation; though, in another instance in the law of Moses, he says, "Because, in that day, God led you forth from bondage." This came on the day we call Saturday, and was called the Sabbath. Every seventh year was a sabbitical year; the land rested from tillage.

The most important festival was the Passover. After the lamb had been carried to the temple, inspected, and slaughtered, it was roasted whole. When all were ready to sup, a vessel of red wine and water was prepared, the master pronounced a blessing over it, drank, and passed it round to each of the company, some oblations were performed; then the master took unleavened bread, broke it, ate a portion of it himself, and passed it to the rest; then a hymn was sung. This feast originated our sacrament.

The Financial Problem.

I have read with considerable pleasure the various articles which have recently appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER relative to the financial embarrassment and distress of the country. For it is at the present time a question of great importance in view of the fact that the present pecuniarily embarrassed condition of the country finds no parallel in the events of any previous period. True we have suffered many commercial crashes in the past, but never before were we so completely prostrated with respect to the vigor of trade and commerce. Never before were all kinds of business throughout the nation so utterly paralyzed. Never before were so many of our enterprising business men so hopelessly embarrassed or so many of them daily sinking into bankruptcy. And never before did we observe so many millions of our citizens suffering for the indespensable wants and comforts of life.

In view of these facts it is evident the financial question is one of great importance. And a portion of the columns of every newspaper in this country should be devoted to the discussion of this momentous question, that the people may be properly enlightened on the subject, and arouse to their duty in the case. For in democratic governments the correction of such evils devolve upon the people. I am aware that thousands of people are cherishing the conviction that the financial problem is one that is hard to understand. They tell us there is something too complicated and mysterious about it for the common people to comprehend, and, therefore, they need not bother their heads with it. But a thorough investigation of the matter would show that this is not true. In the light of history it is a plain, simple question.

It seems very strange that we should have so many theories afloat in the country with respect to the causes of our present financial tribulation when we have so many volumes of experience compressed in the practical history of many nations which show exactly what is the matter. We have before us the experience of more than twenty different governments, which have tried our ruinous financial system, and always with the same disastrous results. While other governments which have established wiser and better financial systems, or financial systems upon a better basis have suffered none of its financial evils with which we are so often afflicted, but have enjoyed uninterrupted commercial prosperity. These facts furnish us with a full and satisfactory solution of the financial problem and point out very clearly the true policy to be pursued by our government. Three monetary systems have been tried by nearly all the civilized governments of the earth and with similar results in each case. These systems are known as: 1. The Hard Money System; 2. The Banking System; 3. The Soft Money, or Irredeemable Paper Money system. Two of these systems have been a source of almost perpetual evil, and an unmitigated curse to the laboring classes and the business classes wherever they have been tired or tolerated while the other system has been attended with exactly the opposite results, and on the contrary has secured permanent prosperity to all classes and all kinds of business, while it has been permitted to exist. In the name of reason I would ask if such facts do not indicate the true financial policy. I will briefly notice the principles and practical results of each system, and in doing so will occupy as little space as possible.

1st. The Banking System. This system has proved to be a deadly enemy to the interests of all classes but the monied aristocracy in every nation which has tolerated it. It is founded upon an unjust principal of monopoly which allows its stockholders to draw interest on money they never possessed and a rate of interest, too, which will ruin the business men and laboring men of any nation sooner or later. And then they are allowed to expand their loans till they become so "inflated" that they are compelled to suspend to avoid a run on their vaults that would drain them dry. In this way they forfeit their charter, but then they are a privileged class and are allowed to break the laws of the country with impunity. There is not a banking system in existence and never has been that has not been guilty of an open infraction of the laws in this way which if committed by a laboring man would have sent him to the jail, penitentiary, or gallows. But for money sharks and Shylocks laws are mere cobwebs. By the principle of expansion and contraction thus indicated the banking system keeps the business of a nation perpetually vacillating—up to-day and down to-morrow. We are a busy, active, and enterprising nation, and hence, soon regain our wonted activity after having been prostrated by this accursed institution; but we are hardly upon our feet before we are tripped up again and thrown flat on our backs. This has been our up-and-down experience for sixty-eight years under the banking system. Eleven times we have been up and eleven times down; thus rising and falling once on an average every six years; and every banking nation in the world has had a similar experience, and all of them will be subject to these calamities while they allow this great Boan Upas to exist and control the currency of the country. And of all banking systems our present national bank system is the worst in its disastrous effects upon the business of the country, or will be at least, when its principles are carried out, as it could not if it would and would not if it could furnish one fourth of the amount of currency or money necessary to keep the business of the country in a prosperous condition. It has, with the "money ring" behind it which runs it, succeeded in contracting the currency till we have but a mere handful left—only about $13 per capita—$13 for each citizen. It is as impossible for any commercial nation to prosper in business or avoid the calamity of "hard times" with such a mere thimble-full of money as it would be to run a grist mill with three gallons of water. Money constitutes "the tools of trade" and is as essential in business as the tools on a farm.

2. The Hard Money System.—The principal objection to hard money is that it is hard to get and hard to keep. And every nation which has attempted to make it the principal medium of exchange has been frequently swamped in business on account of the difficulty of getting and keeping a supply. For as it possesses "intrinsic value" (which means a value for other purposes), this counter-claim on it frequently draws it out of the channels of trade and thus cripples the business of the country. A vast amount of gold and silver is now demanded in the arts and sciences, and this demand is constantly increasing. And as this demand becomes greater or less, it has the effect to change the value of these metals, and thus alter the intrinsic value and premium on the money made of these materials which makes gold and silver, or anything possessing "intrinsic value" very unsuitable for money. There is on every gold and silver dollar two conflicting demands—one as a commodity and the other as money. And whenever there is an unusual demand for it in the arts, it has the effect to draw the money out of the channels of trade and thus cripple the business of the country. The unusual demand for gold in Europe a few years ago in the arts drew $30,000,000 out of Wall street in one day. On the other hand, an unusual demand for hard money will draw the gold and silver out of the hands of the veteran, and thus stop the wheels of progress in the essential arts of civilization. Such facts indicate it to be an act of folly and madness to have the money made of gold and silver or anything possessing "intrinsic value." And "hard money" constitutes the tools of the money gambler, and we will frequently have "hard times" while we use hard money. A money possessing intrinsic value will always be an article of speculation in the hands of unprincipled money dealers and speculators. While there is more than one kind of money, speculators will stand between them and grow rich out of the people by changing their relative values. There should be but one kind of money, and that made of a material possessing no "intrinsic value," then it could never depreciate and never demand a premium, and there would be no inducement to ruin the business of the country by contracting it. All experience proves this is the true policy.

3. The Soft Money System.—Money should be made of a material possessing no "intrinsic value," a material that costs nothing, so that it can be attained and kept in sufficient quantities to fill all the channels and keep them full; then we will have no money panics and no hard times. And it should not be issued in the interest of banks or private corporations, but in the interest of the people, and based on the property of the people and the credit of the Government. Such a system has been thoroughly tried by more than a thousand years of experience, and with uniform success. The republic of Venice tried it for more than six hundred years, Scotland two hundred years, England for about thirty-five years, and our Government for nearly fifteen years, and no money panics, no commercial crashes; no general bankruptcies or general pecuniary distress was witnessed by any of the governments during the reign of this common-sense system. Thus the money problem is solved and settled by the facts of history.

French Finance.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Truesdell in the T. S. of June 29th, says, "It is passing strange that any intelligent person should attempt to sustain the theory of a paper monetary standard by referring to France, when her entire financial history points to the opposite conclusion." He refers to the John Law's "wild financial scheme," of 1716 to 1726, and still later in 1789, the Government again abandoned her coin standard, issuing an irredeemable paper currency, the famous "assignat," and proclaimed by law a full legal tender for all debts both public and private. He is careful not to tell us, under what circumstances the assignat was issued. He would have us infer that it was the deliberate action of the government in time of peace—changing from a coin base to a kind of "greenback currency." He does not tell us that at this time France was in the throes of a great revolution—that the clergy and nobility had fled the country carrying with them everything portable in the shape of coined money and valuables, leaving nothing behind but the real estate—the vast possessions belonging to the Catholic Church valued at three billions of francs, and less than $500,000 in the treasury—that the National Assembly in the dire extremity of providing "ways and means" to sustain the new government and protect its life against the combined governments of Europe, "created the assignat," basing its redemption on the "confiscated property of the Catholic Church," instead of basing it, as it should have been, upon every dollar of property and products of the whole country. This note or "land warrant" (as Gen. Butler calls it) although unjustly based, proved a great blessing to the people of France in restoring order and that general prosperity to which the outraged and plundered masses had been strangers for centuries, but the assignat finally failed, and it would have failed all the same if based on gold, for the government that created it was overthrown by Napoleon, and he restored the confiscated property to the Church. But some time previous to the failure the enemies of the new government employed skilled workmen in Belgium, Switzerland, and London, to counterfeit the assignat, no less than seventeen establishments in London, employing about four hundred persons in manufacturing this spurious emission which was easily set afloat mostly in France, and was well calculated to deceive the honest people of France, causing them to lose confidence in it as well as in the stability of the government. 150,000,000 francs of it had been put in circulation, causing the rapid decline in value of the genuine assignat, which did not much exceed 500,000,000 francs.

Mr. Truesdell is not the first that has attempted this unjust comparison of "greenback money," with the assignat paper money of France. President White of Cornell University published a campaign document in 1876, entitled "Paper Money Inflation in France," in which it is evident that he was either ignorant of the true history of the assignat, or designedly to support his theory of "hard money" has distorted and falsified the plainest facts of history. In the same way the Church and clergy have misrepresented almost every fact of the "French Revolution," in their eager desire to make out a case against Infidelity. This every intelligent Liberal knows who has read on the subject.

The "John Law's scheme," to which Mr. Truesdell refers was a scheme like the Michigan "wild cat" banks—to flood the country with their promises to pay in specie when the "ships of the gold company" returned laden with gold from the great valley of the Mississippi, but little known and explored at that time. The scheme was simply one of the same kind that has afflicted the world from that day to this, a pretended "specie basis" that over-issue always has "sent kiting." But our friends seem to think that the present prosperous condition of France is "wholly attributable to her holding more specie in her vaults than any other nation." Ex-Secretary Bristow said in a campaign speech at Lebanon, O., two years ago: "That France, although she had gone through a desolating and expensive war, paying a large indemnity, and her home debt beside, yet she was the best off, financially, of any nation on the globe; and why? because she had managed her financial affairs more wisely than we or any other nation had." If we will observe her management we may profit by it, as it fully explains her present prosperity. In the beginning of her troubles she issued a large amount of paper money, making it a full legal tender, which remained nominally at par with coin, furnishing the arteries of trade and industry with a full supply of means necessary to keep all her industries in successful operation, while she has exported more of her productions than she has imported goods of other nations, bringing back coin to balance trade, constantly increasing her "stored wealth." It is the circulating medium that gives life and energy to business, the same as the blood circulating in the veins and arteries gives life to the body. Gold and silver stored in vaults can do but little good unless in active use. It is the "money of account" that keeps the wheels of industry in motion, and nerves the arm of labor—the source of all wealth. France to-day is the only country in Europe or the world which enjoys any degree of prosperity, proving conclusively our version of the reason. While Germany on the other hand, receiving from France $1,100,000,000 indemnity in goods and coin, determined to demonetize silver, and before the end of 1875, had reduced its circulation $37,000,000, and returned 114,000,000 in small notes (notes under $25), and not receiving only a small part of the indemnity in coin, soon found herself in financial trouble and widespread bankruptcy, the result of contraction of the circulating medium.

G. P. PURDY.

Whither?

Whither are we drifting? and what is to be the ultimate result of life in man? are questions which ever and anon, will, in spite of all our efforts to the contrary, spring up within the mind of every thinking human being. Who can answer? Is it to be as the Christian tells us, that man from a condition of sin and death may be raised to everlasting life and happiness through the intervention of a third party Jesus Christ, so-called, who stands in their faith as mediator between God and man? He being dual in his nature, insomuch as that while taking the form, life, and attributes of man, spiritually he is, or was, or both according to their ideas, God co-existent with him from all eternity. To say the least, this view of the matter is rather paradoxical, for how one can be three, or even two, and yet be only one, is an anomaly that the human mind never can fully comprehend. It may by faith implicitly believe, yet not understand. Nor can a sensible reason be given as to why such a dispensation as the so-called fall of man as told in Genesis, and his final salvation through Christ, should ever take place. To my mind, the story as told in the Bible does not present one iota of reason, but bears upon the face direct evidence of a glaring lack of that property. The idea of claiming for the God of the Bible all such God-given attributes as omniscience, omnipresence, etc., and yet claim that foreseeing and foreknowing what the results would be of his creation of the human race, he yet created and placed man upon this planet subject to such conditions, is but claiming for their Deity a quintessence of refinement in all that is unlovable, cruel, and contemptible, and that, in so great a degree as to render him infinitely more cruel than any character that has ever figured in human history. The one and only redeeming quality of goodness they might justly claim for him is that with the power they had vested in him, he was not even more cruel than they picture him. In other words, it may be asserted, and often is, that it is a direct evidence of his goodness and mercy that he only slaughtered thousands when he could just as easily have made it millions. And again, with a cruelty unparalleled, he placed his own son, a so-called portion of himself, and co-equal with him, upon the rack of torture and death. They call it an evidence of love. If it can be shown me that such a course, had it ever occurred, was either expedient or necessary to the welfare or happiness of the human race, or that such an act could be classed as an evidence of love when by mere volition of will upon the part of Deity it could have been avoided, I will cease to consider the Bible a fiction, and that its so-called inspiration and claims upon man, are neither more nor less than the oft repeated traditions of the Hebrew race dwelt upon, magnified, and reverenced, as age succeeded age until the date of their being chronicled. But as I have gone farther into the field of speculative theology than I had intended at the outset, I will close for the present and let some of my orthodox friends take up their side of the subject before going deeper. Yours, ANON.

More Abbotism.

We hoped to not again be under the necessity of alluding to the personal attacks commenced upon us by Mr. Abbot some seven months ago, and pretty steadily kept up since; but his recurrence, in his issue of the 11th, to the "forgery" which, in January last, he endeavored to show we had committed, seems to render it necessary that we should make some further explanation.

We have in these columns, as well as in an article in The Index, stated the facts pertaining to the "forgery" which Mr. Abbot has charged upon us, and stated nothing but what was strictly true. And though Mr. Abbot says, in the issue referred to, that "almost every word" we have "printed concerning" him "during the last six months" is false, we must insist that we have not been guilty of one falsehood—not one misrepresentation in the whole business. We defy him to point out a single instance where we have been guilty of falsehood. The boot is entirely on the other foot; it is he that has been guilty of misrepresentation (we can point out at least twenty of them, and have already done so); it is he that began the personal attacks; it is he that imputed to us dishonorable motives and conduct; it is he that charged us with being indecent and disreputable; it is he that has done all he could to hold us up in an unfavorable light and to injure us in the eyes of the Liberal public. We have simply acted in self-defense, and though what we have felt induced to say may not always have been in the best possible taste, we have endeavored to be truthful. Mr. Abbot's latest movement, to send to Messrs. McKesson & Robbins to procure further matter to publish against us, is in perfect keeping with his other conduct toward us. We repeat, we are not conscious of having made a single false statement. Now to the explanation.

When we decided to send out a petition for signatures asking for a repeal of the Comstock laws, we acted in perfect good faith and with the very best of motives. We were never more honest and sincere in any act we ever performed. We felt satisfied that our readers would take an interest in the movement, and would do all they could in the way of signing and obtaining signatures; but it was desired that an interest should be taken in the repeal or modification of those laws by those outside of the Liberal ranks, and it was decided to send a copy of the petition to the principal druggists, publishers, booksellers, and artists in the country, with the request that they obtain signatures to the same. To accompany the petition to such parties, we hastily drew up what may be styled an explanatory circular. It gave a copy of sections from the U. S. revised statutes known as the Comstock laws, and used arguments showing wherein the laws were wrong and why they should be repealed or modified. We caused the same to be put in type, and appended to it the names of such firms in this city as we thought were interested in having the law changed and would be willing to allow their names to be so used. We proposed to have the same stereotyped, so as to have large numbers of them printed for wide distribution. Before stereotyping, we caused several proofs to be taken of both the petition and the circular, and with them we called upon the parties whose names we had appended, and briefly explained to them the object and purposes in view, and left a printed copy of each document with them. Some looked upon the movement in one light, and some in another. Some objected to their names being appended to the circular, some were indifferent, and some, again, were warmly in favor of the movement.

No one was asked to sign their names to the paper. It possessed no legal value, and was simply explanatory. The object was to use the names of such as were willing they should be used, and to take off those who expressed objections. This was carried out. A few objected to having their names used, and such were taken off. Those who did not object, and seemed in sympathy with the object, were left on. That is the whole case.

When we called upon McKesson & Robbins we saw Mr. Robbins, and conversed with him upon the subject about half an hour. He received us very courteously, and expressed himself as strongly opposed to the Comstock laws. He said, emphatically, that they were wrong and ought to be changed. He informed us he had spent fifty dollars of his own money in sending a man to Washington to present his objections to the laws, and that he had written to certain officials in Washington, expressing in strong terms his objections to the Comstock laws. Mr. Robbins saw his firm name appended to the printed circular, and certainly did not forbid its use. All he did say was this: "Well, after all, I hardly know as I want our name to go out on that paper," and this was said in a weak, "half and half" sort of way; and we met it in this wise: "Mr. Robbins, it can certainly do no harm for your name to be thus used. The paper only calls attention to an improper set of laws, and asks for signatures to the petition for their repeal or modification. Your name is widely known over the country and will carry no little influence. Let it remain on." This seemed to remove his objections, and he certainly urged no other. He asked if we had seen D. Appleton & Co. We replied we had not, but proposed to call upon them next. "Well," said Mr. Robbins, "if they will allow the use of their name, we will ours," and then we left.

We have here stated the conversation as it occurred. If we ever spoke a word of truth, we have uttered it now. Mr. Robbins, strictly speaking, did not, in so many words, say we could use their name, but, tacitly, he did, or at least we understood him so. At all events, he did not forbid its use. We left copies with him, and for ten days or more no objection came from him. It was not until Anthony Comstock called upon him and threatened prosecution, etc., that he raised any objection.

On the twelfth of December last he visited our office and seemed very much excited and angry. He upbraided us for using the firm name of McKesson & Robbins upon the circular alluded to, and said his Christian friends had censured him very much for allowing his name to be thus used. He insisted that we had wronged him, and that unless the matter was made satisfactory he would prosecute us. We replied that we certainly had intended no wrong; that we had understood him to be in full sympathy with the repeal or modification of the Comstock laws; that all the objection he expressed to the use of the firm name seemed to be removed; that though he did not clearly authorize us to use their name, we understood that we had at least his tacit consent, but still if we had wronged him we were willing to make any reparation in our power; that it had not been our intention to wrong him or any one else. He again referred to his opposition to the Comstock laws, and the fifty dollars he had expended in opposing them. He took the occasion to say that he did not approve of our anti-theological views; that he had read one of our productions and he condemned it totally, and did not believe in the circulation of such matter as we printed. He said he was no Infidel (Comstock had probably showed him one of our "Open Letters to Jesus Christ." When he arrested us he seized all we had of them printed, and he had a goodly number to hand around). We answered Mr. Robbins that we did not suppose him to be an Infidel, and accorded him the same right to entertain his views that we claimed for ourselves, and that we did not ask him to subscribe to our anti-theological opinions.

Let the reader remember that at that time we had been arrested by a U. S. Deputy Marshall at the instance of Comstock, and our case was still pending in the U. S. District Court. We were under bail, and had not yet had our examination. Judging by the precedents of Comstock's cases that had been tried in that court, and knowing the strong prejudice that existed against us among Christians, we did not feel anxious for any further prosecutions just at that time. We knew the firm of McKesson & Robbins was rich and powerful, and that a legal contest with them at that time was not desirable. We felt that if we had inadvertently wronged Mr. Robbins, we were quite willing to make such a statement as would place him in a favorable light with his Christian friends. Under these mixed conditions we allowed him to "bulldoze" us, so to speak, and we wrote by his dictation such an article as would show to his Christian friends that his name had been placed upon our Infidel circular without his authority. Perhaps it was one of the weakest things we ever did, but so it was. He stood over us in an imperative manner, and we penned by Mr. Robbins' dictation, in part at least, the note which Mr. Abbot terms "Bennett's Confession," and which, with evident pleasure, he printed in his issue named.

We said to Mr. Robbins that we wished to add to what we had written a full statement of the conversation we had had with him when we called at his office, of the opposition he expressed to the Comstock laws, and why we had felt we had a right to use his name, but he objected to it and said he wanted nothing of that, he only wanted something to show those who censured him that his name had been used without his authority. From an excess of good nature, from a a desire to avoid another prosecution, or from a desire to make reparation if we had in any degree done him injustice, we consented and allowed him to take away the paper without stating on it the facts as to the use of his name as here given. We regretted it at once and think now it was one of the weakest acts we ever committed. Had we known that he would exhibit the paper to the high priest of culture, respectability, and littleness, to be held up by him to the Liberals of the country as a proof of our crime or culpability, we assuredly would not have suffered it to leave our possession without the explanation which was justly our due.

It must be remembered that Mr. Robbins evinced no objection to the use of the firm name on the circular until he had been visited by Comstock and probably other Christians and was shown by them that he was co-operating with an arrant Infidel. Then he became very indignant and visited us in anger as described, ordering us to use no more of the circulars with his firm name upon them. We assured him we would have no more printed with their name on, and we have not. It is not a little curious what an effect a visit from Comstock had upon those whose names were appended to the circular. He seems to have frightened them or bulldozed them completely, and several who in the most emphatic manner had authorized us to use their names, denied it when he called upon them, and claimed we had used their names without their authority. By this it may be seen what Christian bulldozing is capable of doing. Comstock urged McKesson & Robbins to bring suit against us and uged them to allow his lawyer to take the case. It was understood that Mr. Robbins consented, but for some reason suit was not brought against us, though Abbot announced in his paper that it had been. One thing may be proper to state here, and that is, our attorney called upon McKesson & Robbins in connection with the case, and to have some conversation with them. Mr. McKesson was in but Mr. Robbins not. In course of the remarks made Mr. McKesson said Mr. Robbins was more excited about the matter and was making more ado about it than was necessary. Said he: "I think Bennett is about right." Mr. McKesson was evidently less affected by Comstock & Co. than was Mr. Robbins.

In looking back upon the whole affair we are free to confess that, with the best of intentions, we made two mistakes. First. We should not have appended to the circular any names save those who gave their positive, clear, and written consent that the same be done. Second. We should not have given a paper to Mr. Robbins without stating in full the grounds we had for using his name. We insist, however, that in either case our motive was good. First. We thought Mr. Robbins sympathized with us and that we had his tacit consent, at least, to leave his name on the circular. Second. When he charged us with having wronged him and wanted us to place him right with his Christian friends, we were over-persuaded, or over-cajoled, to sign a statement that the use of the firm name was unauthorized. We should in justice to ourselves have insisted on making a full statement or nothing. Let Mr. Abbot, however, make the most of it possible, and as often as he pleases hold it up to the view of the Liberal public. He may possibly depress us and elevate himself immensely by so doing.

Those who are familiar with getting up calls for meetings, invitations to speakers, attaching names to resolutions, forming committees, and in other instances, know that it is by no means uncommon for persons' names to be appended to such papers without their authority or consent, when they are known to be in sympathy, or at all events not opposed. The thing is done every day and nothing thought of it. Has Mr. Abbot himself never appended names of persons to documents when he had not their authority to do so? It certainly would seem, from a sworn affidavit by Mr. O. B. Frothingham made in the Superior Court of this city on the 9th of February, 1875, as appeared in these columns, April 27th last, in a communication from Mr. A. K. Butts, that such had been the case. About March 16th, 1874, Mr. Abbot caused to be printed and circulated a private circular bearing the names of O. B. Frothingham and others. Mr. Butts considered that this circular contained statements injurious to himself, and he commenced a suit against Mr. Frothingham for damages. In reply to Mr. Butts' charge Mr. Frothingham made a sworn affidavit in reference to Mr. Abbot's circular, from which affidavit the following is an extract:

"2d. This defendant admits that on or about the said 16th day of March, 1874, there was printed and published a private circular containing the words which are in the complaint set forth and alleged to be a libel, but avers that the same was published only to a limited number of persons interested therein, as hereinafter more specifically mentioned; and this defendant alleges that he was not the author of said circular or any part thereof, and that he did not direct nor take any part in the publication of said words, and that this defendant did not compose, sign, or publish concerning the plaintiff or at all the said words, alleged to be a libel, nor did he ever authorize, cause, or consent to the composition, signing, or publication thereof, or any part thereof, but on the contrary protested against the insertion of said words in said circular, and requested the person proposing said publication not to publish said words, and that the same were published without his knowledge and contrary to his request. O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 9th day of February, 1875.

"(signed) THOS. PRUDEN, Notary, City of New York."

On the strength of this affidavit we learn that Mr. Butts withdrew his suit, and wholly upon the ground that Mr. Abbot had used his (Frothingham's) name to a circular without authority.

Let the reader decide whether Mr. Abbot has a stone to throw at us for using names without authority. If he is not, at least, "as deep in the mud as we are in the mire," we do not understand the force of language. The difference between Mr. Abbot's case and ours is about this: The circular we issued was simply explanatory of the Comstock laws and had no legal force, while Mr. Abbot's was injurious to personal interests and was the basis for a suit for damages instituted in one of our courts. It is thought that Mr. Abbot might as well attend to his own circular and not fret himself about ours. Mr. Frothingham in a note which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, April 20th last, endeavored to relieve Mr. Abbot to some extent from the odium resting upon him, but he did not deny the sworn statement above given.

Before dropping the subject, one word more in reference to Mr. Robbins. He is a wealthy man; we are poor. We are informed that he rides to his fashionable church in his carriage. We seldom go to church, and when we do we walk in a humble, unpretending way. Mr. Robbins is a Christian, we are an Infidel; Mrs. Grundy and her numerous friends smile approvingly upon him but not upon us; he is in many ways more favored than ourselves, but so far as regards respect for the truth and the rights of others we claim to be not inferior to Mr. Robbins. We think our reputation in these respects will compare favorably with his. In his letter to Mr. Abbot he has made a few errors of statement which we will correct. 1st. He asserts that our statements in The Index of January 31, "are a series of willful misrepresentations of facts." This is untrue. There was not a single misrepresentation in our statements. 2d. In giving what he calls a true statement he says when we called upon him we desired their co-operation, which request he "declined." Incorrect; we did desire the co-operation but he did not decline it. All the objection he made was the faint one we have mentioned and that seemed wholly removed by the arguments we used. 3d. He said nothing in favor of the Comstock laws when we called upon him, but said emphatically "they are all wrong," and that he had spent fifty dollars to show the same to the authorities in Washington. Little or nothing was said about the circulation of obscene literature and neither of us said aught for it or against it. 4th. He did not ask us by what authority we had appended their or other names to the circular. We explained to him in the beginning that the copy we gave him was a proof and that we had appended such names as we would like to have accompany the circular. He asked if we had seen Appleton & Co. We answered No, but proposed to go there next. He did not say, "You have our wishes, and you had better see Messrs. Appleton & Co., and if they deem the law one that should be repealed, you may call on us again and we will give the matter a more careful consideration." Nothing of the kind was said. When we said we were going to call upon Appleton & Co. he said, "If they allow their names to be used we will ours," or words to that effect. 5th. "He has taken advantage of this treatment to do what he was expressly forbidden to do." Wholly untrue. He did not in any way forbid the use of their name to the circular.

As to the estimate he has made of us, it is probably nearly as favorable as the one we have made of him.

Our interview with Mr. Robbins at his place of business was entirely friendly. He agreed with us fully in opposition to the Comstock laws; he forbade nothing and commanded nothing. It was not until Comstock visited him and threw his influence over him and probably showed him some of our writings that his conduct changed towards us. When he visited our office he seemed entirely another man, and the effect of Comstock upon him was very perceptible. A number of persons were present at the interview. Let them be heard upon the subject.

I was present at the interview between D. C. Robbins and D. M. Bennett in THE TRUTH SEEKER office on the 12th of December last. Mr. Robbins' manner was much excited, and he seemed angry. He dictated to Mr. Bennett how he should write the paper, and objected to Mr. Bennett's making a full statement of the case. Mr. Bennett assured Mr. Robbins that he thought he was justified in using the firm name from the warm sympathy Mr. Robbins had evinced, and from his not objecting to the use of their name. Mr. Robbins seemed to care more for what his Christian friends said about it than anything else. Mr. Bennett showed a decided disposition to humor Mr. Robbins' wishes in the matter, and waived the right he thought due him to give a full statement of the case. I thought Mr. Bennett unusually conformable, and exhibited less independence of manner than is customary with him. He confessed immediately after Mr. Robbins had left that the paper signed was not right, and that he should have insisted upon making a full statement. E. M. MACDONALD.

This is to certify that I was present when Mr. D. C. Robbins called at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dec. 12, 1877, and complained to Mr. Bennett because his name had been appended to a certain anti-Comstock circular. He said he had been severely censured because his name had been so used. He said he was as much opposed to the Comstock laws as anybody, and that he had spent fifty dollars of his private money to send a man to Washington to oppose them. His manner was excited, angry, and imperious. Mr. Bennett replied to him that at a former interview he had understood from Mr. Robbins that he was in full sympathy with a change being effected in the Comstock laws, and that he, Bennett, had the tacit consent of him, Robbins, to use his name to the circular. Mr. Bennett seemed disposed to placate Mr. Robbins, and to sign such a statement as Mr. Robbins demanded. Mr. Bennett claimed it as an act of justice that a full statement of the case should be given as to why he used the name of McKesson & Robbins. Mr. Robbins pointedly objected to this, and said he only wanted a statement to show his Christian friends that he had not authorized the use of the firm name to the Bennett circular. More than once Mr. Robbins threatened prosecution, and I thought the threat had an effect upon Mr. Bennett. As soon as Mr. Robbins had left, Mr. Bennett admitted that he had done wrong in giving such a paper.

July 15, 1878. S. H. PRESTON.

One or two others were present but are now at a considerable distance from the city. Their statements will agree with the above and can be obtained if necessary.

In closing this unpleasant topic we have this much to say: We regret the personal and bitter character of it as much as any person can. We feel that it has been forced upon us. The attacks upon us of Comstock, Peterson, Payne, and Abbot have felt to us uncalled for, cruel and mean, and not one of them more so than the latter. We begun the quarrel with neither of the parties and said what we have said in self-defense. We think we did nothing to justify the false and carping attacks made upon us. If Mr. Abbot did not think we, or the seventy thousand, had a right to ask for the repeal or modification of an obnoxious law he certainly had a right to his views, but it was entirely unnecessary that he should attack us personally in the way he has, representing us as a defender of obscenity, and an indecent, disreputable person. It was not necessary that he should quote into his columns the advertisement of a man who had become our enemy and a friend to Comstock and to write to him to obtain something further to publish against us. We very much doubt whether he has done much credit to himself by this course, or whether he has added much to the cause of Liberalism. It must be conceded on all hands that it is a pity that Mr. Abbot's exquisite sense of culture and respectability and his intense fear of being in the slightest degree in favor of what might be considered indecent, his envy, jealousy or malice, should have led him to take such an ill-advised course. His motive and animus are pretty apparent to all who have watched his course towards us. Would that he could have shown more consideration, more liberality, towards others. We will now be extremely glad if he will pursue his own respectable, cultured course in peace and let us and our less cultured ways entirely alone.

WE LEARN from various directions that the petitions to President Hayes for the pardon of E. H. Heywood are being signed freely. We hope this may go on until goodly numbers of large petitions are filled. When all the names are obtained that can be procured conveniently let the petitions be mailed to the President of the National Defense Association, A. L. Rawson, 34 Bond St., New York. Let the friends of personal liberty not relax their efforts for the release of a brother who is suffering imprisonment most unjustly.

Spiritualism and Atheism.

MADISON, WIS., July 9, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In an April issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER you give certain views on Spiritualism in answer to a correspondent, and in your issue of June 29, in reply to another correspondent, you say that he would be justified in calling you an Atheist. Now don't you think the two, Spiritualism and Atheism, are incompatible? And then if you are an out-and-out Atheist, how is it that you entertain hopes of a future existence? I do not wish to make a controversy of this, but only want your opinion on a subject that is deep and includes all humanity. Very truly yours,

F. L. MOFFETT.

REPLY.—We must say to our friend that we do not consider Spiritualism and Atheism incompatible. Whatever has an existence at all, whether in this stage that we now occupy, or any other, is a product of the universe; it is perfectly natural, and not supernatural. Whatever is produced by a god is supposed to be above nature, or outside of it, and that whatever he produces must necessarily be not of the universe. If human beings have a dual existence, if this stage of being is the rudimentary, and the ultimate follows after, it is all in accordance with the laws of the universe—a simple provision of nature—and perfectly independent of Brahm, Osiris, Fot, Zeus, Jupiter, Odin, Jehovah, Allah, and Mumbo Jumbo. If man has a continued life after he lays this body down, he obtains it from the economy of the universe, and not from either of the gods named, or any others. The universe is the source of all life, and it is only a species of fetishism or idolatry to attribute it to the will of a wholly imaginary god which never had an existence save in the imagination of ignorant, superstitious man.

The life of man is just as natural, just as much a product of the laws and forces of the universe as is the life of a kitten, a bird, a frog, a fly, an oak-tree, or a blade of grass; and if it is true that this present life is but a part of man's existence, and that another phase or addition is to follow, the gods have no more to do with that than with this. Spirits, then, out of the body, are no more dependent upon the gods for their existence than are men in the body.

Some pious persons are imbued with the idea that they perform a very virtuous deed by depriving the universe—which we all know has a real existence—of the credit due it for the production of existing entities and transferring the same to some god devised by ignorant minds, and of whose existence no man ever did, or ever can know anything. This is a great error. It is wrong to deprive the glorious old universe of a particle of the honor to which it is entitled, and there is no virtue in giving credit to a god when he is not entitled to it, and more especially when it cannot possibly be ascertained that the god ever had an existence.

We are not able to convince any one that man exists after he dies and his body decomposes—we cannot say that we are firmly convinced of the proposition ourselves—but if such an existence is a reality it is the gift of no imaginary impossible being whose existence cannot be established. If any credit can be given to the messages said to have been brought from the denizens of the mystic realm—the spirit world—then it is just as difficult to find God there as it is here. No spirit has yet been heard of that has been able to find that mythical being or to demonstrate his existence. And thus it must ever be, if we exist millions of ages; we shall never be able to find any power or existence superior to or outside of the universe. To repeat, the universe is the source of all life, all power, all entities, all existences, and the gods, which men in a state of ignorance have dreamed of, have no existence save in their vague, dreaming imagination.

There is just as much proof of the existence of naiads, undines, byaderes, sprites, fairies, furies, gorgons, genii, gnomes, and hobgoblins, as there is of demons and devils, and as much of demons and devils as there is of gods. All alike are the products of ignorance and a distempered imagination, and all alike, with the spread of the light of reason and science, must retire to the shades of forgetfulness, and be submerged in the waters of oblivion.

The universe with its infinitude of possibilities and powers has ever existed and ever must exist, and outside it nothing has ever existed or ever can exist.

Of course no man knows anything about the existence of any god. What he imagines he knows he has obtained from somebody who knows not a particle more about it than he does. We claim no positive knowledge upon the subject, but frankly state our convictions.

Oil Paintings of Col. R. G. Ingersoll.

Mr. Charles Orchardson an unsurpassed artist from London has executed several first-class life-sized oil paintings of Col. Ingersoll—whom he greatly admires. Friends and admirers of Col. Ingersoll can purchase a copy of these excellent paintings at one half the regular price for such productions. To whoever will remit the sum of fifty dollars one of these paintings will be forwarded by express, and if it is not found to be a first-class painting, executed in the highest style of art, an excellent likeness and lifelike in expression, the painting may be returned and the money will be refunded, less the express charges. Orders may be addressed to this office, where specimens of Mr. Orchardson's workmanship may be seen.

We must say we have never witnessed better oil paintings or better likenesses than those Mr. Orchardson turns out. Those who secure a copy of his Col. Ingersoll may well regard themselves as fortunate.

If friends of B. F. Underwood wish a life-size oil painting of that champion of Science and Liberalism they can be accommodated upon the same terms. The price named is exclusive of the frame. Frames of all styles will be furnished at manufacturers prices.

WE WOULD return thanks to those friends in arrears who have honored our call for funds to help us meet our expenses. There are many more in arrears whom we still hope to hear from soon. Our needs are great. There is one tendency, however, that we are sorry to see. When pay day comes there are many who, in view of the hard times, say, "Stop my paper." Friends be not too ready to say those words. Be not willing to withdraw your much needed support. The paper needs the aid of every patron, and the harder the times are the more this aid is a vital necessity. Friends do not throw THE TRUTH SEEKER aside because times are hard, and thus leave it to perish and starve. It must live and survive these hard times, and it will if too many do not get chicken-hearted and cry out "Stop my paper." It is a doleful sound that we dislike to hear. Twenty-five cents a month for such a paper is cheap indeed, and it would seem that very few ought to feel like throwing it aside in neglect. Let the true friends of the paper send in new names to take the place of those who fall by the wayside. To new subscribers we send it three months for fifty cents. We speak for a thousand new names before the first of August. Sample copies sent to inquirers and Liberal friends everywhere.

LET the reader notice the advertisement of "Greg's Creed of Christendom." As we go to press it is in the hands of the binder, and we can fill orders for it by the time these pages reach our readers. It is one of the ablest works ever written, and is now offered to the public at a price much lower than ever before. The London edition is from $5 to $7. The Boston edition from English sheets $4.50. We have published the work entire, with an index not before given, at $1.50, postage included. Are there not a thousand of our readers who want a copy each?

The Chinese Question.

The Chinese question having made its appearance in Congress, I may be permitted to speak with reference to it. The Chinese in America are frugal, orderly, temperate and industrious. In these characteristics they are head and shoulders above those who bitterly complain of their presence. Let us be humane. Let us not trample upon the liberty of any one because he works cheaper, refuses to adopt the habits and customs of America, or to abide permanently with us.

Mr. Booth, in his argument in the Senate on this question, reasoned substantially as follows: There is a large Chinese population in California having no families, that is increasing, who work cheaper than Americans do, therefore they should not be permitted to remain in, and should be prohibited from coming to, America. Suppose each Chinaman in America was a patented machine working in the avenues of labor as well and cheaper than manual labor, should we invoke legislation for their removal, and prohibit genius from producing them? Labor is the parent of our material prosperity. It has ever been the pride of America to protect it and succor the oppressed of all nations. She is the world's missionary of justice and of liberty. She will not close her door against the oppressed of other countries, but will feed and clothe them from her bountiful harvests. No evil consequences can result from a free intercourse with other nations, or from their citizens becoming the adopted children of America.

It is proposed to prohibit Chinese immigration. To me, this is cowardly. There is, however, a feature in the question that is inconsistent with American liberty. They are slaves, laboring in the free atmosphere of our republic under Chinese masters, who make their contracts and gather the productions of their toil. They are the Dred Scots of China in American labor fields competing with free labor. That they are not freemen is a notorious fact. That fact was proven and established before the Joint Committee of Congress in '76, appointed to investigate and report upon the matter. They are serfs held and worked in America under the guise of contracts. They are Chinese slaves kneeding our material and supplanting free labor. Companies import and sell their labor to our people, and their women to prostitution. Lift the veil from the company and we behold the relation of master and slave existing in our midst, the slave returning to his master the fruits of his toil, and, at the expiration of the contract, himself to bondage. Is the State or nation powerless, except to break treaty with China and close the door of liberty against her and her subjects? Our laws declare contracts of peonage void. Why not make it a high penal offense to make such a contract? The poor slave is not to blame, he is a mere machine, owned and operated by the will of his master. Punish the master, his agents and servants who seek to establish that system of labor in America, and we shall have no Chinese immigration or labor that will harm or injure us. If they come here and settle with their families, a forced system of education would soon Americanize them. Let us make valuable citizens and people of all who taste our freedom, and let our shores be free as they ever have been to every nationality, and punish any and all who attempt to enslave or hold in bondage another.

That Chinese women are held and operated in America as slaves by Chinese masters, directly or indirectly, there can be no question; and that three-fourths of the males are held in slavery under the guise of contracts, cannot be questioned by any fair-minded person who will peruse and weigh the testimony taken by that joint committee of Congress. The question, therefore, is, Shall Chinese slavery be permitted or prohibited in America? E. D. STRONG.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

It is a trite remark, not the less just on that account, that when a writer narrates a marvelous tale, he is bound to tell us whether he saw the thing himself, and if not, who told him, and then whether the informant professed to have been an eye witness, also why the writer deems him trustworthy. Again, if the writer borrowed from earlier written documents, he ought to inform us what documents, and lay before us a full account of them, when prodigious results hang on the truth of his narrative. But these Evangelists, one and all, act as if it were matter of indifference to the reader whether they saw or did not see the marvels narrated. Consider only the story of the temptation, where the devil carries Jesus from the wilderness on to a high mountain, sets him on a pinnacle of the temple, and so on. Whence did the original writer learn the facts? Was he present? Certainly not. Only two were present, the devil and Jesus. Did the devil tell him? Or did Jesus tell him? It was a positive duty, an indispensable duty, to inform us. If in this age I were to write such a tale concerning a deceased person, and did not most definitely state my source of knowledge, I should be visited with invective or scorn. But it is the habit of the Evangelists, as with epic poets, writers of novels and fairy tales, to speak with precisely the same tone of innocent confidence concerning the most ordinary things and the most extraordinary; things of which they might have had knowledge, and things of which ostensibly they could have none. They know the dream of Pilate's wife and her message to her husband; the secret conferences of the chief priests with one another and with Pilate; the bribes accepted by Roman soldiers for neglect of duty; the dreams of Joseph and of Magi from the East. Numerous treatises have abundantly and diffusely proved the impossibility of reconciling these gospels with one another, not only as to great marvels alleged, but as to ordinary matters. Their proved inaccuracies disqualify them for delicate attestation. I can but refer to such treatises. I may name in particular, as at hand for Englishmen, the two volumes of Mr. W. Rathbone Greg, entitled the Creed of Christendom, and the English Life of Jesus, by Mr. Thomas Scott. Arguments based on details ought to be viewed in mass in order to see their overwhelming weight. Broad facts, so far as possible, will here be adduced. I shall begin with reasons for accounting the fourth gospel (whoever was its author) to be worthless as historical authority; to be as much a romance as the Cyropaideia of Xenophon, and in plain words, to be a pious fraud a deliberate forgery. At the same time the reader will remember, that frauds with a pious intention had not then quite the same guilt as they would have in modern England. Reputable fathers in the early centuries, defended them on principle; and Justin the Martyr in the second century is suspected to have been guilty of fraud himself in the advocacy of the books called Hystaspes and the Sibyl. That the correspondence of King Abgarus with Jesus, and the passage in Josephus concerning "Christ," are Christian forgeries, we all are agreed. Christians also beyond a doubt forged what is called the second book of Esdras. Among the Jews the book of Judith and the book of Enoch are certainly fictitious, yet strange to say, Jude (whose epistle is received into the canon) reverently quotes the prophecy of Enoch as holy writ, and carefully ascribes it to Enoch the seventh from Adam! It was certainly as deliberate a romance as the book of Mormon, which deceives men and women perhaps as well qualified for literary criticism as were uneducated Jews.

Every English reader who studies the four gospels is presently aware, that the three first are so like one another as often to have long agreement almost verbal; and that the style of all is so similar, as to give no notice from which of the three it comes. All critics allow that the three must have borrowed largely from one or more pre-existing documents: but no one imagines such a thing concerning the fourth. Its historical diversities are very considerable. Geographically it differs. It represents Jesus to visit Jerusalem and preach there on four different occasions, and affects an accuracy as to places unknown to the other gospels. As far as we could learn from these, his last visit to Jerusalem was the first after his baptism. Its diction is peculiar. The style of composition and the Greek are strikingly like those in the Epistles of John called the Elder. The mode of teaching ascribed to Jesus is wholly different from other gospels. Its parables differ widely in character from their parables; its doctrines concerning the person of Jesus (who in it preaches himself incessantly) gave far greater facility to Christian divines to build up a doctrine concerning his essential Deity, though certainly co-equal with the Father.

In the fourth gospel the Messiahship of Jesus is notorious and avowed from the beginning, and John the Baptist announces to his disciples the pre-eminence of the Son of God in a fulness and with a diction undistinguishable from those of John the Eldes. How empty and worthless as a historical attestation is the verdict of the Church, is eminently displayed in the high esteem awarded to the fourth gospel. "Harmonies" of the four were attempted at a very early date, and their difficulty was at once discovered; yet, what is of all plainest, the incompatibility of the fourth with the other three was not discerned. Its diversity, which confutes it, was esteemed an excellence. It was so profound! so spiritual! free from Judaism, free even from the earthly reign of a personal Messiah, of which, in the third century, many began to be shy. Above all, its special doctrine concerning the mysterious nature of the Son of God, here called the Logos (Word? or Reason?) of God, as in Rev. xix, 14, gained for it warm approval. But I now proceed to speak of its miracles.

Negatively, it is remarkable that it has no miraculous casting out of demons, a form of miracle which abounds in the other three. This cannot be by accident; a specific cause must have existed and deserves to be investigated.

Positively, this gospel contains seven miracles before the resurrection: 1. Water is turned into wine at a wedding feast. 2. The son of a courtier (of Herod?) at Capernaum, is dangerously ill of fever; Jesus, when asked to come and heal him, announces that he is well, which proves to be true. This, apparently, is the same miracle as that (Matt. vii. 5–13) concerning the paralytic servant of a centurion at Capernaum; but the variations are notable. 3. A man, cripple for thirty-eight years, is healed by a word. 4. Five thousand men are fed with five loaves and two fishes, all exactly as in Matt. xiv. 5. Jesus walks on the lake of Tiberias; again as in Matt. xiv; indeed, the style in these is like to that of the three gospels. 6. He gives sight to a man forty years old, blind from birth. 7. He raises Lazarus to life after he has been buried for four ydas.

The two last miracles are of pre-eminent importance, for, according to the tale, they were wrought in Jerusalem, were investigated by the rulers with hostile purpose, and baffled thoir intelligence; indeed, after Jesus had raised Lazarus from the dead, such (it is said) was their rage, that Caiaphas, the high priest, suggested, and from that hour the rest conspired, to put Jesus to death; shortly, also, the same doom was plotted for Lazarus, because his presence caused many to believe in Jesus. These miracles are constantly quoted with great triumph by the moderns, who are keenly aware that they tower over all the rest, so sharply defined is the medical problem, and so complete the proof, if the facts were as stated.

"The Champions of the Church."

BY W. S. BELL.

"What would society be without Christianity?" is supposed by the devout to be an answerable question, but this new book, published by the indefatigable D. M. Bennett, is at once a complete reply to the imagined invincible interrogatory, and a crushing representation against the claims of godliness as manifest in the disciples, apostles, fathers, popes, bishops, and clergy. Christianity is shown to be without foundation, in history, in morals, and in science. It proves to be nothing more than a borrowed religion, which lives and feeds upon ignorance, weakness, and credulity. Through all the improvements of the ages palimpsest like, the barbarism of the past reappears in Christian doctrine and in Christian practice. If it be "evolution" which defines the present religion from the religions of the past—if Christianity is but an evolution of the elder myths—it certainly can lay claim to originality in its propagandism by murderous persecutions. It has ever perpetuated itself by the blighting sword. It has riveted superstition upon the brain, and dashed out the brains which dared to reason and inquire along the lines of common sense. Spain, the once proud mistress of Europe, persisted for some hundreds of years in killing off her best men and preserving with care her worst, and has by the process sunk beneath the respect of all European powers. Another illustration of the fact that the Church can only be sustained in authority by the sword is displayed in the acquisitions, and superior claims of science which are now reforming and renewing the character of modern civilization. This new era has come about through increased knowledge, which the Church tries to extinguish. Some of the "Champions of the Church," lived in ages of great ignorance and superstition, and who thought it no wrong "to do evil that good may come." Describing the character of the religious minds of the first century, Moshiem says, "Not long after Christ's ascension into heaven, several histories of his life and doctrines, full of pious frauds and fabulous wonders, were composed by persons whose intentions, perhaps, were not bad, but whose writings discovered the greatest superstition and ignorance. Nor was this all productions appeared which were imposed upon the world by fraudulent men as the writings of the holy apostles." (vol. i, p. 40.)

Everywhere the writings of the Church teem with fraud. The masses were ignorant, and if religion would preserve itself they must be kept in this condition of mental darkness. Their mind's crammed with empty traditions and debasing superstitions, found their most palatable nourishment in dreams, visions, trances, revelations, oracles, witchcraft, obsession, angel visits, miraculous conceptions, resurrections, ascensions, and a world thronged with miracles.

A people in this state must of necessity be given to all sorts of fanaticism. They easily imagine the duty of visiting Jerusalem and the sepulchre of Jesus. They regard everything as holy, in the Holy Land, and hence every scrap, bone, or chip they carry home with them becomes a piece of the coat or trousers of Jesus, or finger-bone of one of the saints, which if it but touch a bald head will make a crop of hair spring forth in three days; the chip is transformed into a piece of the cross of Jesus. The Champions of the Church were the principal traders in such relics and holy things. They rifled the pockets of the poor of their hard earnings to fill the coffers of the Church and to provide luxuries and the means of gratifying their own beastly lust.

As a complement of this gross ignorance and fanaticism which characterized the champions of the Church, we find in every age that religion—the Christian religion more than any other—has maintained itself by the sword. War has been the handmaid of Christianity. War, horrible, devastating, and hellish, was necessary before mankind could appreciate brotherly love and divine forgiveness. War was essential to a heavenly frame of mind as a preparatory state before entering the celestial paradise where Jesus awaits his foes, saying, "But those, mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27). It is nothing strange, then, to find that all the great champions of the Church have been bloody-handed tyrants and monsters. The history of these champions is an endless repetition of fraud, licentiousness, perfidy, crime, and murder. In what other religion can you find such monster crimes? Where can you find priests and rulers giving orders to their executioners to murder thousands and millions of innocent people on account of their opinions? Where can you find such gigantic frauds as the Crusades? such damnable slaughtering as that of St. Bartholomew's day? or such infernal practice as the sale of indulgences?

"An adulterous woman who desires absolution to place her beyond the reach of all pursuit, and to have free dispensation to continue her guilty relations, shall pay to the pope eighty-seven francs, and three sous. In a like case, a husband shall be submitted to the same tax. For the murder of a brother, a sister, a mother, or a father, they shall pay seventeen francs, fifteen sous."

For a small sum of money, man could commit any and every atrocity which lust, beastiality, and revenge could arouse, and yet be free from guilt and sure of heaven.

Who ever heard of heathens torturing members of their own families for a mere difference of opinion?

People of all countries committed murder, but it was reserved for the champions of the Church to be the champion murderers. It did not sufficiently satisfy them to put a man to death for his mistaken views, but, like the cat, they must play with their victim to enjoy the sight of his writhing agony. They taxed their ingenuity to invent means of torturing their victims to the last degree endurable. They buried them alive, leaving their head above ground; they buried them in quicklime; they covered them with oil and alcohol and set fire to the coating, alternately putting it out and lighting it; they tore the flesh from the subject with red-hot pincers, and they poured hot lead into his ears, or thrust a red-hot poker in o his body; they strung them up by the thumbs; they hung them in chains, and swung them to and fro over a slow fire. Some were strangled by drawing small cords around their necks. Some of the common methods of carrying out the work of heaven were to cram a handkerchief down the throat, to flay the victim alive, or crucify him head downwards, or cut off his nose or ears. In other instances the eyes have been burned out with red-hot irons, the tongue torn out by the roots, and even the heart cut out of the body and thrust into the face of the dying man. Some have been sewed up in leather bags with serpents and then cast into the sea. Human feet have been forced into iron boots heated hot; and human hands have been forced into iron gloves heated hot. Some have been hung upon hooks in the chimney and roasted by a slow fire. Some have been mutilated, and their sexual organs torn from their bodies. Others have been forced to leap from housetops to fall upon spikes and swords.

There is no end to the novel methods invented to torture mankind, and all this hellishness done, too, in the name of God, in the name of religion, and for the sake of truth, love, and righteousness. All these things, and ten thousand other diabolical deeds, were perpetrated by the champions of the Church.

"These were Catholics—Protestants never did anything of the kind." These are the ferocities of the lion when he was young, but now he is old, has lost his teeth, and claws, and above all has lost his strength. It is not the lion's fault if he is not able to roar and tear as of old. Neither is it any credit to the Protestant religion that it does not devour the people, as the young lion of Catholicism, for it has no the teeth, or claws, or strength to do so. It is the same ferocious beast, thirsty for the blood of the heretic. It has the same God before its eyes, it reads the same Bible. It still commands over the death's head standard, "Believe or be damned." Its bloody career has not wiped out one word of that Christian history which has written all over the world in rivers of blood, that the objective point of Christianity was not the salvation but the damnation of the race.

And had not the new god Science hitherto so greatly unknown, appeared and illumined the world with truth and humanity the old lion devil with the champions of the Church would have sunk the race of men into that of beasts.

Protestant champions have not been as gross and cruel as the Champions of Rome, but it was not because of their special virtues but because of their increased humanities of the times which were developed in spite of the surrounding inhumanities of the Church. Luther, Calvin, and Knox were just as intolerant as their power would admit. They carried on all the persecution they had power to carry out.

In reading the "Champions of the Church," we see most distinctly that the Christian Church has been established at the price of oceans of blood. Everywhere its career is stained with the blood of the best men and women of the ages.

Catholics killed Protestants and Protestants slaughtered Catholics, Lutherans destroyed the Anabaptists, Episcopalians murdered Puritans, and Puritans executed Quakers, while Calvinists put to death Unitarians.

This system of wholesale murder is called the cause of God, and we believe it is. The God of the Hebrews looked with favor upon the slaughter of heretics. Is it not time for us to begin to inquire what it is that is "out of joint" in this God idea?

Read the "Champions of the Church," and you will see that the world needs something better than they have given us, before it can rise into the true career of humanity.

Educational Reform.

PROPER DEVELOPMENT.—RIGHT EDUCATION.

If the emotional nature were properly guarded, guided, and educated, much misery might be avoided, and much happiness attained to that we have now only faint glimpses of. That we have grown into a too excitable race, the great number of prematurely broken down constitutions and early deaths, the numerous shocking tragedies in social life, and the well filled asylums and prisons attest. When we fully realize an evil that is helping to desolate this beautiful earth, and making it a pandemonium, why do we not go to work and annihilate the destroyers. Although we may be unable to redeem the present generation, we may commence a course that will lessen the evil as time advances.

Children should not be burdened with useless acquisitions, leaving no room or time for the more useful knowledge of all laws pertaining to their nature, life, and well being, of every thing connected with practical life, especially in the department in which they are likely to live and labor.

The modern method of educating seems to be a course of cramming for a limited period of time, and then the child's education is declared "finished," as though the mental capacity does not grow with the years, sustained by food for the mind as well as for the body, which should only be given at such time as it can be received and easily digested, else it does more harm than good. Modern science indicates that the proper mode of educating is a course of training that will suppress extreme tendencies, and cultivate deficiencies, and so build perfect, well balanced, harmonious human beings. If we would study effect from cause and result, we would see that the management of children is too often erroneous and destructive. I believe there is generally more harm than good accomplished through public exhibition of children. To people who want to get up an entertainment, or to raise funds for any worthy purpose, I would say, do not make use of the children, unless it be in light drama, song, or dance, or something suited to them, but let children of older growth use whatever talent they may have for each other's entertainment, and their own improvement. We often subject the little ones to greater trials of courage and fortitude than we would ourselves be willing to face. The artillery of eyes loaded with all manner of magnetism is worse than "forty cannon" for a sensitive nature to meet. And many of their recitations are expressive of the deepest feelings that older human hearts are capable of. They naturally enter into the spirit of those sentiments which they have to give expression to, which conduces to the growth of their own sensibilities. For lack of proper direction to their emotional nature many become shipwrecked in health, happiness, and life.

At a lyceum exhibition, I recently heard a little boy about ten years of age rehearse the "Drunkard's Soliloquy" with a true expression of the terrible feeling of despair, recklessness, desperation, and madness. It was with unpleasant and unutterable feelings that I listened to him, for some five years ago my own dear brother was greatly applauded for rehearsing that same piece. He gave it full and vehement expression, and to its words a fearful import. He was then about the age of this little boy, and not many years after, this brother, who possessed that sensitive, excitable nature, through wrong management and untoward circumstances was made a raving maniac a week before he died. O would that some one could have seen that such a temperament and nature required careful training and management—that his mental activity being greater than his physical strength—the latter required especial attention and cultivation. Would that all could know that if such impulsive natures are guarded and guided with sympathy and loving kindness and are attended through life with congenial influences and experiences, they will be the most beautiful, loving, trusting, exalted examples of humanity. Otherwise if they are left to meet trying and disgusting experiences with no previous preparation, and they lose faith in those they love, and in humanity, they are apt to be so wretched, so blinded, and crazed, that they will run into recklessness. The more phlegmatic, unfeeling natures are less liable to do anything either very bad or good.

In managing and training children, we should consider that there is diversity as well as unity. No pattern can be placed before the educator in accordance with which children can all be educated alike. We need a system that will educe every individual power and allow each to manifest its genius. By this method the capabilities of all will be developed and better results achieved.

I believe that physical perfection begets mental vigor, and that in turn by appropriate tuition begets moral power. Love and sympathy, kindness and tenderness are as necessary to little children to develop them perfectly as sunlight is necessary to enable the flowers to bloom into beauty and fruits to ripen to perfection. We need something more than teachers who merely work for a living, and parents who dole out what they do to their children more because they feel obliged than from any sense of their responsibility and with warm spontaneous love. One great trouble is that those who have the most children are generally those who are overburdened everyway, and cannot do them justice, and I sometimes think it were better if the State owned the children, and that those who loved the work would come up with their grand capabilities, and their unselfish hearts to judge what each is adapted to, and make the most of the good there is in all. There is not so much talent in the world that we can afford to lose any. Let us improve our system of education. Let it embrace the requisites for both physical and moral training as well as mental. Let the general management be such as to develop all the good gifts and graces, cultivating the good and useful, exterminating the evil, excluding all that is useless. The most of us are too prone to leave the decision of this important subject to teachers and those in power, the same as they leave their priests to do their thinking for them, and arrange their mode of salvation.

I believe there can be such a just and intelligent arrangement of work and business as to insure each member of a family some leisure for rest, tranquillity, and study. We meet many people in middle life whose emotions have faded like a festal wreath, whose intellects are dwarfed, hearts benumbed, and lives cheerless, and they have nothing left of their flowering time but withered leaves and a faint memory of perfume and music. How deplorable! How wrong when we can and should grow each year of our lives in beauty, wisdom, and usefulness, and become more and more perfected. Then when we become ripe for the spirit world we will gladly welcome the death angel who will happily bear us away to the beautiful life we are prepared to enjoy.

ST. EVE.

A Week with the Ghosts.

MR. EDITOR: Having been requested in writing signed by numerous persons to give some account of my visits to Memphis, Mo., the home of the celebrated medium, J. H. Mott, I send you (omitting for brevity, particulars and details) the following:

Mr. Mott is, I should judge, a slight built, thin-featured, frank, out-spoken man under thirty-five. He resides in an unpretentious one-story frame house near the depot. Mott's room is the most public room in the house, as he is the most public man about the house. At the south-east corner of the sitting-room is a closet called a cabinet, opening into the sitting-room, and open all day to to visitors, and at all times excepting during the hour for circles, and perhaps there is no room in the State which has been examined oftener or scrutinized more closely than this. On the wall of the south side of the closet is fastened by a spiral wire to the wall a common door bell, and which we repeatedly heard rung one afternoon when no mortal hands could have come in contact with it. In the south-east corner is the medium's arm-chair or rocker, its only furniture. In the closet door opening into the sitting-room is an aperture about one by two feet in size, covered by a thick curtain hung on the inside. On the outside is a shelf upon which for convenience stands an ear-trumpet.

In the evening the company arrange themselves into an oval or semi-circle, the light turned down and placed under a transparency, but sufficient light to easily recognize each other's features, when they commence singing, "Shall we gather at the river, where bright angel feet have trod," or some other familiar air and words. Mr. Mott is supposed to be sitting within in the darkness, entranced. The door being closed, the little bell is heard to ring.

Each in his or her turn goes up to the door; the curtain is removed by invisible hands, and a large and rather portly apparition appears, to whom you are introduced as Saul Bludsoe, who fell in the rebel army in battle during the late civil war, as the spirit-manager of the circle. The same formality is gone through with to Dr. Reed, the so called spirit-chemist of this circle, who says he is glad to see you, wishes you a pleasant evening, etc. Apparitions then appear and often call by name on the different persons in the room, each of whom goes up to the door, the curtain is removed by invisible hands, and a deceased friend appears, addresses you in a whisper, and should any difficulty be experienced in hearing, the ear-trumpet may be used. A lawyer and ex-senator from Kansas became almost frantic with joy at the sight of one whom he at once recognized as his wife who had been dead six years. He had repeated conversations with her and with his sister who had committed suicide, which she very much regretted, as it kept her from advancing as she said she might have done in spirit life.

The first two nights I received nothing satisfactory, but on the third I was addressed by one in whose appearance I did not recognize my father, who related the particulars of his death, its cause and manner, the reason for the course he had taken in regard to his property, and other particulars, all of which took place many years ago in Pennsylvania. He regretted the time and study which he might have more profitably spent in doing good otherwise, for he was a theologian; the new world had given him new light, he was happy, and my mother and deceased sister were with him, etc. My sister then appeared, looking, except for a somewhat ashy paleness, like her earth life. She died in Hannibal, Mo., about thirteen years ago. She reminded me of facts I had not been aware of in her past life and of her child now living in Pennsylvania. Several friends from Hannibal appeared whom I had known, relating facts with which I was not acquainted, but which on returning home on inquiry I found to be true.

MY SECOND VISIT.

In January last I made a second visit to the great medium at Memphis. The house was crowded and many daily sent away who could not be accommodated. I remained five days and had interviews daily, or rather nightly, with what appeared to be my father, sister, and old friends of both East and West, long since passed away, and was by them informed of facts not known by me then, but since verified. Others received particulars of those who had died in California, Oregon, and among the Rocky Mountains. Some of Mott's visitors politely declined giving their names or residences until spirits have made them known.

About twenty were there during my last visit, some of them old and confirmed Materialists, non-believers in immortality; lawyers, physicians, statesmen, all recognized friends and relatives from the "better land," but not always at the first or second seance. All were overjoyed on becoming confirmed, joyous believers in spirit intercourse. I saw a remarkable amount of happiness acquired during so brief a period. Mott, in that little cabinet, is making more Spiritualists in a month than the ministers, in costly churches in our great cities, are converting to Christianity in a year.

WHAT CAN BE DONE ABOUT IT?

Some pious brethren, we are informed, in Iowa employed a professor of jugglery, who claimed to be able to expose mediums, to expose Mott for three thousand dollars, but h "wilted" when confronted by his dead father, was ashamed of his mission, which he undertook with so much bravery, repented, exhibited the utensils of his craft, exposed his own tricks, and returned to publicly proclaim Mott no fraud, the manifestations genuine, and himself another convert to Spiritualism.

Some strange revelations have been made by these professed denizens of another world; rascals have acknowledged, is said, their rascality, and even in some cases given up their ill-gotten gains when told to do so in presence of the circle. Valuable information has often been imparted to visitors, the names of old friends announced, known only to those who received them, with messages, etc.

Spirits in church history are reported to have returned, but in all its annals there are few or no examples of returning to any with as valuable information as Mott's friends receive, or as numerous and varied as modern Spiritualism has presented, and we have seen the vicious reclaimed (from intemperance) and heard virtue commended by invisible tongues in these circles.

Apparitions appeared, giving their names, from various localities, but unfortunately I was not able from first sight and the slight glimpses given me to recognize any of them but my sister. Not so with others, some of whom were made joyful on their first evening and happy in the recognized companionship of "loved ones gone before." Neither was I any more fortunate in obtaining a much-desired test. Attempts were repeatedly made, but with no more at best than partial success.

When the circle is over and apparitions cease to appear, Mr. Mott (the door being thrown open) is seen entranced, and a Dutch spirit controlling him describes in broken English the spirits of each one's friends who were members of the circle, their names, appearance, history, time, and manner of death, and what they wished to add to what they had said, which is the most amusing and not by any means the least interesting and wonderful part of the performance. One lady, versed in that language, conversed with the "control" (Christopher Johannes Von Huens) fluently and accurately, as she stated, although Mr. Mott in his normal condition knows little or nothing of it.

"But do you believe in Spiritualism?" asks one; "and do you say that it is established by evidence?"

"No; I represent things as they appear, judge ye what they are. As to me, I am an incorrigible disbeliever, and will never believe until compelled by not only convincing but overwhelming evidence."

"But what of the evidence?"

"Let us put a case. A goes into a room, where he is surprised at seeing his old friends X, Y, and Z, whom he knows to have been absent in a foreign country. But his eyes may deceive him; men's eyes often do. There are many ocular illusions, and the most apparently satisfactory ocular demonstrations are in some cases no demonstration at all.

"But he hears them speak; his auditory nerves seldom deceive him, and his evidence is doubled. He then takes them by the hands, or they pat him on the head and hands to convince him that they are really there. Here is feeling brought into the case, and the evidence is trebled. Can this be denied?

"He then converses with them of old times and associations, and is perhaps informed by them of new facts; memory, knowledge, judgment, and character are brought in, and the proof is clinched, assurance is made doubly sure, and individually there is no room left for doubt. But that no uncertainty may possibly be left, he calls in his friends B and C, who receive the same evidence, confirming his, by which the whole is again doubled and trebled, and some one who is believed to have been reliable has said that in the mouth of two or three witnesses, shall every word be established."

This is then the condition of the question, and similar to this is the evidence obtained at Mott's. Men there, as they believe, see, hear, feel, and converse with their old friends, or their ghosts. Many of them are men of superior intelligence—mechanics, lawyers, ministers, farmers, physicians, professors, teachers, statesmen, shrewd detectives, managers or directors of penitentiaries and insane asylums, jugglers, prestidigitators, generals, and army officers, judges, and legislators, and nearly all come away satisfied that they have conversed with their spirit friends.

But says one who knows but little about it, "Mott is certainly a fraud."

Perhaps so, but each man who visits him, especially if a disbeliever, is a private detective, suspicious and watchful, and ever on the lookout for fraud, and ambitious of discovering it. No one is watched with more unceasing vigilance; his visitors board with him, and are day and night in his house; the eyes of Argus follow his every movement, but none, so far as we have learned, who have spent a reasonable time in investigating have been able to discover any fraud or trickery.

The late exposé by Pattee and others by squirting analine into the cabinet which, Mr. Editor, you were so ready to chronicle, if they proved all they asserted, would be no proof that the manifestations are not genuine. What! hundreds of the best men and women deceived, who thought they had seen and conversed with their old friends of things that Mott could have known nothing about unless omniscient, all proved false because a man actually succeeded in squirting some analine upon him while in the cabinet? They attempted to show that he was not in the corner where his arm-chair (rocker) stands. But is there any law to forbid its being rocked forward to front the opening in the door? But the testimony of Stephen Young, Mr. Pitkin, the editor of a Memphis paper, and even the marks left by the liquid go to show that he had not moved, and Mott's enemies here ridicule the attempt at exposure as a contemptible failure.

Mott is but an unsophisticated young man, and with but a limited education and acquaintance with the world; of fair character and reputation for honesty and truthfulness, and appears to be generous and sincere. The tongue of malice, steeped in venom, has never yet been able to prove him dishonest.

But if J. H. Mott's manifestations are a fraud, then let all the frauds, religious and irreligious, from the days of Simon Magus until now, hide their diminished heads in his presence, and all the master minds in the realm of mystery do him reverence. But says a friend, "Mott is a mind-reader." A wonderful mind-reader, indeed, to read from other minds what those minds never contained. Is he not also a mind creator? "But the testimony of one is insufficient." True, but you can have that of hundreds if you wish.

The following certificate was signed by those who were present during my stay, omitting, by request, those whose statement might get them into disfavor in their society and church (although their faith was as firm and evidence satisfactory as any) for there are now Spiritual Nicodemuses who come to Mott by night among our Christian "rulers."

MEMPHIS, MO., Jan. 25, 1878.

We, the undersigned, having attended the Spiritual seances of J. H. Mott, do hereby certify that we have seen nothing like fraud in all our experience with him, but it is our firm belief that we have repeatedly seen and held conversations with our spirit friends and relatives, been informed of facts with which we were not heretofore acquainted, but which afterwards proved to be true; been reminded by apparitions of many circumstances with which none but ourselves and our departed friends could have known; of this we are positive, have no doubts of their genuineness; seen friends long ago reported dead, and in whose identity we could not be mistaken; know of others who can testify to the same or similar facts, and are willing to be qualified to the truth of what we have hereby stated.

This is signed by fifteen persons who have attended from three to a thousand seances. Their names can be had upon application.

From Mr. Mott's register from a vast number of names of visitors who, we are informed, went away fully satisfied, we copy the following as well known; some of national reputation:

Hon. F. V. Bogy, United States Senator, Missouri; Evans, secretary and treasurer Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, Pa.; General George C. Bingham, Attorney-General of Missouri, artist; Alonzo Thompson, State auditor, Missouri; Matilda Fletcher, Republican stump-speaker, Iowa; Hon. Judge Belden, Central City, Col.; Hon. James R. Rollins, United States Senator; Hon. W. McCreary, United States Secretary of War; Hon. J. B. Young, Marion, Iowa, Secretary of State; Hon. J. R. McGie, Secretary of State, Springfield, Ill.; Hon. James Rogers, ex-Senator, Burlingame, Kan.; Hon. Mayor Smith, Quincy, Ill.; Hon. ex-Mayor J. Jasper, Quincy, Ill.; Hon. ex-Mayor Joseph Brown, St. Louis, Mo.

This testimony, Mr. Editor, is almost as substantial as that which convinces the Christian world that Jonah was swallowed by a whale, or that a virgin begot a lamb of God, or that there are beasts in heaven full of eyes before and behind, or that it is possible for the Majesty of the skies to make a square circle, a cubical sphere, or a ten-year old horse out of a sucking colt in a minute, or that all the waters of Egypt disappeared at once, and there flowed only the red fluid from animal veins and arteries.

Christianity may condemn and deny Spiritualism, and perhaps not without cause, but before they do so they should present better evidence than Spiritualists can. True, Spiritualism may be a humbug, and upon them rests the burden of proof; but having offered thousands of witnesses, and tens of thousands of facts, it now remains for its opponents to meet, disprove, or refute them. Yours, D. JENKINS.

Letters from Friends.

A GREAT FREETHOUGHT CONVENTION.

BRO. BENNETT: It is a saying that "every one has a hobby," and I think it is a true saying, at least with every person who has any desire to make the world better. The Investigator's "hobby" is to establish the Paine Hall on a firm basis as a monument to that great patriot whose country was the world. The "hobby" of The Index is to build up a great political party—the National Liberal League—the principal object of which shall be to entirely separate Church and State in this country. The "hobby" of THE TRUTH SEEKER is (allowing myself to be judge) to wipe from the statute books of the country all laws that in the least interfere with perfect freedom of speech and of the press.

For myself, I am prepared to aid all these objects with the little influence and ability I possess; but I have also my "hobby," and I ask you all, and every Liberal in the land, to assist me, and that is to inaugurate

so large and intelligent that they will make themselves felt for good the world over, and I desire to make the

such a gathering. In doing this I believe we are doing more than we can in any other way to advance all the other "hobbies" above-named. And because I believe this I shall spend every hour, as I have for the two last weeks, up to the time of the convention, to make this such a gathering as I believe the times demand. And, to bring it about, I shall spend for the purpose all the money I can get the friends of such a movement to intrust to me. I am very thankful for every postage stamp that is sent me, as that allows me to write one more letter to some friend, urging his attendance and co-operation.

And, to make this such a convention as it should be, all classes of Liberals should unite in it—every man and woman who loves truth more than a creed. Although not a Spiritualist myself, I recognize the fact that a majority, at least, of the Liberals are made up of Spiritualists, and I was, therefore, greatly pleased when I learned that the distinguished speaker and traveler, Dr. J. M. Peebles, was to be with us; then I desire that that brave old advocate of liberty, Parker Pillsbury, be with us to represent the truest friends of man this country ever produced—those known as Garrisonian Abolitionists; then we must have Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, the most eloquent defender of the rights of her own sex there is in this country or any other. And I am gratified to announce that the eloquent orator of America, who is such a noble representative of the new enfranchised race, is to be with us to inspire all who listen to him with the love of liberty. And many of your readers will be glad to know that the most interesting of public speakers, Elder Evans, and many of the Quaker people, who have suffered so much for opinion's sake, are to take part in the Watkins Convention. And thousands will attend to listen to the most eloquent and popular orator of America,

HON. FREDERICK DOUGLASS,

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Then many of the Radical reformers, who by their faithfulness to Freethought are entitled to be renowned, will give us the benefit of their scholarship and eloquent cultured thought. And last, but not least,

SCIENCE, THE BIBLE OF FREETHINKERS,

will be represented by some of the ablest scientists of the age. So, friends, you see we are to have the "salt of the earth" at the great convention, and we desire you, reader, to be with us. And we invite you to one of the most interesting summer resorts in America. It is worth the expense of your journey to see the noted

WATKINS GLEN,

Hovenna Glen, etc. In fact the whole neighborhood where our convention is to be held is famous for its many and diversified scenic and attractive points, and visitors spend weeks there in exploring and enjoying the grand and beautiful things which Nature, our God, has spread out so lavishly, and which art and ingenuity have rendered easily accessible. To such a place we invite you.

THE HOTELS

are large, and numerous, and well kept, and have agreed to entertain all who attend the convention at reduced rates. Then I am happy to inform the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that we are to have

THE BEST OF SINGING.

Prof. P. O. Hudson, of Detroit, accompanied by two distinguished lady vocalists, will provide the instrumental music and singing. Prof. Hudson is known as the "Liberal Sankey of the West."

Friends of Freethought of America, you can nearly all afford to take a short vacation from business and one trip for pleasure and amusement during the year. Take that vacation and trip and attend the convention, and, in addition to ordinary benefits, get spiritual, moral, and intellectual food, and, more than all, help on the Liberal car of progress. Friends, let us all come together and join hearts and hands for the great conflict before us in behalf of mental liberty. Let us, for four days, forget any differences that may exist between us, and there get an inspiration that shall cause us to never again remember them, and compel us to work, side by side, in the most fraternal manner for the rights of humanity. Will you come, one and all?

H. L. GREEN, Corresponding Secretary.

COLOMA, CAL., July 1, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Since our Christian Congress has refused to repeal or modify those tyrannical so-called obscenity laws, I am pleased to notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 22d inst. that a number of noble men of your city have formed the nucleus of a society, the main object of which is the suppression of Comstockism and to protect innocent persons from being persecuted under this accursed law. This is an important step in the right direction. I don't believe that there is an honest and intelligent Infidel in the country who, knowing the nature of this law, and knowing the influence it has exercised in suppressing knowledge which every sensible person knows is very essential for the improvement and happiness of our race, will not cheerfully contribute for this purpose all that his circumstances will permit. I believe that a fund sufficient can be raised in this manner that will shield all worthy persons who are in danger of persecution of this kind, thereby making the law unprofitable to Comstock and his unworthy associates; and, when they find that it don't pay any longer, they will have no further use for the law. Comstock's last official exploit in inducing those three poor frail women to play mother Eve to a select audience, shows that he is already reduced to very low expedients in finding material to keep up his trade in nastiness. I also see that there is another encumbrance in the way of progression, which, if there is any difference, is worse than Comstockism, for we have that in front and can fight it to better advantage. But treachery in our own camp is hard to combat, and, before fully subdued, can materially injure our cause. The course which Abbot has pursued in regard to the petition, and his conduct toward THE TRUTH SEEKER, should convince every man and woman, who has three grains of common sense, that he is actuated by purely selfish, vain, jealous, and egotistic motives. Through his great vanity and egotism he plainly shows that he would like to be looked upon as the great source from which all Liberal progress flows, and anything that does not emanate from his pen or cultured brain is bogus and must be discountenanced and put down. Darwin says the fittest in the struggle for life survive. The same rule will apply in this contest. You have already deprived him of wings, and reduced him, in my estimation, from a flying to a crawling, squirming insect.

I have always looked upon preachers, especially cultured preachers who have deserted the cause of Jesus and declared themselves Freethinkers and Infidels, with suspicion. I hold that a man who is insincere when pretending Christianity, is not always to be depended upon when advocating Infidelity; he is either too shaky about the knees for an Infidels, or his moral structure is rotten; and, if so, as long as he is accomplishing his narrow, selfish ends, he don't care a continental what becomes of society or the human race generally. Please have my name enrolled on the list of the defense fund for twenty dollars, which I am ready to pay when needed and called for. Friend Bennett, this is a long letter, and as you have already on several occasions indulgently given me a chance to have my say in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I do not expect you to print it.

As ever, your friend, A. LOHRY.

HACKENSACK, N. J., May 20, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your article on "More Comstockism" was excellent and worthy of commendation by all sensible persons having any experience or knowledge of sexual matters. Keep on with your good work until the modern Pharisees vanish before the efforts of the modern Infidels or Essenes. Jesus of Nazareth is injured more by his pharisaical followers than by his Samaritan opponents.

S. E. CLAPP.

ANGOLA, IND., July 10, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: Please pardon my impatience, as I mailed a card to you on the 8th, which, I presume, you have received. The "Champions of the Church" came rapidly to hand last eve; of course, I have not read much of it as yet. Have looked it over and am well pleased and proud to lay it upon my centre-table with Thomas Paine's great works, Lord Amberley's, and the "World's Sages, Thinkers and Reformers." Go on in the good work of giving to the world such knowledge as will effectually wipe out priestcraft and superstition. The coming generations will bless you, and may bless you now. Continue to show up Comstock. There are those who do not believe there are any such transactions as you publish concerning him.

S. J. MINER.

CORRECTION.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., July 12, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: An error of mine appeared in Dr. Peeble's letter last week. It should have read, "During my two years' voyage around the world, I witnessed Spiritual manifestations among the Bohmans of India and the Buddhists of China and Ceylon."

I am sure that hundreds of the Doctor's American friends will be pleased to meet him at the Watkins Convention. He has become the most famous traveler of this country. H. L. GREEN.

"ANOTHER FIT OF THE MORALS."

BROTHER BENNETT: I suppose the best of us are liable to fits. I certainly have fits of moral indignation every time I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I am impressed with the barbarous persecutions and ferocious pursuit by our Christian enemies through Comstock & Co., and the narrowness and illiberality of pretended truth seekers and reformers.

A friend of mine used to say of a woman who would put on great airs of wounded purity at some rumor of social or sexual impropriety, that she had "another fit of the morals." Some of your correspondents, both Materialists and Spiritualists, seem to have the same kind of fits, and it is hard to tell whether they are for the truth or against it. Happy would it be for the cause of truth if such fits were few and seldom in the ranks of those who pretend to be expanded, liberal, and charitable. Not a few pretended Liberals virtually say, My feelings and opinions shall rule or ruin. I have got to the top of the great stairway of progress and human ascent, and I forbid any man or woman passing or attempting to pass by or beyond me in any sense or degree. I can scan the whole universe with my moral and intellectual eyes. My mind is the standard for the world. Some of them seem to feel that they "can expound and expostulate, fabricate and concatenate, demonstrate and elucidate all the hidden mysteries of creation," as a rough old fellow used to say. They are very free and liberal, but communists and free lovers fill them with holy horror. The fact is, such persons are too blinded by their own selfishness to see or appreciate the spirit and purpose of true communism, and they have no love in their natures to be free.

O ye Liberals, of every name and class, I beseech you, at this critical period, to come out of your "fits of the morals," and all kinds of fits, and let us have a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together at the car of truth, and roll it on irresistibly to the salvation of humanity from all sin and slavery!

The negro in the woods prayed to the Lord to save him from the approaching bear, and then said, "O Lord, if you can't help me, don't help the bear!" If you Liberals cannot help the cause of truth and humanity, do not by your selfishness, prejudice, or jealousy, your egotism, and self-righteousness, divide our strength or "kill the goose to get the golden egg." The best of us have no "morals" or goodness to boast of, some being weak and deficient in one sense, and some in another; none are all-wise. We all want freedom to think and express our thoughts, to grow and expand into the light and liberty of truth.

The "irrepressible conflict" between truth and error, freedom and slavery, the "higher law," and the despotism and tyranny of priestcraft, political-craft, and money-power between individual liberty and Church and State, demand the combined intelligence, vigilance, and discreet action of all Liberal minds, or martyrdom and blood will be upon us. "Give me liberty [liberty in every true sense] or give me death." J. H. Cook.

Glen Hall, Pa., July 12, 1878.

Brother Bennett: Hurrah for "The Champions!" It is the book of books, that is, it exceeds all that you have hitherto published. We are sure several copies will soon be ordered from this vicinity. As we cannot all read at once the one copy sent me, the one who is so fortunate as to get possession of it of course reads aloud and the rest listen, so eager are we to become acquainted with its contents.

To say the whole appearance of the book, paper, type, binding, and form, is "first rate," would be no exaggeration. The subject matter we will not attempt to discuss. Those who have read its extracts in The Truth Seeker have only a faint idea of its excellence as a whole. The modern inquisitor, Anthony Comstock, and the sinful clergy of the past and present are dealt with in the author's usual unsparing and truthful style.

Let every subscriber of The Truth Seeker possess one, read it, and show it to his friends and neighbors, not lend it, but invite and urge each and all to purchase one for themselves, that they may have always at hand such a valuable historical anti-Christian volume with which to confound their enemies.

Again, I advise all to purchase, read, compare, and reflect, that you may become more and more confirmed in the great fact that Christianity is only one of the religions of the world, and in most respects the worst, since it was founded on a lie, has been propagated through blood, and seeks to universalize and perpetuate itself by fraud, tyranny, injustice, and a total disregard of the rights of individual religious thought, speech, and action, as evinced in the late efforts to deprive people of their liberty for speaking their own views in these United States of free, happy, proud America.

Then circulate "The Champions" and all the Freethought publications, seek to induce all to patronize Liberal books, papers, lectures, lecturers, and conventions. Let all attend the Watkins Convention, August 22d, and form an army of the veteran thinkers of the country which shall intimidate the foe and prove to them that we are in earnest, quite as much so as any reformers in any age of the world. All hail, then, to "The Champions," twin sister or brother of the "Sages!" Let its light shine so that those who have never known the character of the "Holy Fathers" and the "defenders of the faith," may become enlightened as to their infamy, and loose all respect for a religion that has flourished by such means, through such men, and under the force of such henious crimes. Ella E. Gibson.

Snowville, Va., July 7, 1878.

Dear Brother Bennett: I have just received the "Career and Crimes of Anthony Comstock," and am real glad thee published him three times over, first giving us a foretaste in the T. S., then binding him up in that noble and immortal work, "The Champions of the Church," where his name will go down to posterity linked with those other holy, pious, fanatical murderers, villians, and scoundrels, and lastly, devoting a whole pamphlet to his exclusive exposure! I shall circulate mine all over this portion of the Old Dominion, and hope and trust that it will be a means of adding thousands of names to the next petition for the modification or annulling of the unjust law that has given him such power over good, true, noble, just, and humanitarian thinkers and workers for the world's highest good. This little book is just the thing for every one of the 70,000 petitioners to have and to lend, and I hope each one will buy a copy, thus giving material aid as well as personal influence towards crushing out a law that is capable of being put to such unjust and wicked uses as the Comstock law has been.

Fight on, Bennett, with might and main.
"Till they no longer blot and stain
Fair freedom's holy cause!
Fight till the eagle of free speech
Shall burst her prison bars,
And till the bigots cease to screech
At Progress' rolling cars!"

920 F St., Washington, D. C.

Brother Bennett: This summer will doubtless be memorable in the history of the Liberal movement, therefore I suggest that the coming convention at Watkins inaugurate a world's convention of philanthropists to be held at Washington in 1883. I learn from Dr. J. M. Peebles, who has returned from a second trip around the world, that there are plenty of people of means in all countries who would probably be glad of the honor to represent their people in a convention of this magnitude. It is highly probable that if there could be a general coming together among the nations of the earth, and if they should conclude, after due deliberation, to issue an address to the world, advising among other things, Stephen Girard's plan for training the young, a court of arbitration to settle all disputes among nations, and a universal religion or creed for all, by the dawn of the twentieth century all military establishments on the planet could be disbanded. I think the clergy could consistently endorse this movement, as all must discover that on the principle that "the friction of thought brings wisdom," this coming together will be the first practical step towards bringing the "peace on earth, good will to men," they have so long prayed for. Cordially yours,

S. M. Baldwin.

Toledo, O., July, 1878.

Friend Bennett: Feeling as a Liberal should feel, I cannot but send you a few words of praise, and applaud your prompt action in sending out petitions to be signed for the purpose of submitting them to President Hayes, in the hope of obtaining a timely pardon for E. H. Heywood, a man who committed no crime save to write his honest convictions, and sending them through the United States mail to those who had a desire to read his views on certain topics that just now may seem out of place to those that have a desire to be highly "respectable." But wherein is there any justice in saying, "that he has committed a crime for writing his honest convictions?" Is it right or just to confiscate his property and to deprive him of his liberty simply because he declined to make a hypocrite of himself? I hope that every subscriber of The Truth Seeker will cut out the petition, circulate it, and have it signed by all who have a desire to have justice done. I hope every Liberal in this country may follow in your footsteps and become an active worker in the cause of truth, although some "cultured" editor may write a dozen columns condemning your actions in circulating petitions. Can any one point to a single instance wherein you were wrong? Perhaps you are wrong now in having petitions circulated for the purpose of obtaining a pardon for one who is deprived of his liberty, simply because what he wrote was unpopular? Perhaps you were wrong when you circulated petitions for the purpose of "repealing or modifying" certain laws that make it possible to confiscate a man's property and deprive them of their sacred rights merely for opinion's sake.

These are questions for honest men and women to decide. Let some cultured man inform us where the Constitution gives Congress any right to regulate what shall be carried in the mails save limiting bulk and weight, and to exclude such articles that from their nature may be dangerous to handle, or such as may become detrimental to other matter in the same mail. I say any one remaining within the above limit is protected by the Constitution, and whenever Congress goes beyond this it exceeds the power granted by the Constitution, and hence such laws must be unconstitutional.

You are right, Bro. Bennett, let it be repeal henceforth or until the Constitution is made to read different. Long may you yet be spared to manage the affairs of The Truth Seeker, and may its columns in the future, as they have in the past, suppress wrong, expose fraud, and superstition, and maintain and defend truth and justice.

Sincerely your friend, J. E. Frick.

Londonville, N. Y., June 11, 1878.

Dear Friend Bennett: We are more and more interested in The Truth Seeker each week. You are having quite a time with some of your contemporaries. Why couldn't they have got at it one at a time? It is rather a task to attend to them all at once. Mr. Abbot is making a great fuss about the "petition," and the Rev. Comstock, but in my humble eyes, it is merely a display of cultured cowardice. I honestly believe that if the "Comstock laws" were abolished, this same cultured (?) Liberal would denounce Comstock as loudly as any in the land. I should like to have the pleasure of telling him that I was one of the signers to that much abused "petition," and that there is no one in the land more opposed to real obscenity than I. My mother, husband, aunt, and uncle were also signers, and we were all fully aware of the true tenor and object of the petition. Some of our best citizens signed it, and the first and ablest lawyer in Louisville, Ky., where I then resided, Hon. Isaac Caldwell, promised to sign it and to get other signers, but when my husband called at his office for that purpose, he was from the city on urgent business, and we were not sure when he would return, so the petition was forwarded to you. On the whole, friend Bennett, do you not think it is possible that one of those little monsters with green eyes has taken up its abode in the office of The Index?

Don't you think it is about time the order of things was reversed, and a new religion formed, in which the devil shall take the place of God? The idea seems to be, worship the most powerful, and as majority rules, it is about time we were becoming possessed of a righteous fear of the devil. God has passed his black sheep over to the devil, until the lower "H" is the largest by far, and now "the devil takes his own," and it is only a few poor white sheep that are borne in triumph through the "celestial gates." Just think of the hundreds of "black sheep" that have for ages been pouring into hell. First thing we know there'll be another "battle in heaven," and this time it will be God who will be kicked out, for his brother is in power now. How foolish in our "Heavenly Father" to help the devil by giving him so many of his own (God's) children to be his subjects, and thereby build up his energetic power. It seems to me that instead of condemning them eternally, I would devise some plan to get them back after they had been duly punished. For my part I believe heaven is too small to hold all of his children, and God sends those he doesn't want to his brother; therefore heaven is select, not even a chance for cultured Liberals. Mrs. Winnie Aspinwall.

Meeting of Spiritualists.

D. M. Bennett: Please mention that the next quarterly meeting of the Spiritualists of western New York will be held in the Universalist church at Lockport, on Saturday and Sunday, the 3d and 4th of August, 1878. All are cordially invited to come and help the cause along.

J. H. Sedver,
George H. Taylor,
Mrs. P. Gregory, } Com.

Woodhull, Ill., July 3, 1878.

Friend Bennett: I am one of the seventy thousand signers of your petition, and I look upon it as a base slander to be charged as an obscenist. I am old enough to know the pretenses that are used to accomplish other purposes than those held out. As for the prohibiting of obscenity that is to corrupt the morals of society, that is all right. It is possible this was the only intention of the present law, but the wording of it is such that it can be used to cover much useful information, both physical and religious, and as it now stands worded is dangerous in the hands of religious bigots and old allopathic physicians.

The effort now making to get God and Jesus Christ in our national Constitution is claimed only to do honor to God and his son. With this amendment in our Constitution and the Comstock law under the running of the Y. M. C. A., where, I ask, would be our religious liberties? You can find a true example of them carried out by reading the history of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and the only safeguard to religious and political liberty is the union in the Infidel ranks every year, and every disunion feeling among the Liberals is now held as a triumph by the religious intolerants. I now entreat, in the name of humanity and for the protection and benefit of the rising generation, for you to dismiss the demon of jealousy, and let reunion and fellowship be our motto. As for the petition got up by you, it is possible you were a little hasty, and with a little more deliberation might have avoided this war, yet I can look at it in no other light under the existing circumstances than that the attack on you was uncalled for. Therefore let an amnesty be proclaimed and a child's bargain made: each one let the other alone, and let us be what we profess to be, a peaceable set of people. Respectfully yours,

Isaac Paden.

To Mr. Truesdell, et al: It has been said, "In the multitude of council there is wisdom." I certainly hope that truth will prevail. If I am wrong in my judgment I hope to be righted. If you are wrong, I hope you will be open to conviction. If we were to take your examples as conclusive evidence, we would no doubt reach the same conclusions you seem to have done, but if we should accept the example of the great nations of the earth in their social relations, we would adopt their system of caste and nobility. You seem to have misunderstood my reference to the Spartans. I did not cite them as an example in favor of inflation, but as an example that money, made of other things besides gold and silver, may be as good, and I believe much better than money made of those metals. The most superficial observer might see that the code of laws made by that great philanthropist, Lycurgus, which raised Sparta to be the most powerful State in Greece, might be as good an example of equitable financial rules as the rules instituted by those powerful States of Russia and Austria in behalf of a powerful caste of wealthy nobles. You say their iron money failed when the Spartans failed with their arms. I suspect our paper money will fail when the Stars and Stripes succumb to the banner of another nation, but if it serves us till then, and I think it will, it will be well. We want it to serve us well while we live and exist as a nation, without thinking of what it will be worth after the wreck of governments. You say that in France "in 1796 nearly the whole volume of worthless paper promises were found in the hands of the laboring class." This statement cannot be true from the nature of the relations of rich and poor, except by a gigantic preconcerted plot with the capitalists. The capitalists tried that here in Illinois in 1860 with our "gold basis" wild-cat "money," but they could not unload it on the laboring class. You say that "if the early financial history of France does not prove consoling to the irredeemable currency advocates, surely her present condition will not comfort them to-day. She stands without a rival in financial prosperity, and why? Because she holds more specie in her vaults, per circulation and per capita, than any other nation on the globe." True, but what inference shall we draw from that? France issued a large volume of paper currency and tried to trade with other nations. We have burned up much of our paper currency, and passed prohibitory tariff laws, and the result has been laborers have been turned off, consumption at home has ceased, the wheels of enterprise have stopped, and gloom hangs over the land. Rachel is mourning not for her first-born, but for something for her children to eat. Whose example should we follow now, that of France or of John Sherman?

The examples of Russia's and Austria's financial policy may be true as stated, but as you say their notes were increased in amount as they decreased in value. That seems to have been an objectless inflation. We do not propose any such thing. We propose simply to pay our national debt and then do our best to keep up the value of those notes. If they fall in value, it simply makes all property bear its pro rata of the war debt. The soldier was offered no insurance for his life and blood, although it was confiscated for the welfare of the country. We propose now to establish an American system, making the citizens' blood and muscle as sacred as his property, and when we confiscate soldiers to prosecute a war in the future, we will confiscate money enough to provide for his wants. I have but one request to make of you, Mr. Truesdell, do not claim that your arguments are in behalf of the laborer, for we would then have the anomaly of the capitalist making a desperate effort in behalf of the laborer and the laborer making a desperate effort in behalf of the capitalist, and so our argument would be illogical. J. R. Parks.

Jamieson vs. Ditzler.

The debate between W. F. Jamieson and Rev. Jacob Ditzler, D.D., at Kirksville, Mo., is thus mentioned by the St. Louis Daily Journal:

"The Rev. Mr. Ditzler is a learned and shrewd debater upon matters pertaining to the doctrine of baptism, but his recent experience up country has doubtless taught him a lesson he'll not be likely to forget. We allude to his debate with Mr. Jamieson, the Freethinker. The divine inspiration of the Bible was the subject under discussion, and the newspaper reports of the debate, together with the subsequent condition of the religious community, indicate that Ditzler was badly worried, not to say badly beaten. The Freethinkers are as good-natured as you please over the result, while the other people are exceedingly sour and angry. Mr. Ditzler will doubtless confine himself hereafter to the discussion of the cold water phases of his belief."

Mr. Jamieson is filling lecture engagements in Kansas. Those wishing his services for courses of lectures, and to organize Liberal Leagues, should apply early. Address Box 1250, Kansas City, Mo.

"The Champions of the Church, Their Crimes and Persecutions," by D. M. Bennett, is a handsome octavo volume of more than 1100 pages. The main purpose of the author seems to have been to give a brief and succinct account of the cruelties and persecutions practiced by distinguished leaders of the Christian Church since the advent of Jesus of Nazareth. Of course it embodies a history of many of the most important events in the rise and fall of nations, and also biographies of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of both the Romish and Protestant churches. The writer claims that nothing has been exaggerated; all is given as found in the most reliable authorities, and he leaves the reader to decide after a careful perusal, whether the persecution, torture, imprisonment, cruelty, bloodshed, and slaughter which the Christian Church has visited upon millions of unfortunate beings are proofs of the truth, divinity, and superiority of the Christian religion. The work is published by the Liberal and Scientific Publishing House, No. 141 Eighth street, New York. Price, $3.—Boston Herald.

Who says we all in Adam fell,
How all against God's laws rebel,
And therefore ought to go to hell?
The Orthodox Christian.

Who says by nature we're depraved,
That "hell with infants' skulls is paved,"
While only the elect are saved?
The Presbyterian.

Who says of works we should not boast,
Yet prays the loudest—shouts the most,
Saying, Lord send down the Holy Ghost?
The Methodist.

Who say, Oh sinner be advised,
Believe, repent, and be baptized,
Do these, and you'll not be despised?
The Campbellites and all Baptists.

Who says that Christ and Mother Ann,
Have introduced the wisest plan
That ever was devised for man?
The shaking Quaker.

Who from the orthodox are driven
For saying all will be forgiven,
And every one will go to heaven?
The Universalists.

Who says there is an inner sight
That always guides us in the right,
Which bids mankind to never fight?
The Friend or Quaker.

Who (could they have the power) would take
Freethinkers to the burning stake,
And persecute for Jesus' sake?
Both Romanists and Protestants.

Who think the priesthood all a sham,
A lazy, non-producing clan,
And all not worth a tinker's d——?

Who Cain's wife was—in land of Nod?
And who knows that there is a God?

Indexiana.

'Tis down in Boston, or the "hub,"
Where "culture" tries to earn its grub
By sending to its cultured minds
Discrepancies it often finds
With those who battle with the evils
Of modern superstitious devils
Of Moody's theologic hells
Of fire and brimstone that he smells

The "cultured" mind is very "tender."
Like some that oft go on a "bender."
Although with Liberal cloak disguised
The "common herd" he does despise.
To cultured minds he tells his tale
So often that his story's stale;
"Liberalism must come to naught:
With minds uncultured it is fraught."

In its great ranks good men are found,
Daily he hears the "seekers" sound,
And those who battle with their might
To show the wrong and prove the right.
And to beat back great errors past.
They're conquering superstition fast:
But yet with this he still complains
Because they have uncultured brains.

Indexiana thinks 'tis wrong
To sing an anti-Comstock song.
"Uncultured minds!" It is not nice
To talk of them suppressing vice.
To think there could be any flaws,
In the pure godly Comstock laws!
"What! heard the lion in his den
With names of seventy thousand men?"

What if petition is a right
Sacred to all as day or night?
"Uncultured minds," are not the ones
To speak their views in thunder tones;
Indexiana's cultured thought
Is where the prayer should have been sought;
From this source, had you but appealed,
'Twere modified if not repealed.

But now you've gone beyond the bounds
Of Liberal thought—uncultured hounds
And by this act 'tis plainly seen
You love the nasty and "obscene."
You'll only make the chances less
For cultured thought mankind to bless,
They'll call it Infidel sedition
And will not notice your petition.

And now the Congress has adjourned,
Your great petition they have spurned.
"I told you so; I knew it well."
Cultured minds can always tell.
There could be nothing more absurd
Than yielding to the "common herd."
Choose cultured minds to take the lead,
Not men that once raised "garden seed."

"'Tis passing strange, and quite absurd,
That they could doubt my cultured word
And go and get a man to pen it—
A Wakeman or a D. M. Bennett;
Men well enough with rabid views,
And fighting with the ancient Jews;
And publishing what they call truth,
Which cultured minds learned not in youth.

"And thus, amidst our cultured fears,
We are thrown back a hundred years;
Thus rashness does it every time,
Ere Freethought has yet reached his prime.
Thus battling by the common throng
'Gainst sixty thousand preachers strong,
And cultured minds with learning great,
They must learn to labor and to wait."

Thus mourns the great Indexiana.
"What's the matter now with Hannah?"
He seems to fear some great intrigue
Against the "captain of the league."
While his cultured thoughts are spouting,
The young throng pass on without him;
The very air is full of sounds,
Of victories of (uncultured hounds).

A few more men like Brother Leland,
To give 'em fits, would make a free land;
And Brother Bennett with "truth seekers,"
Can butt against ten thousand preachers.
And thousands more, that's just as good,
Are helping stay the awful flood
Of theologic superstition,
If culture does not give permission.

But, Brother Bennett, pray do hush,
T. C. has smashed him into mush;
Don't kill him, though he killed your bill,
I'm sure by this he's got his fill.
And when a thing has come to pass
That plainly shows some one's an ass,
Why, let him bray, when e'er he will,
All will know 'tis a donkey still.

The Voltaire Centenary.

DALLAS, TEXAS, July 4, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER there was published the speech delivered at the Gaîté theater by Victor Hugo, on the occasion of the hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. On the same day there was made another speech in Paris on the same subject by Laurent Pichat, Senator, at the Cirque Americain. Of that discourse I here below give an original translation from the Messager Franco-Americain, hoping that you will deem it worthy of presentation to your readers through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Respectfully yours, GEO. CRETIEN.

"M. Laurent Pichat, Senator, who presided at the meeting of the Cirque Americain, held May 30th, spoke as follows:

"Ladies and Gentlemen: Called to the honor of presiding at this municipal festival of the Voltaire Centenary, I wish first to thank the two honorable presidents who are assisting me, the president of the council-general of the Seine, and the president of the Municipal Council of Paris, and recognize that I occupy a place that should belong to them. Next I must thank, on the part of the municipality of Paris that authorizes me to speak in its name, the numerous general and municipal councilors of the départements that have given their adhesion to the committee of the Centenary, and whose representatives figure among us; the Masonic lodges of Paris, and the départements, which have not forgotten that Voltaire received initiation into the fraternity; the delegates of the arrondissements of Paris who loaned to the getting up of the Centenary a helping hand; the workmen's syndicates, that are ever ready for all noble enterprises, and the youth of our schools, always eager and generous.

"Voltaire, after having struggled during a long existence, under all forms, tragedy, correspondence, philosophy, history, died surrounded by honors and a kind of deification. After a hundred years of repose, we approach his memory to honor and thank him for what he did for the sake of reason and justice. His life consecrated to redoubtable polemics, to battles without rest, had not an hour of repose, and when we lean over him, we see his ashes burning still, forever stirred by pens which fanatics pass among themselves, from hand to hand. If there is no appeasement, let us console ourselves and be calmed. What now transpires is a proof of the good that Voltaire did, and the good that yet remains for him to do. Is not to be hated after a hundred years by those who prescribe liberty, justice, and reason, the supreme consecration of glory? The past has been a land of struggle; the present is a land of struggle. This termination of the Centenary we are celebrating has something that does not displease me. All the enemies of Voltaire are foes of the republic, and we can count them and measure their strength. They are reduced to the personel of the 16th of May. After rising against us these wretched allies rise against Voltaire. The war against fanaticism, undertaken by Voltaire, was without peace. His name is a bugbear that some people would to-day exhibit to push the frightened multitudes into the churches and confessionals. But it is too late. The fury of our adversaries, the folly of their demonstrations, the excess of their abusive language, their rage, all are vain, puerile. They can expose the Holy Sacrament the same as for days of great disasters, the marquises league themselves with the women of la Halle. It is too late. How Voltaire would have laughed at their rebels against reason. That terrible laugh has been reproached him by those who have been unwilling to understand him. Laughter is the French weapon par excellence; the sword, rapid and supple, that one would do wrong to despise. Voltaire has laughed; likewise Rabelais, Moliere, and Beaumarchais also laughed, but they were serious and redoubtable laughers, often concealing tears. After a hundred years Voltaire is still necessary to us, and we must turn to him and call him to our aid. Read his works, and you shall not find better to-day to help you give expression to your thoughts.

This festival is not a homage to death; it is a tribute to life. There has been some speaking recently of that bettering of public morals for which we are indebted to Voltaire. I shall cite only two examples. Of yore, for a verse or witticism one was thrown into the Bastille; Voltaire was incarcerated there twice. On the register of that prison I have seen his name, besides that of Cartouche. To-day we go only to Sainte Pelagie; it is too much, but still there is amelioration. For not having uncovered his head to a religious procession, the Chevalier de Labarre was tortured and decapitated. To-day, a like act, in spite of concentrated ires, would only inspire a few ridiculous phrases to some fanatical writer, hence there is progress. The spirit of Voltaire glided over the corrupted society, in the midst of which he lived, like a breath of irony, that announced the tempest and prepared the downfall. Voltaire was, with Montesquieu and Rousseau, one of the three figures of Right. Michalet says somewhere that Voltaire could never resign himself to see the flight of justice, 'Montesquieu,' says he, 'can display resignation; Voltaire never. Voltaire is the one who suffers, the one who has taken upon himself the pains of humanity, who resents and pursues iniquity. All the harm fanaticism and tyranny did to the world was done to Voltaire. Martyr, universal victim, it is he that was murdered on St. Bartholomew's day, he that was burnt at Seville, he that the Parliament of Toulouse plays with Calas. He cries, he laughs, amidst sufferings, terrible mirth beneath which crumbles the Bastilles of tyrants. He had a glimpse of the promised land, the aged athlete! 'Behold,' says the historian, 'behold the revolution you have wrought. Before dying, contemplate your work,' and he shows to him our epoch, his accomplished task and his memory venerated. That is why our enemies detest him, and why we should love him. Then let us salute him, this great and venerable man, who has filled a century with his renown. He appears to us an octogenarian amidst the snows of the Alps, but forever young and in constant resurrection. Let us salute him, and greet in him the holy revolution, and in his memory the memory of our fathers.

Freethought and Obscenity.

The following letter, with the sensible remarks appended, we take from the Boston Investigator. They have the "true ring."

MR. EDITOR: I agree with our very able friend, Mr. B. F. Underwood, in his article of last week, wherein he says that Freethought is not in sympathy with any kind of indecency. But I cannot agree with him when he says that he is not in favor of repealing the present law under which law nuisance Comstock is allowed to persecute honest men and women. I think that such a law ought to be repealed, and when this is done, we can then determine what kind of a law, if any, is needed for the prevention of obscenity. For my own part, I have not much more faith in law to improve and refine our literature, than I have in the same agency to advance and sustain religion; and I see not why Comstock is needed in the one case nor a Pope in the other. In a free country like ours—freer in theory, however, than in practice—I have the right, I think, to judge for myself what is obscene or otherwise, and it is none of Comstock's business whether he agrees with me or not. I contend that I have as much right to circulate Heywood's books as Comstock has to circulate the Bible; but as the law does not permit this, it should be repealed.

Yours for equal rights,
SAM'L COOLIDGE.

Mr. Underwood is evidently correct in his opinion that Freethought is not in sympathy with any kind of indecency; but we agree with Mr. Coolidge, that the Comstock law, so called, should be repealed, as being the best thing that can be done with it. The law is not needed; it does not remedy the evil complained of—if anything, it is promoted thereby; furthermore, it strikes at the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the freedom of the mails. A law which makes its agent a spy and an informer that he may be able, by deceptive means, to entrap the honest and unsuspecting, thus abbetting the very offense which he pretends to remove, is a disgrace to the nation. Better have no law for the prevention of an alleged crime, than a law which cannot or is not enforced except by committing crime. The law in question, like that against blasphemy, is wrong in principle, contrary to the Constitution and individual rights, and should be repealed, not because we wish to favor obscenity, but because we would not have honest men persecuted and put in prison under a false charge, and when their motive is to do good rather than evil.—Ed. Investigator.

Facts from my Sunday Readings.

"All sciences cultivated in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries were taught in Latin; all books with respect to them were written in that language. It would have been deemed a degradation of any inportant subject to have treated of it in a modern language. This confined silence without a very narrow circle, as the learned alone were thus admitted into the circle of knowledge."

ALMANAC ITEMS FOR JUNE.

The eleventh day of that month is dedicated in our calendars to St. Barnabas, the apostle, and is a holiday of the Church of England. In the days of old style, the 11th of June was the longest day of the year, hence an ancient rhyme,

"Barnaby bright,
The longest day and the shortest night."

The 12th is Ember day; the 15th St. Vitus day. This saint was a Sicilean martyr. From him, though it is not known why, is named the disease called St. Vitus' dance, and it was believed also that rain on this day indicated rain for thirty days thereafter.

The 24th is St. John the Baptist's day, and also a holiday of the Church of England, and the evening of this day is called Midsummer Eve, and was formerly a term of high observance among the English, as it still is in Catholic countries. Bonfires are lighted, around which people dance and occasionally leap through the flames. "Fasting St. John's fast" was a great feat of young women a century or two ago, and it was believed that a glimpse of the future might be obtained by going through certain ceremonies.

The 29th is St. Peter's day, a high festival of the Romish Church, and a holiday of the Church of England. It is celebrated in Rome with illuminations and magnificent ceremonials.

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

KIDDER'S

SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman,

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

To His Excellency, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States:

SIR: Whereas Mr. E. H. Heywood, a citizen of Massachusetts, a man of education and deep convictions, a graduate of Brown University, and highly respected by a large circle of persons, editor of a newspaper called "The Word," and publisher of tracts, pamphlets, and books, has been tried in the city of Boston, in a United States Circuit Court, and sentenced by Judge Clifford to two years' imprisonment and $100 fine for sending one of his pamphlets through the United States mail, the charge being that certain expressions in said pamphlets are obscene:

Now therefore we, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, beg to set forth the following facts and considerations, and ask your Excellency to exercise the power of pardon vested in you to meet cases of manifestly unjust punishment:

1st. The pamphlet in question was written and published with good motives, with the intent to promote true morality, and is not obscene in any sense of that word. It is written in as pure language as any work on physiological and social subjects; and contains less that is calculated to offend than the classic literature of the last two or three centuries, found in all our libraries, and circulating freely and without question in the United States mails; and not nearly as much that is objectionable as is contained in the frequent reports of divorce and other trials, which are published broadcast in the great daily journals and sent through the U. S. mails without restraint or question. Mr. Heywood, therefore, is sentenced to undergo a long imprisonment for no real offense and for doing less than other publishers and citizens of the United States are doing daily with impunity. Therefore we, your petitioners, seek at the hands of your Excellency a remedy for this very partial administration of the law.

2d. The freedom of the press is the one point, the world over, that should be the most jealously guarded by a free people. At no other point is power so tempted, or so apt to encroach; and no other freedom so inexorably exacts the full traditional "price"—"eternal vigilance." This freedom is guaranteed for the very purpose of protecting new and unpopular truths. This is the very source of much of social and intellectual progress and is the deadpoint in the struggle between truth and error. That which is popular, may almost be said to need no guarantee of freedom—it protects itself. It is the unknown or newly discovered truth which as much requires a tariff of protection, while it is new and unknown, as any growing manufacture in a young State requires it.

In this view the noble utterance of one of the earliest and most illustrious of your predecessors, James Madison, will greatly help to guide your action. He said on a memorable occasion: "It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The freemen of America did not wait until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

And now recently these views are anew and most cogently sustained by the United States Supreme Court. One of the points decided in the late case of Jackson, dealer in lottery tickets, is: "Regulations against transportation in the mail of printed matter which is open to examination, cannot be enforced so as to interfere in any manner with the freedom of the press. Liberty of circulating is essential to that freedom."

That decision was made after the trial of Mr. Heywood but before his sentence. His pamphlet and his whole case come within that decision—that freedom of the press shall not, "in any manner," be interfered with—and your Excellency is most urgently but respectfully requested to grant him, in your clemency, the benefit of that decision now; and relieve him from his fine and imprisonment by your pardon.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc., etc.

Odds and Ends.

CURIOUS—To see a rope walk.

A FAT OFFICE—The soap boiler's.

A CANDID MAN—The confectioner.

BEST SHOE FOR SUMMER—"Shoo fly."

MONEY doesn't make the man, but twenty shillings make the sovereign.

BOB INGERSOLL confesses that one thing was created to be eternally lost—an umbrella.

A LAME man carrying a basket of groceries went quietly down Main street, Cambridge, yesterday, when with the suddenness of lightning his hand went up to his eye, and his basket went rattling to the ground. The sidewalk was flooded with broken eggs and maple sugar, and the air was burned with profanity. A boy with a bean-sling in his hand and the impress of the devil on his face peered around the corner, and as he listened to the old man's blasphemy he muttered, "That was the boss shot!"

LEGAL ANECDOTE.—In the early days of Iowa flourished Judge McFarland, more famous for the length of his beard and the love of a joke than the profundity of his legal lore. The Judge was holding court in the then small village of Marshalltown, Tama county, and a noisy polemic named Woods, familiarly known as "Old Timbers," was holding forth in the characteristic style of forensic eloquence common to the border, and just approaching the grand climax of his harangue, when a huge "jack" came directly opposite the window of the court-room and made earth and air hideous with a prolonged He-haw! he-haw!! he-haw!!! completely silencing "Timber's" biggest guns, whereupon the judge, as soon as he could make himself heard, shouted, "Hold on Timbers! hold on I say; this court can't entertain but one of you fellows at a time." Grand tableau; curtain falls. Report says that Timbers refused to speak to the Judge until asked what he would take, when he blandly replied, "Whisky straight."

ANECDOTES OF CHILDREN.

Estella (two years old) had her hair "shingled" for the first time, and shortly after seeing a sheep which had just undergone the process of shearing, she exclaimed, "Look, papa! sheepy's got its hair shingled too." Observing a hog ready dressed for market, she examined its feet and reported, "Piggy got shoes on."

When learning her letters, she was told to call "U" you, when she would invariably say "letter me." Her mother, to induce her to call it by its proper name, told her it was letter me, when she immediately ran to her father exclaiming, "O, papa, I'se found a new letter—letter mama."

THE PROBLEM SOLVED—A DIALOGUE.

Bertie (aged four)—"How do people go up in the sky?"

Estella (aged nine)—"They can't do so."

Bertie—"Yes they can. Grandma said little Maud did."

Estella—"Yes; but she was dead."

Bertie—"How do dead people go up in the sky?"

Estella (short pause)—"O, they go up in little balloons."

Bertie—"Is God dead?"

Estella—"O, no; he lives up in the sky."

Bertie—"But how does God get up there and stay there?"

Estella (long pause)—"O he has a big balloon that he floats around in wherever he wants to."

Ascribe in writing right may write
To write and still be wrong;
For write and rite are neither right,
And don't to right belong.

Robertson is not Robert's son,
Nor did he rob Burt's son,
Yet Robert's sun is Robin's sun,
And everybody's sun.

Beer often brings a bier to man.
Coughing a coffin brings,
And too much ale will make us all,
As well as other things.

The person lies who says he lies
When he is not reclining;
And when consumptive folks decline
They all decline declining.

Quails do not quail before a storm,
A bough will bow before it;
We cannot rein the rains at all,
No earthly power reigns o'er it.

The dyer dyes awhile, then dies—
To dye he's always trying;
Until upon his dying bed
He things no more of dyeing.

A son of Mars mars many a son
All Deys must have their days;
And every knight should pray each night
To him who weighs his ways.

'Tis meet that man should meet our meat
To feed one's fortune's sun;
The fair should fare on love alone,
Else one cannot be won.

Alas, a lass is sometimes false;
Of faults a maid is made;
Her waist is but a barren waste—
Though stayed she is not staid.

The springs shoot forth each spring and shoot
Shoots forward one and all;
Though summer kills the flowers, it leaves
The leaves to fall in fall.

I would a story here commence.
But you might think it stale;
So we'll suppose that we have reached
The tail end of our tale. Railway Mail.

MODERATION is the silken string running through the pearl-chain of all virtues.—Fuller.

NEVER let your zeal outrun your charity. The former is but human, the latter is divine.—Hosea Ballou.

ALL our actions take their lines from the complexion of the heart; as landscapes their variety from light.—Bacon.

SINCE I cannot govern my own tongue, though within my own teeth, how can I hope to govern the tongue of others?—Franklin.

THERE is no traitor like him whose domestic treason plants the poniard within the breast which trusted to his truth.—Byron.

HE who wishes to travel far is careful of his steed; drink, eat, sleep, and let us light a fire which shall continue to burn.—Racine.

TREASON is trusted like the fox, who, never so tame, so cherished, and locked up, will have a wild trick of his ancestors.—Shakspere.

BY an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave like one that wraps the drapery of his couch about him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.—Bryant.

BE thankful that your lot has fallen on times when, though there may be many evil tongues and exasperated spirits, there are none who have fire and fagot at command.—Southey.

EVERY man will have his own criterion in forming his judgment of others. I depend very much on the effect of affliction. I consider how a man comes out of the furnace: gold will lie for a month in the furnace without losing a grain.—Cecil.

USE thy youth so that thou mayest have comfort to remember it when it hath forsaken thee, and not sigh and grieve at the account thereof. Use it as the spring-time which soon departeth, and wherein thou oughtest to plant and sow all provisions for a long and happy life.—Raleigh.

I LIKE the click of the type in the composing-stick of the compositor better than the click of the musket in the hands of the soldier. It bears a leaden messenger of deadlier power, of sublimer force, and of a surer aim, which will hit its mark, though it is a thousand years ahead.—Chapin.

GREATNESS, in itself, has ever been the result of organism, not self-creative effort. Man has had too great a tendency to gods. Had we but the power to confer immortality upon our deities, they would be jostling each other. We are much indebted to the years for slaughtering them.—Anon.

SOME people are all quality; you would think they were made up of nothing but title and genealogy. The stamp of dignity defaces in them the very character of humanity, and transports them to such a degree of haughtiness that they reckon it below themselves to exercise either good nature or good manners.—Estrange.

TITLES and mottoes to books are like escutcheons and dignities in the hands of a king. The wise sometimes condescend to accept of them; but none but a fool would imagine them of any real importance. We ought to depend upon intrinsic merit, and not the slender helps of the title.—Goldsmith.

LET us not take offense at men because of their rudeness, ingratitude, injustice, arrogance, love of self, and forgetfulness of others; they are so formed; such is their nature. To be annoyed with them for such conduct is the same as to exclaim against a stone falling or a fire burning.—Bruyere.

AMONG all the accomplishments of youth, there is none preferable to a decent and agreeable behavior among men, a modest freedom of speech, a soft and elegant manner of address, a graceful and lovely deportment, a cheerful gravity and good humor, with a mind appearing ever serene under the ruffling accidents of human life.—Watts.

WHAT heart has not acknowledged the influence of this hour, the sweet and soothing hour of twilight, the hour of love, the hour of adoration, the hour of rest, when we think of those we love only to regret that we have not loved them more dearly, when we remember our enemies only to forgive them?—Longfellow.

WHENEVER we cease to hate, to despise, and to persecute those who think differently from ourselves, whenever we look on them calmly, we find among them men of pure hearts and unbiased judgments, who, reasoning on the same data with ourselves, have arrived at different conclusions on the subject of the spiritual world.—Sismondi.

TO-MORROW may never come to us. We do not live in to-morrow. We cannot find it in any of our title-deeds. The man who owns whole blocks of real estate, and great ships on the sea, does not own a single minute of to-morrow. To-morrow! It is a mysterious possibility not yet born. It lies under the seal of midnight, behind the veil of glittering constellations.—Chapin.

EVERY woman should have some trade besides the mere art of keeping house, so that she may not only become an independent individual, but also be able to add something to the world's actual wealth. She should fill up the odd moments by reading, studying, and improving the mind. Make home pleasant, tidy, and comfortable, but do not take all of the valuable legacy of earthly existence in doing these things alone. Do not be content in merging your identity in that of husband or children, but of yourself, and by your own efforts, be somebody. Accomplish something that will count. Be one of the world's thinkers and doers.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

"CANNOT the dollars of our novelists be called storied earns?"

"IS THROWING down the gauntlet the natural relude to handling a man without gloves?"

JAPAN is making gigantic educational strides. It has now 24,000 elementary schools, and over 2,000,000 pupils.

THE clergymen of Detroit are protesting against Sunday funerals; but yet, not one of them have raised their voice against the wicked habit indulged in by some people of dying on that day.

FATHER DOWD finds that Catholic prayers are what prevented a riot in Montreal on the 12th. Then by that same token was it Catholic prayers that caused the destructive riot there three years ago?

THE largest of the pyramids of Egypt is 481 feet high, with 603 feet on the sides. Its base covers eleven acres. The stones are more than thirty feet in length, the layers 208, and 360,000 men were employed in its erection.

A GREAT many clergymen are going to Paris this summer. Paris has long been a place of popular summer resort with clergymen fond of witnessing the gyrations of the can-can dancers, without the risk of being discovered by any of their congregation.

THE Picayune says: "The easiest way to dispose of the Mississippi story about a man freezing to death on a hot summer day is to believe it. Put it down with the fish and snake stories, and let it be published again next year when the hot weather comes on."

"I SEE you people do not keep Sunday," remarked an American abroad to a lady resident in Paris, recently. "Ah, no, Monsieur," replied the Parisian, with a charming accent to her English, "we does not keep 'um—we lets 'um go loose." The American believed her.

IN France architects and contractors are legally held responsible for a period of ten years after the completion of a structure for total or partial loss occasioned by defective plans or work. Not a bad idea. Every man ought to be held responsible for whatever he undertakes to do.

IN a sun kitchen, at the Paris show, Prof. Mouchot, of Tours, has roasted quails in twenty minutes, and in forty-five boiled water. The cooking is done with an apparatus having a strong reflector. Thus the sun is daily proving itself to be the most useful institution in the entire universe.

A REVISED version of an old saying says, "If a man's religion is pretentious on Sunday, and obscure on week days, you had better do business with him on a cash basis." Puck adds: "True, and if a man's religion is pretentious on week days, and not on Sunday, you had better do no business with him at all."

A NAUGHTY MINISTER.—Herbert C. Miller, rector of Trinity Episcopal church, Park street, Gouveneur, N. Y., on oath of Maria B. Foster, of John street, a cripple and invalid, has been arrested for seduction. Mr. Miller had been paying his attentions to and was soon to marry a very estimable young lady of that town.

"THERE was a vast difference," remarked Gladiolus, "between Latimer and this baked bass we are devouring." "Yes," said Heliatrope, "because Latimer was burned at the stake, and this bass was turned at the bake." Gladiolus said that was not just what he was going to say, but he would let it go at that.

IN England the Society of Friends keeps up "First Day" schools on very much the same plan as that originally devised by Robert Raikes, who taught children to read and write. These schools are largely for adults. The more these schools are kept free from theological fables the more useful they will become.

"BE a red-hot Christian," says a gushing correspondent of one of the religious papers. Perhaps that may do for winter, but with the mercury at 102 degrees let us be refreshed with words which convey cooler ideas. The red-hotness of hell is the principal feature of the Christians' stock in trade. They operate heavily upon it.

THERE are over 25,000 flouring mills in the United States, giving employment to 60,000 men. These mills turn out annually 50,000,000 barrels of flour. Of how much more value these mills are to the country than the 60,000 churches it contains. The millers cost but a tithe of what the 65,000 preachers do, and they do an infinite amount more of real good.

PROF. WOOD has analyzed the seed of Sophora Speciosa, a native plant of Texas, and has detected a new alkaloid, which he names Sophoria. Half of one of the seeds is said to be sufficient to produce delicious exhilaration, followed by a sleep lasting one or two days. Here is a new source of intoxication that may prove another immense curse to the world.

THE Rev. Dr. Dana, of Plymouth Church, St. Paul, Minn., has joined the ranks of the clergymen who give their Sunday-school children five minute sermons on Sunday mornings. The children like these sermons, and the congregation crowd in also. It is doubtful if this clergyman has reached the proper minimum. He should take off the other five minutes.

A CHRISTIAN man, who had been to hear one of Bob Ingersoll's lectures, wants to know how it is, when a thunderstorm visits a town containing thirty beer saloons and five churches, that the lightning will travel all around the saloons and strike a church? He wants to know if that lightning is really directed by one who is a lover of churches and a hater of drinking places?

PERE HYACINTHE has concluded his course of lectures in Paris. His auditors have been chiefly Protestants. He has advocated a reform of Catholicism, based on the abolition of papal supremacy, popular election of priests, vernacular liturgies, and liberty of marriage for priests. Although his lectures have been well received, they have produced no popular enthusiasm.

PRESIDENT NOAH PORTER says that he is ready to throw his Congregationalism overboard if other sects will treat their isms in the same way. What a glorious thing it would be if all the theological professors and all the clergy could be induced to throw overboard all the myths and fables and shams of which their system is composed, and in their place embrace true science and reason.

THE idea of Unitarians holding a camp-meeting will strike some people as being strange, though for some years past, in some of their conferences, it has been usual to hold the summer session in a grove. This year the New Hampshire Unitarian Association projects something more extensive, in the shape of a grove-meeting at Weir's landing, Lake Winnipisiogee, beginning on Monday, and continuing for one week.

ANAGOORAX, an Athenian, who flourished in the fifth century before the Christian era, taught that wind was owing to refraction; that the rainbow was owing to reflection; that the moon is enlightened by the sun; that comets are wandering stars; that the fixed stars are beyond the sun, etc. Many of these have been regarded as modern discoveries. For the utterance of such truths he was persecuted and banished by the priesthood.

A RECENTLY published book, entitled "The Conversion of Children," is offered to agents with a view to engaging their services in selling it. By a curious mistake in the printing of a circular, it begins thus: "Confidential terms to agents for the Conversion of Children." This looks as if the agents thus confidentially appealed to were to undertake by contract and on commission the regeneration of the rising race. That contract, it must be understood, is already let out to the clergy.

AN ARCHBISHOP SUNSTRUCK.—In the list of victims of this heated term is the Right Rev. Archbishop Henni, of the Catholic Church. The Archbishop on Tuesday night returned from an extensive visitation tour, embracing several of the prominent points of the State. Yesterday morning, about half-past six, he attempted to rise, but was unable to do so. His symptoms grew rapidly more alarming, and he was unconscious during a portion of the day. The Archbishop is 75 years old, and his natural feebleness makes it doubtful whether he will be able to rally from this stroke.

MR. HORMUZD RASSAM, the successor of the late Mr. George Smith in Assyrian exploration, is on his way home with the antiquities which he has secured for the British Museum. He considers them too precious to be left to the care of others. He writes from Smyrna under date of the 19th of June, that he will await in Constantinople the permission which Mr. Layard will obtain for the shipment of the antiquities. Mr. Rassam had much difficulty in getting permission to carry on the research in which Mr. George Smith was baffled.

IT was recently announced that the pastor of a church at Fort Edward had resigned. Immediately he was inundated with a deluge of letters from candidates desiring to exhibit their gifts and graces to the Fort Edward people, with a view of becoming his successor. He now publishes a statement to the effect that his resignation does not take place till October, and that he resigns because the church is in debt, has no parsonage, and is not likely to have one, and cannot pay a living salary. Now let the great army of candidates spend their postage stamps in some other direction.

HOW TO conduct the services is a question that some Episcopalians are now discussing. The Rev. W. C. Winslow sums up his idea of the matter in the last Churchman, as follows: "Sermons ought to be delivered. There is a happy medium between merely reading a sermon or declaiming it. The exhortations, and perhaps some other parts of the service, should be simply but earnestly said. All Scripture used and the prayers should be read. The address or the sermon should be delivered. I think these three emphasized words express the variations in the tone of voice, and in the manner of the clergyman, that are to be employed in conducting the services of the sanctuary."

A MONSTROUS CRIME.—A traveling clergyman named Jacob Shiltner stopped at the house of Edward Baldwin, in Webster county, West Virginia, and asked permission to stay all night. As there were but poor accommodations for guests he was allowed to sleep with a daughter of the host, only six years old. He left early next morning, and it was found that he had horribly outraged the child, and had threatened to kill her if she told of his crime. A warrant was issued for his arrest, and he was pursued by the authorities into a wilderness fully fifty miles from a house. He was captured, and after an attempt to lynch him was placed in jail to await his trial in September. The proof of his guilt is conclusive. He is from Kentucky, and belongs to the Methodist Church.

CLARENCE HOSLER, of Laporte, Indiana, is a pious criminal. He was a clerk in the Laporte Post Office, and stole money, so he confessed, in order to get the means to dress well. "The first I took," he said, "was $25 to buy a dress suit. I belonged to the choir of the Episcopal church, and the rest were getting new clothes, and my means would not admit of my buying them, so I took the money. I belong to the Episcopal Church, and never took a dollar without vowing on my knees never to do so again. Then, at length, when I could not withstand the temptation any longer, I would vow to do it once more and then quit. I never went to bed without saying my prayers." When Mr. Hosler dons convict stripes he will probably regret that he was not content to dress within his income.

THE Cardinal Archbishop of Bologna urges the Italians to attest their faith and their piety by erecting a statue to the author of the "Imitation of Christ," as a "reparation for the insults offered to God during the Voltaire centenary." The Cardinal, referring to the Voltaire statue, says: "Let us then oppose monument to monument, protest to protest, to the statue of the enemy of Jesus Christ that of his greatest friend. To the Parisian monument consecrated to the base vituperator of evangelical morality let us oppose a monument to the author of the 'Imitation of Christ,' to the humble Benedictine of Vericelli, John Gerson, above all others profound in the hidden practices of that incomparable doctrine." With regard to the authorship of the "Imitation," the Unita Cattolica says: "According to the soundest critics, and particularly according to the latest researches made by De Gregory, it is held on all sides as incontestable that this book was written by John Gerson, of Cavaglia, a Benedictine monk, from 1220 to 1250, in St. Stephen's, Vericelli."

Events of the Week.

HAYTI has got another revolution.

THREE prisoners escaped from Sing Sing on the 17th.

THE Douglas monument was unveiled at Chicago on the 17th.

FIFTEEN THOUSAND people were in the surf at Rockaway, last Sunday.

THE new collector of this port commenced his duties last Saturday.

THE President attended the soldiers' reunion at Norwalk, Ohio, on the 20th.

PROF. DRAPER and party have gone to Rawlings, Wy., to view the eclipse.

GEN. MACKENZIE has crossed into Mexico with 800 men to recover stolen stock.

THE Greenback State Committee of Pennsylvania held its meeting on the 23d.

GEN. GRAHAM has been appointed Surveyor of this port, in place of Gen. Merritt.

THE revenue officers seized an illicit still and 1,000 cigars in this city on Wednesday.

THE Catholic church at Brampton, Ont., was burned to the ground on the night of the 18th.

SIX cases of yellow fever are reported at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Three patients have died.

JOHN G. TAPPAN, treasurer of the Boston Belting Company, is a defaulter to the extent of $800,000.

A BOILER exploded at Wheeling, W. Va., last Wednesday, killing four and fatally wounding five more.

A FIRE at Catlettsburg, Ky., destroyed nearly the whole of the business portion of the town. Loss, $200,000.

THE fastest time on record for five furlongs was made by Bonnie Wood, at Saratoga, last Saturday. She did it in 1.02¾.

FOUR sets of delegates attended the National Convention of this State last Tuesday, each claiming to be the representatives of the party in this city.

CONGRESSMAN WARNER, of Connecticut, undertook to cane an editor, Wm. Byington, for telling the truth about him, but the editor was too much for him, wresting his cane from him and breaking it over his own head.

A HEAT wave of terrific power has traveled over an immense section of the country. In St. Louis, 50 persons were prostrated in one day; in Chicago, 25, and in this city, last week, 104 were prostrated, of whom 24 died from the effects. The thermometer registered 104 degrees in the shade.

THE troops are steadily driving the hostile Indians before them. Only one more skirmish in which two soldiers were wounded and several Indians killed—by telegraph. The Warm Spring Indians declined to act as scouts for less than $100 a month per man and ponies, alleging that they had been converted: but for that sum they were willing to shoot their brethren. They certainly have the characteristics of Christians.

LORD BEACONSFIELD had an enthusiastic reception on his return to England. Italy is growling at the treaty. The Greeks are also dissatisfied, while there is the usual caviling of the opposition in his own country. Gladstone made a savage attack on his government last week, declaring his agreement with Turker to be an insane covenant. Beaconsfield will probably survive, however, as the Queen has made him a Knight of the Garter.

A POWERFUL thunder-storm passed over New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts and this State last Sunday. At Middleton, N. Y., the Methodist church was blown down, and two houses unroofed, damage $3,000. At Albany, sixteen houses were unroofed and destroyed; four horses were killed, and twenty others more or less injured; damage over $100,000. At Concord, N. H., the main school building was struck by lightning and destroyed, loss $20,000, partially insured. At Napanee, Ont., great damage was done by hail to the crops. In Gloucester, Mass., three persons were killed by lightning.

A short pause now occurred in the conversation, which was broken by Jennie, who said she believed she would now do her part towards the general entertainment by reading a letter which she had that day written to a friend to whom she had lent Ingersoll's "Lecture on Ghosts." "When the paper was returned to me," said she, "these words were written on its margin:"

"'Ingersoll confesses he knows nothing of what disposition is made of man after death; and that it is no more wonderful that man should live again than that he now lives; and if he knows precisely nothing, why is he, and all others like him, eternally carping about a thing which he himself admits he knows nothing about? M.'

"To this I wrote the following reply:

"FRIEND M.: Though I am an Infidel of only a few month's standing, yet I had been studying one side so much that I had it all pretty well digested, so my mind was all ready for the quick digestion of the opposite side. Just as soon as I saw there was real argument and absolute fact on the side of Infidelity, I at once began to read and investigate, and, consequently, I have grown faster than many do who care little about such subjects, and therefore study neither side particularly. I don't wonder you were surprised at finding my father's daughter endorsing such broad views as those of Ingersoll. But endorse them I do, and I will defend them if I can. Now, as to his confession that he knows nothing about the future, that is the one best reason why we should talk, study, and think about the subject. That is the only way we can learn.

"I admire and accept nearly every statement Ingersolt has made in his lectures, though I do differ a little with him as regards the point that it is not more wonderful that a man should live again, than it is that he now lives. I think it is vastly more wonderful. All events that are common and usual we accept as every-day occurrences. 'Man now lives,' and he has lived as far back as we can trace his descent. We find no nation so old but that we can go back beyond it to a civilization still older. Millions and millions of years may have smiled upon human beings who trod the earth in ages gone by, so that men 'have lived' is not to be wondered at. But we do not know of a single individual identity, of any organism, animal, vegetable, or insect, bird, fish, or flower that has ever lived after it was entirely dead. It is true that people have, in all ages, pretended to restore the dead to life; but cut a man in halves, remove his heart or any vital portion of his body, and no power in all the universe can restore life to that individual. It has never been done, and all science shows how utterly impossible it would be to do it, and this is why we refuse to believe it can be done. This is why we demand of Spiritualists more and better proof that they can materialize individuals, fruit, flowers, gems, or jewels than they have yet given us. The living organisms that are about us when they die may leave behind them the germs and seeds of future earthly existences similar to themselves, but the individual identity of each one is forever gone when death cuts the silver cord, and that which was before an organized existence becomes mere disorganized matter ready to develop into new forms and arrangements according to circumstances and environments. We know nothing of the future, it is true, and what little evidence we think we have is negative evidence, but until the affirmative is proven that stands good, and as yet this has never been done. If there be a life to come, why should we worry about it. To believe or disbelieve in it cannot alter the result. The present is ours to make the most and best of that we can. If we live again, we shall be as happy as we deserve to be, and who wants more than he merits or earns? Ingersoll has carefully weighed the evidence, known facts as well as Scriptural "evidence," and he confesses his ignorance like a man. But you believers take the evidence of dead ghosts, written in a big book, and the opinions of your fathers, grandfathers, and great-grandfathers, and say "man lives again;" but have you real knowledge, or is it only guesswork and say so? Is it a sign of ignorance to inquire and doubt? Is not all progress born of skepticism, doubt, and unbelief? Is it knowledge to blandly affirm and dogmatically assert? Is not real wisdom modest and retiring? Does the scholar and scientist say, "Believe my facts or be damned?" No; he quietly goes to work and proves the world to be round, the day and night to be caused by its diurnal revolution; he proves that man has existed for millions of years upon the face of the earth, and that billions of eons of ages rolled away after the world was a globe, before any living organism could exist upon it.

"The bold astronomer, Galileo, was persecuted and forced to recant, but the world still rolled on, and the spoken fact remained for future astronomers to build upon. Geologists were shooted at, sneered at, and put down, but the facts lived, and old theology set her wits at work, moulded over the dogmas, and said the good book never denied what she once swore it asserted. She stretched the six days of creation into six long periods of time, and all went along smoothly again. Thus, step by step, the scientist goes on proving his facts, and for each one proved theology has to alter and amend her old plan to make it coincide with actual known facts. The true child of nature always reasons and experiments. The theologian rests his proofs upon testimony. The Indians in Omaha when told by a missionary some years since that their corn would not amount to anything if they planted it upon the sabbath, did not stand to argue the point or refer to the dead ghosts of their ancestors for testimony to the contrary, but quietly planted, hoed, and worked a certain field of the cereal wholly on the sabbath, and as they spent one whole day in seven on that special field, it was larger and finer than any other corn they had, thus demonstrating not only that the missionary was wrong, but that it was labor, skill, and care that produced good crops, and not any supernatural agency. And now in conclusion, please let me say that till you can find something more debatable against Mr. Ingersoll than this simple confession of ignorance about the unknowable, I hope you will not carp or cavil at him any more. If all men were as good, kind, generous, and happy as Ingersoll is, the world would be far better off."

"Well, Jenny, said Rose, "I think you have evoluted immensely considering how short a time has passed since you took the first step. And what does your father say to it?"

"Why, father has been North, you know, to his sister's nearly ever since I began to grow in truth, and I have thus far said nothing to him on the subject. But I am thinking of writing to him to-morrow and telling him all about it, for I want him to get over the first shock of the discovery before I see him. I can tell him better on paper, for I shall not be so embarassed by his sad, stern glance. He is a good, kind father, but you know is strict and stern. And Mary, who is staying with me, knows all about the new departure I have taken, and what is better still, has kept even pace with me. She is mother's only sister and is naturally liberal, and she says mother was too, but was so quiet about it that father never discovered it. So you see I inherit Liberal tendencies and only needed a spark to set me off. But it is nearly dark and I must go home."

"Yes, and I too," said Myra, and the little group was soon scattered never all to meet again.

CHAPTER XI.

"What art thou death, that we should fear?
The shadow of a shade!
What's in thy name, to meet the ear,
Of which to be afraid?"

"Thou art not care, thou art not pain,
But thou art rest and peace;
'Tis thou canst make our sorrows vain
And bid our torments cease."

LIFE is not all sunshine, for though joy and happiness are the birthright of every one that lives, yet sorrow, too, must come with its train of mourning and its saddened weepers. Death! What gentle, tender, loving heart ever hears the word unmoved? Life is such a dear and precious boon that we cling to it with tireless tenacity. The lame, the sick, and the blind, the idiot and the lunatic—all, as a general thing, prize and value life, and are loth to part with it. A very few do, it is true, voluntarily take away their own lives, but it is usually done in a fit of frenzy, or by those who are laboring under morbid melancholy. To die is as natural as it is to live, yet death is one of the saddest things in life. Not to those who are dying, for while hope remains they are hopeful, and when hope is entirely gone, and vitality too is at a low ebb, few care for aught but "rest and peace." But those who are left behind feel the loss daily and hourly, and a great void is created in the heart that nothing but the gentle healing ministrations of time can ever fill. 'Tis nature's fiat, her stern decree, that compels all who live to undergo the dread ordeal of seeing beloved friends one by one drop away, and pass forever from the sight. And by and by those who are left must go too and be seen no more.

The lovely and tender flower fades and falls. The lofty and noble oak of the forest yields up its life to the stern destroyer; bird, beast and reptile, each and all, has its allotted time to live, mature, decay and die; and shall man, proud man, be exempt from this common fate of all? No! he too must bend to the inevitable and see himself blotted out from the face of the earth, and in a little time from the memory of all earth's coming race. Our theme is not a pleasant one, yet as it is the lot of all to die, and as death fills up a portion of the record-leaves of every book of life, we do not feel justified in passing over in silence this important subject, and in these chroniclings of things as they are.

In our last chapter we remarked that the little company of girls who have formed the central pictures in the warp and woof of our story, would never all meet together again. All well; all strong, robust and seemingly quite impervious to death's cruel shafts, and each one feeling the healthful blood bounding and coursing vigorously through their veins, they naturally expected a long lease of life, strength, and happiness. Man proposes but fate and circumstances dispose.

In precisely the same manner, from the equator of the planetary mass, as soon as the centrifugal force gained predominance over the centripetal force, new nebulous rings were ejected, which moved round the planets as the latter moved round the sun. These nebulous rings, too, became condensed into rotating balls. Thus arose the moons, only one of which moves round our earth, whilst four move round Jupiter, and six round Uranus. The ring of Saturn still shows us a moon in its early stage of development. As by increasing refrigeration these simple processes of condensation and expulsion repeated themselves over and over again, there arose the different solar systems, the planets rotating round their central suns, and the satellites or moons moving round their planets.

The original gaseous condition of the rotating bodies of the universe gradually changed, by increasing refrigeration and condensation, into the fiery fluid or molten state of aggregation. By the process of condensation, a great quantity of heat was emitted, and the rotating suns, planets, and moons soon changed into glowing balls of fire, like gigantic drop of melted metal, which emitted light and heat. By loss of heat, the melted mass on the surface of the fiery fluid ball became further condensed, and thus arose a thin, firm crust, which enclosed a fiery fluid nucleus. In all essential respects our mother earth probably did not differ from the other bodies of the universe.

In view of the object of these pages, it will not be of especial interest to follow in detail the history of the natural creation of the universe, with its different solar and planetary systems, and to establish it mathematically by the different astronomical and geological proofs. The outlines of it, which I have just mentioned, must be sufficient here, and for further details I refer to Kant's "General History of Nature and Theory of the Heavens." I will only add that this wonderful theory, which might be called the cosmological gas theory, harmonizes with all the general series of phenomena at present known to us, and stands in no irreconcileable contradiction to any one of them. Moreover, it is purely mechanical or monistic, makes use exclusively of the inherent forces of eternal matter, and entirely excludes every supernatural process, every pre-arranged and conscious action of a personal Creator. Kant's Cosmological Gas Theory consequently occupies a similar supreme position in Anorganology, especially in Geology, and forms the crown of our knowledge in that department, in the same way as Lamarck's Theory of Descent does in Biology, and especially in Anthropology. Both rest exclusively upon mechanical or unconscious causes (causæ efficientes), in no case upon pre-arranged or conscious causes (causæ finales). Both, therefore, fulfill all the demands of a scientific theory, and consequently will remain generally acknowledged until they are replaced by better ones.

I will, however, not deny that Kant's grand cosmogony has some weak points, which prevent our placing the same unconditional confidence in it as in Lamarck's Theory of Descent. The notion of an original gaseous chaos filling the whole universe presents great difficulties of various kinds. A great and unsolved difficulty lies in the fact that the Cosmological Gas Theory furnishes no starting point at all in explanation of the first impulse which caused the rotary motion in the gas-filled universe. In seeking for such an impulse, we are involuntarily led to the mistaken questioning about a "first beginning." We can as little imagine a first beginning of the eternal phenomena of the motion of the universe as of its final end.

The universe is unlimited and immeasurable in both space and time. It is eternal, and it is infinite. Nor can we imagine a beginning or end to the uninterrupted and eternal motion in which all particles of the universe are always engaged. The great law of the conservation of force and the conservation of matter, the foundations of our whole conception of nature, admit of no other supposition. The universe, as far as it is cognizable to human capability, appears as a connected chain of material phenomena of motion, necessitating a continual change of forms. Every form, as the temporary result of a multiplicity of phenomena of motion, is as such perishable, and of limited duration. But, in the continual change of forms, matter and the motion inseparable from it remain eternal and indestructible.

Now, although Kant's Cosmological Gas Theory is not able to explain the development of motion in the whole universe in a satisfactory manner, beyond that gaseous state of chaos, and although many other weighty considerations may be brought forward against it, especially by chemistry and geology, yet we must on the whole acknowledge its great merit, inasmuch as it explains in an excellent manner, by due consideration of development, the whole structure of all that is accessible to our observation, that is, the anatomy of the solar system, and especially of our planetary system. It may be that this development was altogether different from what Kant supposes, and our earth may have arisen by the aggregation of numberless small meteorides, scattered in space, or in any other manner, but hitherto no one has as yet been able to establish any other theory of development, or to offer one in the place of Kant's cosmogony.

After this general glance at the monistic cosmogony, or the non-miraculous history of the development of the universe, let us now return to a minute fraction of it, to our mother earth, which we left as a ball flattened at both poles and in a fiery fluid state, its surface having condensed by becoming cooled into a very thin firm crust. The crust, on first cooling, must have covered the whole surface of the terrestrial sphere as a continuous smooth and thin shell. But soon it must have become uneven and hummocky; for, since during the continued cooling, the fiery fluid nucleus became more and more condensed and contracted, and consequently the diameter of the earth diminished, the thin cold crust, which could not closely follow the softer nuclear mass, must have fallen in in many places. An empty space would have arisen between the two, had not the pressure of the outer atmosphere forced down the fragile crust towards the interior, breaking it in so doing. Other unevennesses probably arose from the fact that, in different parts, the cooled crust during the process of refrigeration contracted also itself, and thus became fissured with cracks and rents. The fiery fluid nucleus flowed up to the external surface through these cracks, and again became cooled and stiff. Thus, even at an early period there arose many elevations and depressions, which were the first foundations of mountains and valleys.

After the temperature of the cooled terrestrial ball had fallen to a certain degree, a very important new process was effected, namely, the first origin of water. Water had until then existed only in the form of steam in the atmosphere surrounding the globe. The water could evidently not condense into a state of fluid drops until the temperature of the atmosphere had considerably decreased. Now, then, there began a further transformation of the earth's crust by the force of water. It continually fell in the form of rain, and in that form washed down the elevations of the earth's crust, filling the depressions with the mud carried along, and, by depositing it in layers, it caused the extremely important neptunic transformations of the earth's crust, which have continued since then uninterruptedly, and which in our next chapter we shall examine a little more closely.

It was not till the earth's crust had so far cooled that the water had condensed into a fluid form, it was not till the hitherto dry crust of the earth had for the first time become covered with liquid water, that the origin of the first organisms could take place. For all animals and all plants—in fact, all organisms—consist in great measure of fluid water, which combines in a peculiar manner with other substances, and brings them into a semi-fluid state of aggregation. We can, therefore, from these general outlines of the inorganic history of the earth's crust, deduce the important fact, that at a certain definite time life had its beginning on earth, and that terrestrial organisms did not exist from eternity, but at a certain period came into existence for the first time.

Now, how are we to conceive of this origin of the first organisms? This is the point at which most naturalists, even at the present day, are inclined to give up the attempt at natural explanation, and take refuge in the miracle of an inconceivable creation. In doing so, as has already been remarked, they quit the domain of scientific knowledge, and renounce all further insight into the eternal laws which have determined nature's history. But before despondingly taking such a step, and before we despair of the possibility of any knowledge on this important process, we may at least make an attempt to understand it. Let us see if in reality the origin of a first organism out of inorganic matter, the origin of a living body out of lifeless matter, is so utterly inconceivable and beyond all experience. In one word, let us examine the question of spontaneous generation, or archigony. In so doing, it is above all things necessary to form a clear idea of the principal properties of the two chief groups of natural bodies, the so-called inanimate or inorganic, and the animate or organic bodies, and then establish what is common to, and what are the differences between, the two groups. It is desirable to go somewhat carefully into the comparison of organisms and anorgana, since it is commonly very much neglected, although it is necessary for a right understanding of nature from the monastic point of view. It will be most advantageous here to look separately at the three fundamental properties of every natural body; these are matter, form, and force. Let us begin with matter. (Gen. Morph. iii.)

By chemistry we have succeeded in analyzing all bodies known to us into a small number of elements or simple substances, which cannot be further divided, for example, carbon, oxygen, nitrogen, sulphur, and the different metals: potassium, sodium, iron, gold, etc. At present we know about seventy such elements or simple substances. The majority of them are unimportant and rare; the minority only are widely distributed, and compose not only most of the anorgana, but also all organisms. If we compare those elements which constitute the body of organisms with those which are met with in anorgana, we have first to note the highly important fact that in animal and vegetable bodies no element occurs but what can be found outside of them in inanimate nature. There are no special organic elements or simple organic substances.

The chemical and physical differences existing between organisms and anorgana, consequently, do not lie in their material foundation; they do not arise from the different nature of the elements composing them, but from the different manner in which the latter are united by chemical combination. This different manner of combination gives rise to certain physical peculiarities, especially in density of substance, which at first sight seems to constitute a deep chasm between the two groups of bodies. Inorganic or inanimate natural bodies, such as crystals and the amorphous rocks, are in a state of density which we call the firm or solid state, and which we oppose to the liquid state of water and to the gaseous state of air. It is familiar to every one that these three different degrees of density, or states of aggregation of anorgana, are by no means peculiar to the different elements, but are the results of a certain degree of temperature. Every inorganic solid body, by increase of temperature, can be reduced to the liquid or melted state, and, by further heat, to the gaseous or elastic state. In the same way most gaseous bodies, by a proper decrease of temperature can first be converted into a liquid state, and further, into a solid state of density.

Christianity and Materialism.—Concluded.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Materialism necessarily enjoins, as all important, a wise provision for the future. "Competence," says the poet Young, "is vital to content." Poverty, notwithstanding the eulogies on it in the New Testament, is to be avoided whenever possible. Although not a crime, it is certainly a great misfortune to be poor through life. A competency in life gives independence, comfortable surroundings, opportunities for the cultivation of the mind, and ability to benefit our fellow-men. Materialism, by calling attention to the affairs of this world instead of dwelling on the imaginary glories of another, encourages real, substantial prosperity and progress.

Christianity teaches the existence of a personal devil, and in the past especially, has led men to refer their evils to other than natural causes, and by diverting attention from the real source of their ills and misfortunes, has prevented or delayed the removal of thousands of evils.

Materialism, by rejecting the absurd notion of a devil, that "goes about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour," and trying to make mankind as miserable as possible, and by teaching that for all phenomena there are adequate natural causes, necessarily encourages the investigation of the real cause of man's misfortunes, together with efforts for their removal.

Christianity regards Jesus as an incarnate God, who should be worshiped.

Materialists generally regard Jesus—the records of whose life are very scanty and largely fabulous, and of whose existence, even, there is some ground for doubt—as probably a man of no great intellect but of a benevolent heart, of some chimerical and fanatical notions, together with a good deal of moral wisdom, a man thoroughly conscientious, who lived a life of purity and died a martyr to his faith and supposed mission. As a reformer and a benefactor, he has our esteem and gratitude. Could he return to earth at the present day, there is scarcely a doubt that he would be regarded by a large proportion of his professed followers somewhat as he was by the Pharisee of eighteen hundred years ago. He would, probably, find less cordial welcome and less courteous treatment in the churches where service is performed in his name, than in the Liberal halls where his character is freely criticised, and the miracles ascribed to him are ridiculed as fabulous and foolish.

Christianity has unbounded reverence for the past. Its golden age on earth was in the past. Its sacred books came down from the past. God communicated with men direct, talked with them face to face, and even tried his hand at wrestling with them in the past. Why should it not revere the past?

Materialism, while it accepts the lessons of the past, in view of the contrast between what once was and what now is, inculcates rather the spirit and sentiment of the poet:

"There is nothing so good as the new,
There is nothing so poor as the old;
Better the morning's silvery dew,
Than the evening's river of gold;
Better, a thousand fold."

Christianity is constantly making concessions and losing ground.

Materialism has achieved victory after victory in science, philosophy, and morals, and is going on from "conquering to conquer."

We conclude with a summary of what we have presented:

Christianity teaches:

1. The existence of a God infinite in presence, yet a personal being; infinite in knowledge, yet a being who cogitates, contrives, plans, and designs like man; infinite in power, yet the author of a world full of imperfections; infinite in goodness (as well as power), yet permits martyrs to expire amid flames, and patriots and philanthropists to languish in dungeons; unchangeable, yet at a certain time after a beginningless state of inaction, aroused from his idleness and made a universe out of nothing; is not the cause of evil, yet the creator of everything and everybody save himself; is free from infirmities, yet is pleased with some things and displeased with others; is without body, parts, or passions, and yet is of the masculine gender.

2. The original perfection of everything.

3. The existence of a devil—a creature made by God, and the author of evil that will exist forever.

4. That man is a "fallen creature," and unable to improve by his own unassisted efforts.

5. That man can be "saved" only through the blood and merits of Christ.

6. That belief in the Christian system involves moral merit; disbelief, sin.

7. That it is man's duty to worship God by prayer and praise.

8. That a comparatively small portion of mankind in the future will be happy; the greater portion will be in torment eternally.

9. That man has received a book revelation, of which, however, but a comparatively small part of the race has ever obtained information.

10. That reason should be subordinated to the teachings of the Bible.

11. That the acts of the Jews, such as are practiced now by barbarians only, were commanded by God, and were, therefore, right.

12. That there are mysteries contrary to experience and reason, which must nevertheless be believed.

13. Although God has given man a revelation, there is great uncertainty as to what he meant to say on several subjects of great importance.

14. That woman is man's inferior and subordinate, was made for his gratification and convenience, while man was made for himself and the glory of God.

15. That God has approved and sanctioned polygamy, slavery, and despotism.

16. That man should take no thought for the morrow. He should pattern after the lilies of the field.

17. That man's ills and sufferings are ascribable largely to the immediate agency of a personal, malicious devil—a being of extended presence, of almost infinite knowledge, of great strategy, and immense power.

18. That Jesus was God Almighty incased in human flesh.

19. That the golden age of the earth was in the past.

Materialism teaches:

1. The self-existence, the eternity, and the sufficiency of nature, and the universality and invariableness of natural law.

2. That in the history of this world there has been an evolution from the simple to the complex, from the special to the general, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous.

3. That good and evil are relative terms. All morality is founded on utility and evolved by the wants and necessities of human existence. Honesty is right, not because a God has so declared, but because man's security, safety, and happiness are promoted by it.

4. That man's condition, although imperfect, is improvable by his own unaided efforts.

5. That man should look to himself and not to a spectacle of suffering and death of eighteen hundred years ago, for improvement and elevation.

6. That belief and unbelief are involuntary and without moral merit or demerit.

7. That instead of worshiping God, we should direct all our efforts to improve ourselves, letting "gods attend on things for gods to know."

8. That man, wherever he may exist, it is rational to believe, will be fitted to his condition. An unbroken, everlasting sleep, which probably awaits us all, affords no ground for fear. And how infinitely preferable to a future state in which the majority of our race will be forever miserable!

9. That the teachings of reason and the lessons of experience are the only revelations man has received.

10. That the Bible should be tested by the same rules of historical and modern criticism that are applied to other ancient documents.

11. That the barbarous acts of the Israelites, like those of other ancient nations, were the result of their undeveloped, uncivilized condition.

12. That the universe is full of natural mysteries, above our comprehension, but none contrary to our reason.

13. That the difference of opinion among Liberals is consistent with their common position that man has no infallible standard. That the enlightened reason of man is the highest and best standard he possesses.

14. That woman is man's equal and natural companion—exists for him only in the sense in which he exists for her.

15. That slavery, polygamy, and despotism are evils whenever and wherever they exist.

16. That man should attend to the affairs of this world, and, contrary to the notion of Jesus, should take "thought for the morrow."

17. That evil is due to natural causes. Man can gradually remove the evils that afflict him by becoming acquainted with his nature, relations, and surroundings.

18. Jesus was probably a reformer, a "come-outer," an "Infidel," of his time. We can esteem him as a benefactor without worshiping him as a God.

19. The present is better than the past, and the golden age of the world is in the future.

Who is at Fault?

PROVIDENCE, July 8, 1878.

Editor of The Index: You will notice by the report of the Providence Journal that in these "Plantations" dedicated to soul liberty a very heartfelt feeling found expression last evening in a meeting attended by one of the most thoughtful and respectable audiences that could have been gathered on any occasion. I have also been assured by some of the most eminent members of the Rhode Island bar that the rulings of Judge Clark in the case of Mr. Heywood were partial, arbitrary, and wholly unwarranted.

Now does the Liberal League mean business, or is it a harmless figure-head? If there ever was a fitting occasion to prove its usefulness, this issue has furnished it. The history of liberty is essentially embodied in the progress of defining liberty. If a judge can send a man to jail at hard labor for two years for attacking "time honored institutions," who is safe?

A hundred years ago the doctrine of the Trinity was one of these "time-honored institutions," and public sentiment backed the judge who condemned the "immoral" pamphleteer to prison. While the evolutionists promise us so much for the infinite perfectibility of the race, is it possible that any one arrangement of fallible men is so far a finality that a man must suffer martyrdom for attacking it? These questions and issues have been forced upon thoughtful men, through the startling proceedings of the court which sentenced Mr. Heywood. No radical can afford to stand on the fence. The Liberal League, with every other power for good, is to be put on record in these matters. Shall it be found wanting? HENRY APPLETON.

[It is not talk or empty resolutions that are wanted, but vigorous action. The National Liberal League was designed to act efficiently in defense of equal rights in religion and universal mental liberty; but it must remain weak until those who are interested in these principles prove by their own active support of it that they appreciate its value. Rhode Island has not a single local League; has Mr. Appleton ever tried to help form one? The National League can only become powerful by the multiplication of live local Leagues; and it strikes us as not very reasonable or fair for those who have not lifted a finger in its support to map out work for it in this assuming manner. Let the Liberals form a great constituency of local Leagues and supply the Directors with ample funds; and then let them complain if the work is not done with vigor and zeal. But until they do this, let them blame themselves if they find themselves powerless to protect their own rights. For five years and a half we have labored incessantly to give them the means of protecting these rights by a powerful organization; and we do not see the propriety of being called upon in this way to "make brick without straw."—Ed. Index.]

COMMENTS BY THERON C. LELAND.

The questions put by Mr. Appleton are very pertinent—not by any means impertinent. The National Liberal League might be a power to-day, in Liberal affairs, if it were led by a staff of officers who wished, or knew how, to bring its forces to bear on questions as they arise. We can get some work out of a five year old colt, one would think, if only under the name of breaking and exercise.

"Does the Liberal League mean business, or is it a harmless figure-head? If there ever was a fitting occasion to prove its usefulness this issue has furnished it." But the League, as such, stands idly by and never moves a hand or opens a lip. Its president, as president, is dumb; and holds a gag on all the rest. As editor, he dawdles and wishy-washes, says he "would an if he could" and the League might be efficient if it were stronger.

Mr. Appleton's statement shows that there is much good material out of which to make Leagues in those "Plantations," now running to waste. Doubtless they know what they are about. They have taken observations of this man who runs a League. They have noted his conduct in times which try men's souls, and have concluded that he hadn't much to try. When Liberal editors were arrested, some months since, the people listened for some firm, determined utterance from the League on the subject; and they heard what? "Talk" of the kind that might be called "tall," and that meant something? "Resolutions" that were not "empty?" Not a bit of it. They heard nothing whatever from the gentleman as President of the League. But from him as an individual and an editor they heard defenses of Comstock, the good man, and doer of good work; and criticisms of the arrested editors, apologies for the wolf, blame for the lambs, and aspersions on their friends and defenders. A leader who doesn't lead, and, when implored to give the word "Forward" to some action in this business for which we were enlisted, "jaws back:" "You blackguard! instead of standing there inspecting our movements, too curious about what we are going to do and watching us bury every little talent, or hatchet, or contribution, in our little napkin; why haven't you enlisted more soldiers so we could exhibit a yet wider efficiency in standing stock still"—such a leader isn't calculated to inspire enlistments and uprisings of Leagues in Plantations of Providence or elsewhere to any very great extent.

There are such things as skirmishes as well as great battles, such a strategy as worrying large forces with few troops. There are Lexingtons as well as Waterloos, and there are Captains who meet emergencies, great or small, as they arise, and with the appropriate force, great or small, as it is needed. But this great General scorns any action less than Sadowa or Sedan. He lets all minor combats go by default and submits to challenge and attack, snub or affront from the orthodox party, right and left, without notice or response. "God in the Constitution alone is foeman worthy of my steel," says the General, says he! Here are organized for that work alone some forty-five affiliated societies. Forty odd Leagues, and this man has not begun to put on his boots!

"It is not talk or empty resolutions that are wanted, but vigorous action." Well, then, why in the name of all that is practical don't we have the action—vigorous action? That is what we have waited for all along, but as yet there appears not the first sign of action. Liberals are arrested right and left, editors are imprisoned, even women practicing as physicians, and women as editors are hauled before Grand Juries, but not a word of protest or sign of action comes from the League. It don't "act efficiently," nor act at all, precisely when the occasions arise calling for its action; and it will "remain weak" until it exhibits some life, and some sense of the fitness and nature of the work it was organized to do.

Mr. Appleton no doubt will answer the personal question for himself in The Index; but for TRUTH SEEKER readers let us imagine him replying, as he may rightly do: "Why should I try to help form an organization to do nothing but come up missing in the very crisis where it promised support. It strikes me as not very reasonable or fair for those who have squatted on an organization, making great promises, but failing utterly when the crucial test comes, not lifting a finger to carry out the work they themselves mapped out to do—to ask that I shall go on organizing more local Leagues to do more of nothing and contribute farther to the general inefficiency. I prefer to work for something, and have something to show for my efforts. Organization is all very beautiful; but what if it does nothing but organize? I propose to organize for some efficient purpose, not altogether for show. Until you do this, you have only yourselves to blame if you find your growth arrested, and a general conclusion arrived at that the League is a failure and a good organization to let alone while under its present management. Five years and a half of incessant labor for so little "straw" should teach a leader that he himself isn't much of a 'brick.'"

Let the League, with the means it already has at command, set about the work it was organized to do, supply the Liberal public with ample assurance that it is in dead earnest, and means business, even let it "talk" and "resolve," if it can do nothing else—better that than to be absolutely dumb—then let its president and officers complain if new Leagues are not rapidly organized, and a general pouring in of new recruits to sustain and extend the work does not result. Prove yourselves faithful over a few things before you fume and fret because you are not invested with lordship over many.

Now suppose the editor of The Index, and president of the League had been an enterprising, fearless, progressive person, had made good use of his official position and opportunities, and had been able to meet these "figure head" flings after something like the following victorious fashion:

"Mr. Appleton, Sir: Five years and a half ago I saw this conflict coming—I felt these new invasions of American liberty threatening. To meet them I organized the National Liberal League, and we met in council year after year, increased our numbers, strengthened our forces, framed and perfected our platform, and flung our Liberal flag to the breeze. Five years from my original launching of this movement came the first onset of the expected struggle. The pious party organized an onslaught on the Liberal party under the charge of obscenity. They even arrested some of our editors under that charge. It was a base and yet wholly baseless charge, and the whole world knew it to be so. The Liberal League by logic, by instinct, by all the motives which can arouse the energies and stir the hearts of a free, progressive people, knew and accepted this conflict as peculiarly its own. It rushed at once to the rescue; and The Index, its organ, sounded the alarm far and near. It made common cause with the arrested editors, it published full and fair statements of their cases, and defended their characters. As president of the League, we sent out proclamations to all the local Leagues, calling on them to rally to the support of the editors under trial. We sent out blank petitions to all Liberals and Leagues the country over, asking signatures to an appeal to Congress to repeal or modify the obnoxious law. We also asked the local Leagues and other friends of Liberalism to contribute funds for the defense of our brother Liberals in the courts.

"After a few weeks the petitions and contributions came returning in grandly. We aggregated up 70,000 names signed to the petitions, which we forwarded to Washington, placed them in the able hands of our noble brother, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, with whom we made arrangements to introduce that petition in the best manner before the appropriate committee of Congress, explain and defend it there, and see that it should receive a full and careful hearing.

"The contributions of funds also aggregated more than $1,200, which we applied scrupulously and carefully to the defense of the accused. We obtained a speedy trial, we employed able counsel, we had the cases well managed, and beat our opponents on all the points charged in the courts; and our accused editors were set free.

"That is, all except one. In one exceptional case where there had been a great deal of freedom of speech, and consequently the very place to apply the guarantees of the Constitution to defend it; where, also, a peculiarly atrocious judge presided and decreed the rulings in the case—in this instance one of our friends was unfairly tried and most brutally sentenced to fine and imprisonment.

"Then, as a league, we resolved to brook no defeat; and we redoubled our efforts. We sent another petition rushing over the country to obtain signatures, asking the President of the United States to pardon our brother so unfairly tried and so unjustly punished. We called the local Leagues together in special session, we got resolutions passed—full-blooded, able-bodied resolutions—not 'empty' ones; and we organized an indignation meeting in old Faneuil Hall in the city where the atrocity was perpetrated, in which meeting we spoke ourselves and encouraged others to speak in defense of full and impartial freedom of the press and of speech.

"All this, Mr. Appleton, we have done; and we submit, sir, it has been a good work to do. Upon learning this you must give us due credit, and certainly concede that we are no 'figure head.'

"Now, sir, we would like to know what share in this honorable work you, Mr. Appleton, have taken? What did you and your friends down there in Providence Plantations do to support our Liberal martyrs and maintain the equal freedom of the people? What right, sir, have you to come up here to Boston and call us a 'figure head' when we have accomplished all this noble work? and you gentlemen down there in Providence Plantations haven't a single Liberal League; and you, sir, Mr. Appleton, never helped to form one. Go to, now, Mr. Appleton, and see what a figure your own head cuts, with its work thus reduced to zero—that is, no figure at all. Yours in all good conscience,

"F. E. A."

Would to all that is brave, and noble, and true, that this were not all a dream!

That Itinerant Defender of Christianity.

WHAT KIND OF A MAN CLARK BRADEN IS.

Clark Braden, after having made, and for two or three years repeated, false statements against B. F. Underwood, when confronted by Mr. Underwood during the Jacksonville, Ill., debate, retracted his statements and apologized to the man he had wronged. He put into Mr. Underwood's hands a written statement, in which he said: "I am compelled to confess I was mistaken." It is dated Aug. 14, 1876. The Jacksonville Courier of Aug. 16, 1876, said: "Mr. Braden last night confessed he was mistaken in certain statements he had made concerning Mr. Underwood, and which have caused much ill feeling." He expressed himself grateful to Mr. Underwood for the manly and generous treatment he had received from him, especially in declining to use certain documents against him which had been sent him by Braden's own brethren in the Church; and he promised to publish in his own denominational papers a retraction of what he had said reflecting on Mr. Underwood.

To the surprise of Mr. Underwood and others, there appeared in the Christian Standard of Sept. 2, 1876, a card conveying the impression that Mr. Underwood had slandered Clark Braden, and had retracted his statement. "I satisfied Mr. Underwood," says the card, "that I did not make any such statement concerning him as was reported to him; and that what I did say was not designed to injure him; and could not do so if correctly reported. He retracted his charges against me, based on the report mentioned above, and it is hoped that the old-time friendship between us is restored." Mr. Underwood had made no charges against Braden that were not true, and retracted nothing. He still holds Braden's written statement. What kind of a man Clark Braden is may be inferred from the above.

We are permitted to give the following extract from a letter to a prominent Freethought lecturer and debater, by Mr. Clark Braden. It discloses his true motives and character. Rev. John Sweeny has for some years been a prominent preacher and debater in the same denomination with Braden. Wishing to be regarded himself as the champion debater, and to see his brother in Christ and in the ministry defeated and disgraced, so that he would be no longer a rival in the field of debate, he writes the advocate of Freethought a letter, hearing that he is about to debate with Sweeny, pointing out Sweeny's weakness, that the Infidel may strike effective blows, and make his victory complete. What sincere devotion to Christianity! what honesty and honor are here exhibited!

The gentleman who received this letter has had several debates with Braden, but has had no respect for him since he learned his real character, and has met him in debate only because Christians, in communities where he is unknown, have put him forward and endorsed him. Until now he has not permitted any portion of it to be published, but Braden's recent course, characterized by unqualified misrepresentation and falsehood, has induced him to show the Christian community what kind of a man Clark Braden is. We vouch for the correctness of the extracts here given, and if they are disputed the original letters can be produced by us.

Here is the extract from Braden's letter regarding Bro. Sweeney: "I enclose a tract which I have published, which is the basis of my insanity. Last fall I attended a convention of our preachers in Indianapolis. You remember Luther's visit to Rome. Though I was not as infatuated as he was, yet found that a view behind the scenes was not beneficial in keeping up the illusions of the stage. 'A chiel was amang them takin' notes and faith he prented 'em.' There was one of two things to be done. Answer the strictures or destroy their influence. The first they could not do. They seek to destroy their influence by scattering stealthily that I am insane. . . My offense has been that I have succeeded in a field of discussion where J. S. Sweeny failed, and have published a book that has been pronounced to be better than his efforts. He has been trying to injure me ever since last summer, and so have his lackeys. I criticized his conduct in Convention, and now he is doubly exasperated. I shall not notice the Dubuque chap* at all. His feathers won't pay for powder and shot. If you have not met J. S. Sweeney you will find him weak on history, historic evidences, science, the position that the Bible is an outgrowth of pre-existent paganism, and was built up like all other books of religion. He is sharp, pert, and declamatory, but superficial in education, not well read, and retails second-hand what he uses. If you will press these points on him, and frequently press on him that he does not answer them, you will defeat him. He will fail on what we debated in our first and second propositions also. Review what you have presented on his attention and you can defeat him.

*"Dubuque chap" is Rev. Wm. Sweeney, brother of Rev. John Sweeney.

"Should you feel like reminding him of our debates do so FOR ME."

The following is an extract from a letter written by Mr. Clark Braden to a Freethought lecturer. Braden is evidently "on the make."

"I learn that you are lecturing and expecting to lecture next winter. I write to you to suggest that we agree to unite our labors, by holding joint discussions instead of lecturing separately.

"I enclose a list of propositions. We could debate all or part of these as might be desired by our patrons. I do not think it advisable to debate for less than one week, and our time should count from our departure to our return home, or from the time we left our last place of work, until we closed the discussion. We should charge one hundred dollars per week each and require the hall to be furnished and kept up for us. Could we get places enough to make it pay? Let me hear from you or suggest some one who would make such an arrangement."—The Freethought Journal.

Answers to Inquirers.

FRAGE.—Is Winwood Reade still living? Ans.—No; he died in the summer of 1876.

READER.—Had Thomas Paine any children? Ans.—No; not that anybody knows of.

CHAS. O. BEAR.—Will you please give through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER a brief description of the principal instruments of torture used by Christians in by gone ages? Ans.—The Rack. This was a box like the bed of a wagon, with a windlass at each end, with levers, and ratchets to prevent slipping; over each windlass went chains; some were fastened to the ankles of the sufferer; others to his wrists. And then priests, clergymen, divines, saints, began turning these windlasses, and kept turning until the ankles, the knees, the hips, the shoulders, the elbows, the wrists of the victim were all dislocated, and the sufferer was wet with the sweat of agony. The Pulley. This was a strong cord by which the victim was bound and raised to quite a height. Heavy weights were fastened to the ankles. Then the sufferer was suddenly dropped a certain distance, the weights dislocating the bones of the extremities. The Scavenger's Daughter. This was like a pair of shears with handles, not only where they are now, but at the points as well, and just above the pivot that unites the blades, a circle of iron. In the upper handles the hands would be placed; in the lower the feet; and through the iron ring, the center, the head of the victim would be forced. In this condition, he would be thrown prone upon the earth, and the strain upon the muscles produced such agony that insanity would in pity end his pain. The Collar. This was a circle of iron, and on the inside were a hundred points almost as sharp as needles. This was fastened about the throat of the sufferer. Then he could not walk, nor sit down, nor stir without the neck being punctured by these points. In a little while the throat would begin to swell, and suffocation would end the agonies of that man. The Chaffing Dish. The victim was placed in a sort of stocks, which confined him so he could not move. The bottoms of his feet were basted with lard or oil. Then this dish, or heated brasier, was held under them until they were burnt and frequently consumed. Then there was an instrument which confined the head of the victim, letting drops of water fall in regular succession upon the same spot, until delirium and death ended his agony. The Virgin. This was a doll-like statue, covered with concealed spikes, which clasped the victim in its arms and tore him to pieces. These are but a few of the engines of torture invented by that Christian institution, the Inquisition.

"Inquisition, model most complete,
Of perfect wickedness, where deeds were done—
Deeds! let them ne'er be named—and sat and planned
Deliberately, and with most musing pains,
How to extremest thrill of agony
The flesh, and blood, and souls of men,
Her victims, might be wrought; and when she saw
New tortures of her laboring fancy born,
She leaped for joy, and made great haste to try
Their force, well pleased to hear a deeper groan."

B. McG.—Please inform me through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, what are the most elaborate works on the Roman Inquisition, either in French, Spanish, or Italian. Ans.—Laurent, Le Catholicisme et de l'Avenir; Raynouard, Monumens; Llorente, Inquisition; Schmidt, Monch-u. Nonnen-Orden, Die Inquisition; Lavallée, Hist. des Inquisition; Rule, Hist. Inquisition; Montanus, Inquisition; Inquisition Unmasked; Montes, Inquisition. Of the above, Llorente is undoubtedly the most elaborate and best adapted to general reading. Also see chapter on Dominic and the Inquisition in "Champions of the Church," just published at this office.

C. W.—Do angels have sex? If so, do they propagate? Ans.—These are hard questions. If angels are invisible beings who once lived in the body on this globe, it is probable they retain their sexuality. It is not likely any being ever changes its sex. We have no data relative to the propagating business, but it is our opinion that denizens of the spirit world are too diaphanous to be successful as propagators. Having never seen an angel, we trust our friend will excuse our limited knowledge.

L. L. B.—How many foreign Bibles are there printed in English, and of what nationality are they? Is there a work that gives a full history of the Jewish Bible? Ans.—There are some half a dozen foreign Bibles published in full or in part in English, though mostly only in part. The Mohammedan Bible, the Koran, is published in full. The Vedas, the Bible of the Hindoos, are only in small part published in English. The original makes many volumes. The same is true of the Puranas, and other sacred writings of the Hindoos. Also of the Tripitaka, the extensive Buddhist Bible, but a small part has ever appeared in English, and probably never will. It is very voluminous and much of it is utterly valueless to English readers. This remark truthfully applies to nearly all the ancient bibles. The Zend Avesta of the Persians has been slightly printed in English. It was the production of many centuries, and is voluminous. The Chinese had three voluminous sacred writings, but a small part of which will probably be rendered in English. Of the Egyptian sacred writings but a small part has been preserved. Some extracts from the Pymander have been preserved. We know of no volume devoted to a special history of the Jewish Bible. There are several which treat upon it more or less.

E. R. E.—Will you please tell me the whereabouts and occupation of Mrs. Victoria Woodhull? Ans.—She is residing in the city of London, but we cannot give her address. Her family are also with her, and it is not expected she will return to this country. Her occupation is unknown to us. She has lectured over there, but we think not lately.

F. B.—Is the north pole in motion? If so, towards what point does it move? Does it move in a straight line or in a large circle? Ans.—As the poles are a part of the earth, they of course go with it in its yearly course round the sun. Its orbit is in the form of an eliptic. In the diurnal motion of the earth the poles may be said to be stationary, as are the journals of a large wheel when in motion. All the heavenly bodies move in circles or eliptics—no straight lines.

N. S.—What were the religious views of Gerrit Smith? Ans.—He was considered an Infidel, or a very advanced Unitarian. He had little confidence in any theological dogmas.

SAME—Is James Parton an Infidel? Ans.—He believes as those do who are called Infidels, though he is not partial to the term. He is a patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

L. L. B.—Where will I get the fullest and most reliable accounts of persecutions perpetrated by the Christians? Ans.—"The Champions of the Church" will give you more information upon this subject than any other single volume.

IBID.—I want a book that points out the road to virtue and happiness, and good moral lectures. Ans.—We would recommend D'Holbach's "System of Nature," Denton's lectures and pamphlets, "The Liberal Guide," Prof. Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe," his "Conflict between Religion and Science," and numerous other works.

E. C. J.—I was recently debating with a Catholic upon the subject of who filled the State prisons. He insisted it was the Spiritualists and Freethinkers. Please give your views upon the subject. Ans.—There may occasionally be a Spiritualist or a Freethinker found in State prison; it is not impossible for them to commit a crime, but it is the fewest number of them that fill our prisons. It has been found that ninety-five per cent of the inmates of our State prisons are believers in the Christian religion. Preachers, in proportion to their numbers, are fully represented.

H. M. E.—What was the forbidden fruit? Ans.—It would be about as easy to tell who was the manufacturer of Aladdin's wonderful lamp. The Bible represents it as the product of a tree. The Shakers insist that it was the sexual embrace. Our opinion is that the forbidden fruit story is a fable, and that nothing of the kind ever had an existence.

IBID—Was not our Bible, as used by Protestants and sanctioned by them, all and every book of it collected, compiled, composed and written originally after the Babylonian captivity? Ans.—There are very strong grounds for deciding that this is true, with perhaps the exception of the book of Job, which is admitted to be a Gentile production, and older than any other book in the Bible. It was probably borrowed from the Chaldeans. It mentions no persons or places named in any other parts of the Bible. There is nothing in it to indicate that it was of Hebrew origin. It was more probably a Chaldean poem or drama. There is nothing to prove that any other book in the Old Testament was written more than six or seven hundred years before the Christian era.

S. S.—What is the estimated number of Liberals, or Infidels, in the United States? Ans.—No census has been taken. Including Spiritualists, they are estimated to number 2,000,000. Some make the estimate much higher. It is believed they can command half a million votes.

S.—What per cent of the population of the world are Christians? Ans.—About ten per cent.

S. S.—About how many preachers are employed by the different denominations in the United States? Ans.—We have not the data by us by which to answer this inquiry properly. The clergymen of the United States are estimated at from 65,000 to 70,000. The Methodists are the most numerous. We will not venture to say more. In the census taken ten years ago the Methodists are put down at 1,298,938 members, with 19,170 preachers, local and traveling; Baptists, 1,109,926 members (Regular), and 61,244 (Freewill); Presbyterians, Old School, 258,903 members, and 2,381 ministers; New School, 175,560 members, and 1,848 ministers; Congregationalists, 291,042 members, and 3,090 ministers. Small denominations in proportion.

H. M. E.—Is Abraham, Moses, Melchisedech, David, Isaiah, or Daniel known or recognized in profane history? Ans.—Not one of them.

E.—Was Melchisedech a real individual man? Ans.—There is so little data respecting him that it is hard to answer definitely; but there is little doubt but that he was wholly a mythical or fabulous character.

H. A. T.—Is there any historical evidence that St. Paul had an existence outside of the Church records? Ans.—The Ebionites or Nazarenes, who were the first Christians, regarded Paul as an imposter, and rejected all his epistles. There was undoubtedly such a person; but from all that can be gleaned from the meagre accounts concerning him it is claimed that he was originally a pagan, that he came to Jerusalem where he lived some time; and that having a mind to marry the daughter of the high priest, he caused himself to be circumcised; but that not being able to obtain her, he quarreled with the Jews, and wrote against circumcision, and against the observance of the Sabbath, and against all legal ordinances.

J. C. B.—When did the Christian Era become recognized? Ans.—This epoch was introduced in Italy in the sixth century by Dionysius the Little, a Roman abbot, and began to be used in Gaul in the eighth century, though it was not generally followed in that country till a century later. From extant charters it is known to have been in use in England before the close of the eighth century. There are various opinions among chronologists with regard to the year in which this era commenced. It is commonly supposed to begin with the year of the birth of Christ, which the majority of authorities fix in the fourth year of the 194th Olympiad, the 853d from the foundation of Rome, and the 4,714th of the Julian period.

IT appears from the official report that during the past year the people of this State have paid, in whole or in part, for the keeping of 43,095 persons in the various public charitable institutions. Of these, 2,174 were insane, 356 blind, 922 deaf and dumb, 230 idiots, 61 inebriates. The House of Refuge had 1,347 inmates; the County Poor Houses, 6,841; the city Almshouses, 9,203; the Orphan Asylums and Reformatories, 15,990; the Homes for the Aged, 3,907; the hospitals, 2,064. In addition, out-door relief was given to a great number, the Overseers of the Poor alone relieving 114,893 persons, while the dispensaries gave medical relief to 254,497. The statistics show an increase of insanity, which is doubtless to be referred in part to the hard times.

DISTINGUISHED STATESMEN TO BE AT THE WATKINS CONVENTION.—We are to be well represented at the Watkins Convention by distinguished statesmen and politicians. In addition to Col. Ingersoll and Hon. Frederick Douglass, the ablest orators of the Republican party, we are to have Hon. George W. Julian of Indiana, the speaker who was the most eloquent of the Democratic orators in the last Presidential campaign. James Parton, the historian, has also written Mr. Green that he will be present and will read a paper entitled "The Coming Man's Religion." It is a good omen for Freethought when such men will take the platform in its behalf.

THE Herald of the 23d has a statement that some $175,000 worth of fancy French and German goods, forbidden by the Comstock laws of March 3, 1873, have been surreptitiously imported and smuggled into this city, and have been seized and condemned to be destroyed and have been resold to druggists and others and are daily retailed in our market. It says an investigation will be instituted, when perhaps it will be ascertained whether it is the U. S. officials or St. Anthony himself that is the culpable party. One thing the Herald says is the case. These contraband goods are somewhat extensively sold by the druggists of the city and no arrests have been made.

Synopsis of all Religious Beliefs.—Concluded.

BY MRS. E. L. SAXON.

The festival in gratitude for ripened wheat was called "Pentecost," meaning fiftieth—fifty days after barley harvest. They welcomed the new moon with festivals. A severe national feast was called "the great day of expiation, nine days before which they prepared themselves with great diligence by almsgiving and works of piety. A goat was selected, a scarlet cloth tied to it, and, with formal ceremonies, the sins of the people were laid upon its head, and it was hurried with all speed to a wilderness ten miles from Jerusalem and thrown from a precipice. According to the Talmud, the scarlet cloth turned white when the priest laid the people's sins upon the goat. Thus originated the saying "that sins like scarlet turn white as wool."

The Jews actually believed that God dwelt in their tabernacle and told Moses just what to do. They always believed they were truly his chosen people, apart from and above all others, just as Christians now believe. To enter into minute notice of prophecies and prophets would require too long a time; but the Bible is filled with spirit manifestations of every character, both good and bad, and especially is it noticeable in the book of Daniel how like they are to modern trance! Take spirituality from the Bible and it falls a worthless mass of confused and contradictory history. Every book, from Genesis to Hosea, bears evidence within itself of having been written or compiled after the captivity in Babylon; and in many instances the writer seems to have two accounts before him, and conforms the two together.

Job is evidently of Persian origin throughout. The Psalms of David are a miscellaneous collection of religious odes or poems written on various occasions of victory, thanksgiving, or humiliation. That it was compiled from several smaller collections is proved by repetition of almost entire psalms, and by the fact that those attributed to the same author are scattered in different places, and doxologies indiscriminately interposed.

The book we call the Songs of Solomon is the only vestige left of their amatory poetry. So passionate is its language, and so little connected with a religious sense, that the question has often been propounded as to why it was placed among the sacred writings. The mention in the list of Esau's sons in Genesis of there being "rulers over the land before any kings were in Israel," shows that it was placed there after such was the case, which was over eight hundred years after.

Josiah, the pious young king, seemed to worship images in ignorance, for when Hilkiah, one of the ancestors of Ezra, sent him the Law, or a book that he had found in the temple, by Hapkin, the scribe, he seemed frightened, and rent his clothes, and ordered the destruction of all images. From henceforth we hear no more of image-worship among them.

The historical books have much to prove that they were compiled from fragments. The two first chapters of Genesis are evidently two different accounts of the same story, and the three first verses of the second chapter belong to the first account.

Saul seems first to have known and loved David by his having the power to charm his evil spirit from him by his music; but in a few chapters, where David presents himself to challenge Goliah, he is ignorant of him, and asks who he is; neither do his attendants know. De Wett truly says: "These things can only be explained on the supposition that the author drew from various, often imperfect, and sometimes conflicting, sources."

In Samuel we are told God moved David to number Israel; in Chronicles, that the Devil moved him to do it. Chronicles is far more favorable to David and the priesthood, and recounts scarcely any of his crimes, such as taking Uriah's wife, the hanging of Saul's sons, the ravishing of Tamar by Amnon, or the rebellion of Absalom. No mention is made of Solomon's idolatry or his concubines.

It is not supposed that the prophecies and the Hagiographa, which meant all the writings save the Pentateuch, which meant "five books," which scholars say correspond with the language of sacred historical books, were written a thousand years later. Such a thing was never known as a language remaining unchanged for a thousand years. There now exists among Hindoo writings a language dead to all men. To linger here, however, is using too much time, as these books are open to all, not only to read, but to study with the light of reason, and not in blind obedience to inherited faith and tradition. These books were united and comprised in the canon of sacred Scripture either during the time of Ezra or near it, and many things were added after his time; for, in Nehemiah, mention is made of Darius Codomanus, who was king of Persia a hundred years after Ezra's time; and the "days of Joddua" are spoken of as days past, though Joddua outlived Alexander the Great two years. Somebody must have added to Nehemiah's book, as this was two hundred years after his time.

It is not known with certainty when the canon closed, that is, when it was decided to be unlawful to add any more books. The word canon signifies "a rule or standard." The Jews in their traditions claim that it was completed by Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue, and high priest of the Jews two hundred years before Christ. De Wett says: "One thing is certain, the collection came gradually into existence, and acquired a sort of sanction by the force of custom and public use." Until after the Christian era, the sacred books of Hebrews were mentioned under the general name of "the Scriptures," meaning "the writings," or "O Bibles," a Greek word signifying "the book." In most ancient times the inner bark of a tree called Bibles, was used to write on; it is pronounced Bible in the English tongue. Among the rich relics of Grecian literature, we have no religious odes that can equal the solemn beauty of the Hebrew, and instead of reading them as some are disposed to do, and rejecting them in contempt, let us study their beauty, guided by the lamp of reason which sheds its rays over all religions impartially, and we shall find in each something to admire. Still with Herder, we must say, "It is human, meant for humans to read, and to understand."

Until after the time of Alexander the Great, it seems likely the knowledge of the Hebrew Scriptures was confined to the Jews. Oriental scholars have searched in India to discover traces of their being known there, but none have been discovered. No allusion is made to them by contemporary historians. About three hundred years before Christ, the numerous Jews in Egypt, having become accustomed to the Grecian tongue, felt the inconvenience of having their sacred law in a language which few of them understood; for as to the old Hebrew in which their sacred books were written, it was then a rare thing among them to find a man who could read it. At last the inconvenience became so great it was necessary to translate the law into Greek. Much as the Jews disliked mingling with other nations, the free spirit of inquiry which formed an atmosphere around them filled their young men also, and they frequented Alexandrian schools and acquired such taste for philosophy that some of their zealous priests thought it a matter of necessity to pronounce a solemn anathema upon any father who allowed his children to acquire such unhallowed learning. In pursuit of wealth the Hellenistic or Grecian Jews were scattered throughout the Roman provinces, where the Greek language was almost the universal mode of communication. In this manner new forms and habits of thought arose, which the learned find it difficult to trace to its source. It is not at all unlikely that in their numerous flights into Egypt, after wars and depredations, they became acquainted with associations of hermits resembling those of Hindostan. Josephus says he lived three years with a hermit in the desert, who used the barks of trees for clothing. Exiled Jews might thus have adopted Hindoo or Egyptian customs, while adhering devoutly to the laws of Moses. Josephus gives account of various sects, among them none more observable than the pious Essenes (from a Chaldean word meaning physician). These were living in communities, studying the sacred Scriptures, expecting the Messiah's coming. They refused to take an oath, and claimed the gift of prophecy and communion with angels. Josephus was himself a Pharisee, but he calls the Essenes a "divinely inspired sect." Their doctrine of morality might be comprised under two heads "Reverence to God," and "Love to man." The "Cabala" from a Hebrew word, meaning "tradition," mixed up many foreign theories with Jewish belief. From resemblance to Persian theories, the surmise arises that they were brought thence during the Babylonian exile, and all novelties in belief had to be introduced as oral traditions from Moses. There is positive trace of them about a hundred years before Christ, when a learned Jewish rabbi, who had been banished for a political offense, was recalled to Palestine. He brought a number of disciples, who introduced the science of the Cabala. The marvelous stories told concerning these traditions traced their loss and recovery again and again from Adam to Ezra. They had an ancient volume called "Zohar, the book of light," which is said to contain the statement, "There are three Gods united in one, and they are three, they form one by the most indissoluble union." Hellenistic Jews mixed the laws of Plato with the Mosaic teachings, even as those of Zoroaster, the Persian law-givers had been. Aristibulus, a learned Jew of Alexandria, was so desirous of proving his people a learned instead of a barbarous nation that he drew from all others, and in this way, like Philo the learned Jew, drew the many theories of various nations into their own beliefs and legends, instituting thus the disputes concerning "The Logos, or word," the first begotten of God, or Son of God.

The story told by Josephus regarding the sending for Jews to translate the law, to be kept in Alexandria, is now believed a romance, invented by some Jewish writer to embellish their history. Plutarch says, Demetrius advised king Ptolemy to place the laws and writings of all nations in his library. If he acted on his suggestion a natural result would be an application to the Jewish Sanhedrim for their laws, or a copy. The Talmud says the translation was done by five men, which is far more probable than "six from each of the twelve tribes," when only two tribes were known to be in existence. The Pentateuch as we have already stated, was first translated, the others gradually added at various times, and by various hands. Between the Samaritan, Hebrew, and Greek copies are various discrepancies, the most important in regard to chronology. There are centuries of difference in their account of the flood, and the birth of Abraham. Jews of Palestine regarded the translation with strong disapprobation, and the Talmud declares a "fast was appointed, and darkness came upon the world for three days."

Their customs and habits prevented the Jews from mingling with or attracting other nations, and the Greeks and Romans regarded them with aversion and contempt. Romans were tolerant of their religious customs, as they were of all nations under their control. When they represented their abuses to the Emperor Augustus, he forbade his subjects to interfere with their religious privileges, and gave orders that they should enjoy their own laws, and send offerings to Jerusalem; and even gave orders that they should not be compelled to appear in courts, or attend to public duties after their Sabbath preparations began. But their firm belief in a coming Messiah rendered them a turbulent element under a foreign yoke. Prophets (or they who fancied themselves such) were continually drawing the people together and promising the speedy coming of the Messiah. Disappointed again and again, they believed it was for their sins, and clung closer than ever, in their enduring faith, to the law of Moses.

There were frequent collisions between them and the Romans. The restless hopes of the people broke out in frequent insurrections. There also arose dissensions in the various sects among themselves, and bands of robbers invested Jerusalem; finally a general rebellion against Rome ended in the total destruction of the Jewish State seventy years after Christ. Such changes as had for years before this assailed the nation were extremely unfavorable to the preservation of their sacred writings; their very existence depended on private synagogues. In the time of Christ, Armean Chaldee was universally spoken, and only the learned understood Hebrew. After Ezra's time it was customary to read the Scripture in Hebrew, and expound a portion of it at a time to the people.

After their final dispersion, the Jews appointed learned men to prepare a revised and corrected copy to serve as a standard. This was a work of sorrowful labor. In this work they were guided partly by the authority of tradition and partly by their own judgment. With reverential care they divided the book into verses and numbered them; they marked the words they believed to be changed, the letters they deemed superfluous, and the different signification of the same word. This monument of human patience was called "the Masora."

Rabi Judah, the Holy, one hundred and fifty years before our era, prepared the first "Talmud." Likewise the Mishina, or Second Law. He was forty years in compiling the works, and they contain all the laws, institutions, and rules of life which a Jew feels bound to observe in addition to those contained in the law of Moses. A century later a great deal more was added, called Genara, meaning completion; another, five hundred years after our era, containing new commentaries, was called "the Babylon Talmud." In point of fact, the traditionary law has for many centuries been placed above the law of Moses. There was among the Babylonian Jews a paraphrase of sacred Scripture called "Targums," meaning "most excellent version." To this day their reverence for the law of Moses is unbounded. They keep a copy on clean parchment, beautifully written in Hebrew, in every synagogue.

During the prevalence of the sects in Judea and Jerusalem, John appeared among the people urging them to repentance. Evidently he had been a hermit of some order, and was called "baptist" on account of his baptizing the people "for remission of sins." From time immemorial water was considered typical of purification from the sins of the soul. John's peculiarity was that he required the Jews, as well as Gentiles, to be baptized in preparation for the kingdom. Among many nations, Persian, Hindoo, and Chaldean, passing through fire was also considered the highest type of purification, and sometimes devotees burned themselves as the readiest means of ascending to heaven. Understanding all these peculiar customs throws light upon such passages in Scripture as, "I indeed baptize you with water, but he who cometh after me shall baptize you with fire and with the Holy Ghost." Shaz caused his own son to pass through fire, but he could not have been harmed, because he afterward succeeded his father on the throne. While John was still preaching, there arose the leader, whose name is still held in the Christian heart as the immaculate, the real son of God; and, in the hearts of those who yield him no divine honors, his pure character and lovely precepts place him ahead of any character the world has ever produced as a model of purity and worthy all imitation. It is not known with certainty when the great event happened (the birth of Christ), but is supposed to have occurred in the twelfth year of Augustus Cæsar. Strange, that an event calculated to stir the civilized world for nearly two thousand years should be buried in darkness, when we can count with greater certainty the births of pagan heroes born long before. The social condition of his parents is indicated by their offering "turtle-doves and young pigeons." From the age of twelve until thirty years no accounnt is given in the gospels concerning him, and to a close observer it is certainly significant that, notwithstanding John foretold his coming and baptized him, and saw the dove alighting upon him, he still was filled with doubts; for, when hearing he had restored a dead man to life, he sends two of his own disciples to ask of Jesus, "Art thou indeed the Christ, or shall we look for another?" Christ replied by bidding them tell what works they saw him do. John had repeatedly declared that he was not Elias, yet Christ says in one place that he was the Elias that was to come; in two others that Elias had already come, and his disciples knew he meant John the Baptist. The angel, announcing his birth, had also said he would "go forth in the spirit and power of Elias." Modern Spiritualists, taking all these things in question, have believed that Elias, or Elisha, had chosen John as his medium. He, too, was possessed of many of the peculiar, hermit-like habits of the old prophet.

What were Christ's conditions and teaching, spiritually, during the eighteen years of his life, of which no account is given, or else it was suppressed, is solely a matter of conjecture. Evidently he, like all Jewish children, understood the law and prophecies, for he accuses the rabbis of making it of no effect by their traditions. He wrote on the sand once; no mention is made of his writing otherwise. He constantly rebukes the Pharisees and Sadducees, but no mention is ever made of the Essenes. Many have conjectured, from the strong points of resemblance between his teaching and theirs, that he knew and favored that sect—had perhaps lived among them, for they took boys to instruct; there is, however, no historical proof to sustain this opinion.

The statements conflict in regard to Christ in some respects; he seeks only the lost sheep of the house of Israel; and in another his parting injunction is far different from his teachings in parables, where he says he seeks to veil his meaning from the Gentiles. At the last he says, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Evidently the meaning of the gentle Nazarene has not beeu kept to the letter.

PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY. — "HE DESCENDED INTO HELL."

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, held its annual session in the Third Avenue Presbyterian church in Pittsburg, Pa., last May. In the same building, nine years ago, occurred the reunion of the Old and New School churches of the Presbyterian denomination, which was then a cause of great rejoicing and has been a boast ever since. On this occasion, last May, a handsome memorial tablet was erected to commemorate that event. A part of the inscription on the central slab is as follows: "In this church, after a separation of thirty-two years, the Old School and New School churches are happily reunited." This body is now one of the largest and most influential religious organizations in the world. It represents a church membership, in round numbers, of about five hundred and fifty thousand scattered in every State and Territory in the Union, and having missionaries all over the land. These churches represent about five thousand three hundred ministers, according to their own reports.

In view of these facts, we might well inquire, "What do they teach, and what is their influence?" We know that Presbyterianism is not only rank orthodoxy but Calvinism of the bluest kind; therefore, with this array of numbers, wealth, and power against us, we may consistently pause a moment to scan the assembly meeting on this momentous occasion, and note their deliberations, which we propose to do. It is necessary that we know something of the strength of the enemy with whom we have to cope, his tactics, manner of warfare, and motives, or expectations of booty. We all know the ostensible object is to win souls to Jesus, but alas! alas! when there what better are they than before? But we will not moralize, but review some of their deliberations, briefly as possible, in point of doctrine. We must pass over many important subjects acted upon in that week's session and confine ourselves to those most significant and marvelous. It appears that this Church, in connection with others, does not know what to do with its old-fashioned hell as taught in the Bible, therefore the following adopted by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, May 6, 1878, was presented to the General Assembly:

WHEREAS, The clause in the so-called Apostles' Creed, which asserts that Christ "descended into hell" is offensive as an unscriptural interpretation, and the retention of it on the one hand conveys an erroneous idea to those who recite and read it, and on the other hand presents the general use of the creed itself, which is otherwise so admirable and venerable; therefore

Resolved, That the General Assembly be overtured to take the requisite constitutional step to return to the earlier and Scriptural form of the creed, as found in the Greek language.

The committee recommended the following:

That, in view of . . . no action be taken. Rev. Dr. Patterson, of Philadelphia, spoke in favor of the proposed alteration of the creed and against the report. He said the time was when the Apostles' Creed was looked after very little in the Church, but now it is circulated in the Sabbath-schools, and children are being taught to recite it. Those who want to use the creed cannot get a copy except with the objectionable clause. Those who take it, take what they disavow. For these reasons the Assembly has asked to make it conform to the true reading of the original. The Church does not believe that the soul of Jesus went to that place prepared for the souls of those who die impenitent—to hell. It was not held that the words meant that, but such was the popular interpretation of the phrase, and hence it was erroneous and misleading.

The matter was postponed and resumed the following day, the objectionable clause being, "He descended into hell."

Dr. Allison made a long speech, during which he said that the expression, as used in the Creed, is entirely Scriptural according to King James' translation of the Bible, as will be seen by reference to Acts ii, 27–31. There is no sense in attempting to remove it as an excrescence or untruth from our standards, while it remains in at least three places in the Bible. Moreover, however illogical it may be, there is a class of minds, and not a small one either, that would look upon the removal of this phrase from the creed as a weakening of the Presbyterian Church on the subject of future punishment. Of this the Assembly may rest assured: To grant this overture will do no good. It will separate us from all Christendom in the matter of an organized expression of belief, which we now all hold in common, and it will give occasion for the enemies of orthodoxy to take encouragement.

After another adjournment and another discussion, a motion to indefinitely postpone was carried by a vote of two hundred yeas to one hundred and sixty nays. This carried with it the overture and recommendation of the committee.

What is the signification of this to us? First. It shows a difference of opinion among the reunited Presbyterians, as to the true meaning and interpretation of their infallible word of God and the finality of the creed.

Second. It proves some of them are not satisfied with their Bible as it now reads, and are ashamed to have their children believe that the good Jesus, who is their Savior, "descended into hell."

Third. That they comprehend that it is no use to expunge objectionable doctrine from their creed while it is taught in their Bible.

Fourth. That they fear a weakening of the powerful Presbyterian Church and a disfellowship of "all Christendom" if they do aught which seems to savor of a doubt as to future punishment.

Fifth. They show us they are willing to be illogical, and declare it rather than seem to loose their hold on hell, and consequently their brother and sister churches.

Sixth. Yet a portion of them, at least, evince a desire to improve their creed, be that motive what it may, which reveals a tendency to progress even among Presbyterians who believe in election.

And Seventh. They are afraid of us. "It will give occasion for the enemies of orthodoxy to take encouragement." Little us, only think! Orthodoxy, powerful Calvinistic, Presbyterian orthodoxy — old school and new school united—fearful of Liberalism, or Infidelity as orthodoxy terms it. Instead of the what is right and what wrong, what truth and what error, see the weak, ignoble motives there adduced.

Liberals, look these proceedings square in the face, and let your enemies teach you what they are doing. Watch their movements. Read their anniversary reports. Examine their various points of controversy. Can you not perceive how surely our Freethought is modifying their creeds?

Though those resolutions were not passed, yet here is evidence of thought, agitation, and reform, dissatisfaction with their loosely expressed doctrines founded on some slip-shod Bible expression, which cannot be changed or expunged without reflecting on the authority of the latter, their plenarily inspired revelation. This sorely puzzles them; they know not which horn of the dilemma to take, and are at their wit's ends, as you perceive. Let us not falter, but persevere and never doubt but that sooner or later we shall compel this stronghold of hell-fire, Presbyterianism, not only to give up these "objectionable phrases," but to renounce allegiance to the stupid record which they assert teaches original sin, total depravity, predestination, the divinity of Christ, the trinity, vicarious atonement, infant damnation, endless punishment, and all their abominable accompaniments that have cursed the world under the reign of the "Prince of peace," viz.: bloody Christian wars, persecuting martyrdom, Jesuitical torture and death in the past, ostracism, libel, injustice, falsehood, oppressive sectarian laws, and a denunciation of all the rights of free religious liberty and freedom of conscience in the present to those who have progressed beyond the myths of their barbaric heathen traditions, and dared to evolute for themselves.

Money.

MR. EDITOR: I see that the money question is yet puzzling your correspondents. The world will always want more money as long as no one can bring it into existence but the gold and silver digger or the bondholders. If a farmer wants money, he must either borrow at a big per cent or sell something to get it. Again, the purchasing power of the dollar will always vary according to the amount in circulation as long as we let property measure the value of a dollar. When property is the money itself, prices will always be governed by the quantity of that property in existence. Paper money, with the "fiat" dollar, becomes of the nature of gold and silver money. The more you issue, the higher goes the prices. If gold and silver keep on par with it, they will also become a debased money in the same proportion. Now, to my mind, the only money in the world that quantity in circulation (at least to the amount required by the business of the country) will not affect prices, is paper money, with the dollar represented by so much labor. That will demonetize gold and silver, leaving the people no other alternative but to take the paper money.

Labor regulates the exchange value of all commodities Why not of the dollar, too?

Will some of the "soft" money men (or hard money ones either) tell how they would know the value of their "fiat" dollar if it was not for the known value of the gold and silver dollar? Would it not be a ship at sea without pilot, chart, or compass?

Woman's Rights.

To be free, we must be equal. To be happy, we must love. Without equality and love, we are tyrants and brutes. Search the pages of history, both ancient and modern, and you will find that woman has always been subjected to man's tyranny and brutality. She has been looked upon as an inferior being, and as a part of man's property, to be disposed of to suit his whims. She has been bought and sold; bartered and given away; and, as late as the year 1620, ninety young women, "pure and uncorrupted," were sent over from England to the colonies in Virginia and exchanged for tobacco. The amount received for each woman varied from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty pounds of this product, equivalent in money value to from ninety to one hundred and twelve dollars. Nevertheless, man has changed since then; in those days he bartered woman for tobacco and chewed it, but now he chews both.

Woman has been stigmatized and charged with being the cause of all the misery this world contains. The Christian religion teaches us that. It claims that if Eve had not eaten the forbidden fruit we would all have been in Paradise, wherever that may be. Oh! how much better it would have been for mankind had God created her without a desire for fruit! and for God's error her whole race have had to suffer from that day to this. If he should ever attempt to make another, I hope he will have better success.

The Marquis of Mirabeau said: "A nation not represented is like a man deprived of speech; his arms only are left him to make known his wants." This is the condition in which woman is placed. She is taxed, but not represented; she is ruled, but by other's rules; and to be subjected to such is slavery. Our forefathers were taxed, but not represented, to which they objected and gained a representation. Why should not woman do the same? She is as capable of governing herself as man is; and it is evident that she cannot make our government any worse than it is at present, for it is corrupt and rotten, and at last it is sinking.

Woman has been a menial slave to man for ages in the past; and as far back as we have any knowledge of, she has served him faithfully; always bearing with him his burdens, weeping when he wept; smiling when he smiled; and glorifying when he glorified; but still he has treated her with indifference. He has made her do what he considered would be lowering or disgracing him to do. He has kept from her the advantages which lead to progression, and to-day still refuses to grant her the right to vote, which would emancipate her and render her position equal to his.

To improve woman would be to better the whole human race. A child inherits the mother's qualities, and the more intelligent, refined, and chaste the mother, the greater the effect upon the child; and in rearing the child she instills into it her refinement, modesty, and love, which cause it to develop into man or womanhood, carrying marks that represent the progression of human kind.

Woman's rights are like virtue's paths; man shuns them; To give woman her rights would be to recognize her as his equal. To allow her all the advantages would be giving her an opportunity to convince him of the abilities she possesses. Give her free access to everything, and see if she will not prove herself his equal, if not superior. Let us allow her to stand by our side at the ballot-box. Let us throw open all the doors of arts and professions to her, and may she stroll far into the field of science.

Let us remember that nature has endowed her with all the faculties we possess, and a great many that are much finer. She has a deep affection, which is too often abused by man. Woman's true love is priceless; when once placed upon you; gold cannot withdraw it. To us she is everything, for whole mankind have been nursed into maturity by her; and now let us endeavor to better her condition by giving freedom for slavery, love for indifference, and happiness for sorrow. Sorrow is like a mist; it will surely pass away, and then sunshine appears; but many die before it appears.

Seeking Light.

MADISON, WIS., June 16, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Seeing your very good nature in throwing light in the paths of those who are in a "labyrinth of doubts," I beg you will not throw this letter into the waste-basket, but that you will have the patience to hear me out, and the good will to give me a little of the information I am in search of.

I take, by the Materialistic view, it is held that matter and force have always existed. On demure consideration of this view, which carries with it that there is no God, a formidable obstacle presents itself to my mind. This may be the fruit of ignorance of the scientific principles by which the universe is known to be governed. If so, I beg pardon for this intrusion. In all matter with which we are acquainted there is an inherent force or quality called gravitation. This fact leads us to theoretically infer that the whole universe is also under this mysterious law. This force always tends to draw two particles of matter together. Now, why is it that, in the infinity of the past, all the matter in existence has not formed into one compact mass? It can hardly be that all the matter of the universe is now as close as is possible. In all probability, attraction of gravitation will overcome the forces of light, heat, etc. If the ether theory is correct, am I not right in saying that there must be another force not now known, or else a supreme will?

There is another question that has puzzled me a good deal. It is the resurrection of Christ. It appears that there were twelve witnesses of this occurrence. In their subsequent writings there seems to be no evidence of collusion. They were all uneducated, but practical men, and so were not given to any high-flown, imaginative feelings. Surely we cannot doubt but that something took place on this occasion, and if so, why not take the evidence pretty much as we find it? If we do not we will have to ascribe the event to legerdemain, and as an illustration that places Heller's second sight and his basket trick in a wilderness of gloom, i. e., "in the shade."

In this part of the world there is not a very great Liberal sentiment, but thanks to such workers as you, there is no doubt but that in the near future the glorious sun of truth will be coming up on the horizon of superstition. There are, of course, some strong arguments hung up before the ones who are young in matters relating to religion, but since I have been studying the subject up from your paper and elsewhere, I find myself ready to catch some of the religionists in their own nets, and this when just in search of new truths instead of the old in the guarded fallacies of the age. Trusting you will keep on in your good work for truth, I remain yours truly, F. L. MOFFETT.

REPLY.—Our correspondent need make no apology for propounding interrogatories to us. So far as we are able to throw light upon the subjects he introduces, it will be done with great pleasure. Our patience will not be easily exhausted.

Our friend is correct in thinking that the Materialistic belief is, that matter and force ever existed. It certainly is easier to so believe than that they were ever produced or created from nothing.

There seems to be many imponderable forces that permeate matter, and among them is Newton's law of gravitation. Whether Newton was strictly correct in his estimate of this force, it doubtless belongs and inheres to all matter in existence. Bodies attract each other, and were there no counteracting force or forces, the numerous suns and worlds would doubtless come together in one vast mass. But the centrepetal, the centrifugal, and other forces not fully understood, keep the suns and worlds at a respectful distance and prevent their rushing together. The force that keeps them apart is just as natural as the one that attracts them together. One is no more attributable to a God than the other. All belong to the universe. It has been the custom of ignorant men to attribute to an unknown, invisible, personal God all the subtle and intricate forces and operations of the universe which they could not fully understand. This error arises from ignorance. It is not likely that attraction of gravitation is the strongest force in the universe or will ever overcome all other forces. The "supreme will" is no more apparent in one part of the universe than in all parts. To our comprehension, it is not apparent in any part. The universe is abundantly able to accomplish all that is done and has no necessity for an overseer, a superintendent, a creator, or a "supreme will." Every thing is just as it is, because, under the circumstances, it cannot be any other way.

As to the resurrection of Jesus, it is in our opinion an improbable, confused, and contradictory legend, that a reasoning man can hardly give credence to. The whole story of Jesus is mythical and sadly needs confirmation. The tale about a dead body returning to life is a contradiction of the entire experience of mankind. There have been many cases of suspended animation, but never one where a body absolutely dead was made to live again. The thing is utterly unnatural and impossible. Such events are worked into legends and nursery tales, but that does not make them true.

Mr. Moffett says there were twelve witnesses of the resrrection of Jesus. That is not quite clear; no one witnessed the resurrection. If that body which had been deposited in the sepulchre of Joseph of Arimetha did come to life again, no person witnessed it. But did Jesus after his resurrection show himself to twelve persons, or did twelve persons see him on the morning of his resurrection? This is not quite clear either. The number of times he appeared and to whom seem to be a matter of dispute. According to Mark he appeared three times. 1. To Mary Magdalen; 2. To two disciples; 3. To the disciples at meat. According to Matthew two times: 1. To the women; 2. To the eleven in Galilee. According to Luke three times: 1. To Cleopas and his companion; 2. To Peter; 3. To the eleven and others. John gives four appearances: 1. To Mary Magdalen; 2. To the twelve; 3. To the disciples; 4. To several disciples at Tiberias lake. Paul extends the appearances to six times: 1. To Peter; 2. To the twelve; 3. To more than five hundred; 4. To Janus; 5. To all the apostles; 6. To Paul.

These appearances are thus very differently stated, and show at least a very undivine kind of harmony of statement. All these appearances were more like the appearance of a spirit than of a crude, material body. It passed through the walls of a house when the doors were closed, it appeared suddenly and as suddenly vanished as spirits are supposed to do. There is nothing in the accounts to cause a person to believe that the physical body of Jesus was reanimated and that it was it that which appeared to his disciples. There are so many differences and incongruities in the statements as to utterly destroy confidence in the truthfulness of the story. The narrators differ as to the number of women who visited the sepulchre. John mentions one; Matthew names two; Mark says three; while Luke says there were more than three. They differ also as to the number of persons in white seen at the sepulchre. Mark mentions one, "a young man;" Matthew, one, an angel. Luke says there were two men; John, two angels. They differ, too, as to what was said by the person or persons in white, as well as to where Jesus went after his resurrection. There is a marked disagreement as to the position of the man or men, angel or angels, who were found in the sepulchre. No two of the narrators tell the story alike. They differ not only as to where Jesus made his appearance, but as to the directions Jesus gave as to where his disciples should go after his resurrection. According to Matthew, he sent word to them to go into Galilee and they should see him. Mark gives a similar account, but according to Luke they were to remain where they were—"Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye are endued with power from on high." John has nothing to say upon the subject. It perhaps is not a very essential matter which way it was, but it would seem that truthful writers ought to be able to state it alike. If witnesses in a murder trial could not agree better, they would hardly be able to secure a conviction.

Further contradictions are found in the statements as to the time when the women prepared the spices for embalming the body. Mark says it was when the "Sabbath was past;" Luke says it was before the Sabbath and they rested on the Sabbath; John has it that Nicodemus did the embalming with a hundred pound weight of myrrh and aloes, mixed. Here is a very marked discrepancy.

It seems very singular that if Jesus, as is narrated on several occasions, explained to his disciples that he had to be arrested, tried and crucified, and that on the third day he was to rise again, and, if they had any confidence in his word, that they should not have been looking for the event to take place, and in that case there would have been no necessity for embalming his body. It was a waste of expensive drugs to use over a hundred pounds to embalm a body that was to rise on the third day. It would seem that not one of the disciples was looking for or expecting his resurrection. It follows that he either did not tell them he was going to rise, or that they did not believe what he said. Either dilemma is an awkward one.

If the dead body of Jesus did become reanimated and was seen by numbers, it is a question where his garments came from. When he was laid away in the sepulchre he only had a sheet around him, but when he arose he was clothed, in the first instance with clothes like the gardener's, as he was thought by Mary Magdalen to be the gardener, and in every instance when he was seen he had garments on. Were they materialized for the occasion, or were they resurrected from the linen sheet? What, too, became of the hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes and spices that had been prepared? There is no account of their being found in the sepulchre, when the people were there to look for Jesus. Did it also arise?

A marked discrepancy exists as to the actual time the body of Jesus remained in the sepulchre, and what he said should be the time. He said as Jonah remained three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so should he remain three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. But, allowing the sepulchre to be the heart of the earth, which it clearly was not, he only remained in it one day and two nights. This is an embarrassing discrepancy indeed. It has long been a puzzle to pious mathematicians how one day and two nights can be stretched into three days and three nights, but by the rule that one and two are one it perhaps can be worked out. We are frequently told that "all things are possible with God." The believers are not expected to be too critical as to the matter of a day or two.

A similar discrepancy exists in the accounts of Jesus' ascension up into heaven—perhaps the most remarkable occurrence which ever took place in the world. Mark tells the whole story in a very few words: "So, then, after the Lord had spoken unto them, he was received up into heaven and sat on the right hand of God" (Mark xvi, 19), and that is all there is of it. How carelessly the vast subject is treated, like a common matter of little or no consequence! Is it just the proper thing that the most momentous event—if true—that ever took place in the history of man, should thus be flippantly passed over with a single score of words? Luke tells it differently. He has it that Jesus led the multitude out and to Bethany, when, after lifting up his hands and blessing them, he was parted from them and was carried up into heaven; but nothing is said whether he sat at the right hand or left hand of God. Matthew and John seem not to have deemed the little affair of consequence enough to even allude to it. Now a God in flesh and bones does not rise up into heaven every day, nor every century, nor every millennium, and it would certainly seem but proper that those veracious narrators should have told us something about it, if it ever did take place.

If the remarkable resurrection and ascension of Jesus did take place, it would seem there should be an abundance of corroborative testimony. If such an event should occur at this age of the world, our papers, magazines, and reviews would be full of it. But none of the writers of that period—Philo, Josephus, Seneca, Pliny the Elder, Pliny the Younger, Diogenes, Pausanias, Seutonius, Tacitus, Adrian, Antoninus, Marcus Aurelius, Lucian, nor any other writer of that age of the world—wrote a word upon the subject. To say the very least, it is a very suspicious fact.

When it is borne in mind that what are called the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were not known to have an existence, and that they were never quoted nor mentioned till the second century of the Christian era, the more probable supposition is that the story of the resurrection and ascension of Jesus was merely an imaginary affair—an after-thought—which, for effect, was woven into the remarkable, but highly improbable, story of Jesus. The whole thing evidently lacks the elements of truth and probability.

What I Don't Believe—No. 33.

279. I do not believe that Isaiah caused the progress of the sun, or of the day, to be changed at the time of Hezekiah's sickness, so that the shadow of the sun went back ten degrees on the dial of Ahaz. The motions of the heavenly bodies, or of the earth, are not changed or arrested by any such means, and the story is wholly incredible. It is almost equal to the noted claim that Joshua arrested the course of the sun, so that a certain day was lengthened out to nearly the length of two days, which no sensible person can believe. It is much easier for such idle stories to be told than for them to be true. It is far easier to utter a falsehood than to make it a verity.

280. I do not credit the story about Hilkiah, the high priest, finding the book of the Lord—probably the law or the Bible—in the house of the Lord. It would seem that it had been lost a long time, or that it had never been seen before. It is far more probable that Hilkiah and Shaphan, his scribe, got it up between them and then announced it as a great discovery. Priests have many times been known to use subterfuge and duplicity to that extent. If the law of Moses, or any part of the Bible, had then been written, and it had been deemed of the highest consequence, it is hardly likely it would have been lost for so long a time, or that when found it would have been such a marvel as to cause the king's knees to smite together in perfect fear. It is not unlikely that King Josiah was a weak-minded old man.

281. I do not believe the story about the men engaged at felling trees on the banks of the Jordan, one of whom had the misfortune to have his axe fly off the handle and fall into the stream, that it was made to float upon the surface by one of the number present throwing a piece of wood upon the surface of the water. Iron cannot be made to rise from the bottom of a river and float upon the surface by any such trickery. Iron is over seven times heavier than water, and its superior gravity cannot be overcome by throwing a piece of wood on the water. The claim is contrary to the universal experience of mankind. It is easy enough to tell such a story, and simple people may assume to believe it, but there is no good reason why they should.

282. I do not believe in the perfect harmony, unity, and agreement of what are called the Holy Scriptures. There are too many instances where they pointedly contradict each other for me to believe that they were all written in one and the same spirit, or that there is no inharmony or disagreement in them, and consequently they cannot justly be called the word of God.

283. I do not believe, for instance, that where it says, "And God saw everything he had made, and behold it was very good" (Gen. i, 31), agrees with what it says a very few chapters later: "And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and grieved him at his heart" (Gen. vi, 6).

284. I do not believe that the passage where it says God would dwell forever in the temple which Solomon built for him, and that his eyes and his heart should be there perpetually (2 Chron. vii, 12–16), agrees with another passage where it says, "Howbeit, the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands" (Acts vii, 48).

285. Where it says "God dwells in the light which no man can approach unto" (1 Tim. vi, 16), hardly agrees with the passages where it says that he dwells in thick darkness (1 Kings viii, 12); that he made darkness his secret place Ps. xviii, 11; and "Clouds and darkness are round about him" (Ps. xcvii, 2).

286. The passages where it describes God as having shown his person to Moses, that they spoke face to face as a man talks to a friend, that he showed Moses his back parts, and that, finally, Moses, Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel went up on to a mountain and there saw the God of Israel; and that they not only saw him, but did eat and drink with him (Ex. xxiv, 10, 11), hardly agrees with the passages where it says, "No man hath seen God at any time" (John i, 18); "ye hath neither heard his voice nor seen his shape" (John v, 37); "Thou canst not see my face; for there shall no man see me and live" (Ex. xxxiii, 20); "Whom no man hath seen nor can see" (1 Tim. vi, 16).

287. The passages where it speaks of God's being weary or tired as: "In six days the Lord made the heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested and was refreshed" (Ex. xxxi, 17); "I am weary with repenting" (Jer. xv, 6); "Thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities" (xliii, 24), do not fully harmonize with other passages where it says, "That the everlasting God, the Lord, the Creator of the end of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary" (Is. xl, 28).

288. The passages which speak of the omnipresence and omniscience of God in this wise: "The eyes of the Lord are in every place" (Prov. xv, 3); "Whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me and thy right hand shall hold me" (Ps. cxxxix, 7–10); "There is no darkness nor shadow of death where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves. For his eyes are upon the ways of man, and he seeth all his doings" (Job xxxiv, 21, 22), disagree with the passages which describe him as under the necessity of making observations to inform himself and of the ease in hiding from him, thus: "And the Lord came down to see the city—the tower" (Gen. xi, 5); "And the Lord said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous, I will go down now and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me, and if not I will know" (Gen. xviii, 20, 21); "And Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God, amongst the trees of the garden" (Gen. iii, 8).

289. The passages which speak with positiveness that God knows the hearts of men as: "Thou, Lord, which knowest the hearts of all men" (Acts i, 24); "Thou knowest my down-sitting and my up-rising; thou understandest my thought afar off. Thou compasseth my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with my ways" (Ps. cxxxix, 2, 3); "For he knoweth the secrets of the heart" (Ps. xliv, 21), illy agree with the passages which show that God has to make an effort to know what is in the hearts of his people, as: "The Lord your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul" (Deut. xiii, 3); "The Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee and to prove thee, to know what was in thy heart" (Deut. viii, 2), and "For now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me" (Gen. xxii, 12).

290. The passages which affirm that God is all-powerful, as: "Behold, I am the Lord, the God of all flesh. Is there anything too hard for me?" . . . "There is nothing too hard for thee" (Jer. xxxii, 27, 17); "With God all things are possible" (Matt. xix, 26), harmonize badly with the passages in Judges i, 19, which read thus: "And the Lord was with Judah, and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron" (Judges i, 19). In writing the first passages, no provision had been made for iron chariots.

291. Serious disagreements are found as to the unchangeableness of God First, we have such passages as these: "With whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning" (James i, 17); "For I am the Lord; I change not" (Matt. iii, 6); "I, the Lord, have spoken it; it shall come to pass, and I will do it. I will not go back, neither will I spare, neither will I repent" (Ezek. xxiv, 14); "God is not a man that he should lie, neither the son of man that he should repent" (Numb. xxiii, 19); while on the other hand are found such passages as these: "And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart" (Gen. vi. 6); "And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil he said he would do unto them, and he did it not" (Jonah iii, 10); "Wherefore, the Lord God of Israel saith, I said, indeed, that thy house, and the house of thy father, should walk before me forever; but now the Lord saith, be it far from me." . . . "Behold, the days come that I will cut off thine arm and the arm of thy father's house" (1 Sam. ii, 30, 31); "And the Lord said unto Moses, Depart, and go up hence, thou and the people. . . . For I will not go up in the midst of thee. . . . And the Lord said unto Moses, I will do this thing, also, that thou hast spoken. . . . My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest" (Ex. xxxiii, 1, 3, 17–14).

292. On the justice and impartiality of God there are also clashing passages, thus: "The Lord is upright, and there is no unrighteousness in him" (Ps. xcii, 15;) "Shall not the Judge of the earth do right" (Gen. xviii, 25); "A God of truth, and without iniquity. Just and right is he" (Deut. xxxii, 4); "There is no respect of persons with God" (Rom. ii, 11); "You say the way of the Lord is not equal. Hear now, O house of Israel; is not my way equal?" (Ezek. xviii, 25.) "He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger in giving him food and raiment. Love ye, therefore, the stranger" (Deut. x, 18, 19). Contrast them with the following: "Cursed be Canaan. A servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren" (Gen. ix, 25); "For I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation" (Ex. xx, 5); For the children, being not yet born, neither having done any good, or evil, that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand. . . . It was said unto her, the elder shall serve the younger. As it is written, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated" (Rom. ix, 11, 12, 13); "For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath" (Matt. xiii, 12); "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself; thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat of it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien" (Deut. xiv, 21), and others of the same character. These place the justice of God in an unfavorable light, to say the least.

293. I cannot believe that God at the same time is the author of evil and is not the author of evil. Contrast these passages: "The law of the Lord is perfect. . . The statutes of the Lord are right. . . The commandment of the Lord is pure" (Ps. xix, 7, 8); "God is not the author of confusion" (1 Cor. xiv, 33); "A God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he" (Deut. xxxii, 4); "For God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man" (James i, 13), with these: "Out of the mouth of the Most High proceedeth not evil and good" (Lam. iii, 38); "Thus saith the Lord, behold I frame evil against you, and devise a device against you" (Jer. xviii, 11); "I make peace and create evil. I, the Lord, do all these things" (Is. xlv, 7); "Shall there be evil in a city and the Lord hath not done it?" (Amos iii, 6); "Therefore, I also gave them statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live" (Ezek. xx, 25).

294. I find it hard to believe there is an agreement between the following passages as to the generosity of God: First. "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him" (James i, 5); "For every one that asketh, receiveth, and he that seeketh, findeth" (Luke xi, 10), and second, "He hath blinded their eyes and hardened their heart that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them" (John xii, 40). "For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favor" (Josh. xi, 20); "O Lord why hast thou made us to err from thy ways and hardened our heart?" (Isaiah lxiii, 17.)

295. The same kind of disagreement is found on the subject of God's being easily found by those who seek him, thus: "Every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth" (Matt. vii, 8); "Those that seek me early shall find me" (Prov. viii, 17). On the other hand we have the more discouraging announcement, thus: "Then shall they call upon me but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but shall not find me" (Prov. i, 28); "And when ye spread forth your hands I will hide mine eyes from you; yea, when ye make many prayers I will not hear" (Isaiah i, 15). "They cried, but there was none to save them; even unto the Lord, but he answered them not" (Psalms xviii, 41).

296. I fail to see any better agreement as to the peacefulness of God's character. We have, first, "The God of Peace" (Rom. xv, 33). "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace" (1 Cor. xiv, 33); "I make peace" (Isaiah xiv, 7); "Now the God of peace make you perfect" (Heb. xiii, 20), and many similar passages. On the opposite we have these: "The Lord is a man of war" (Ex. xv, 3); "The Lord of Hosts is his name" (Isaiah li, 15); "Blessed be the Lord, my strength, which teacheth my hands to war and my fingers to fight" (Psalms cxliv, 1). "Be valiant and fight the Lord's battles" (1 Sam. xviii, 17). "My lord fighteth the battles of the Lord" (1 Sam. xxv, 28). But with us is God to fight our battles (2 Chron. xxxii, 8,) and hundreds more of an equally sanguinary character.

297. The same contradictory testimony is found in respect to God's mercy and kindness. On the one hand we have such passages as these: "The Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy" (James v, 11); "For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men" (Lam. iii, 33); "For his mercy endureth forever" (1 Chron. xvi, 34); "I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God" (Ezek. xviii, 32); "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works" (Ps. cxlv, 9); "Who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth" (Tim. ii, 4); "God is love" (1 John iv, 16); "Good and upright is the Lord" (Ps. xxv, 8). On the other, we have passages of an entirely opposite charter, thus: "I will not pity nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them" (Jer. xiii, 14); "And thou shall consume all the people which the Lord thy God shalt deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them" (Deut. vii, 16); "Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not, but slay both men and women, infant and suckling" (1 Sam. xl, 2, 3); "Because they had looked into the ark of the Lord, even he smote of the people fifty thousand and three score and ten men" (1 Sam. vi, 19); "The Lord thy God is a consuming fire" (Deut. iv, 24); "The Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them. . . and they died" (Josh. x, 11).

298. I cannot easily believe in the harmony of statement of the slowness of God's anger. On the one side we find such passages as these: "The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy" (Ps. ciii, 8); "His anger endureth but a moment," but on the other side we find many of this description: "And the Lord's anger was kindled against Israel, and he made them wander in the wilderness forty years, until all the generation that had done evil in the sight of the Lord was consumed" (Num. xxxii, 13); "And the Lord said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people and hang them up before the Lord against the sun, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away from Israel" (Num. xxv, 4); "For ye have kindled a fire in mine anger which shall burn forever" (Jer. xvii, 4); "God is angry with the wicked every day" (Ps. vii, 2); "And the Lord met him and sought to kill him" (Ex. iv, 24). Mrs. P. R. Lawrence.

It affords us pleasure to introduce this talented and estimable lady to our readers. She has decided to enter the Liberal lecture field and we trust that thousands of the Liberals of the country will make her acquaintance and be pleased and instructed by her eloquent and able discourses. She has been engaged much of the time for more than ten years past in lecturing, in company with her husband, Dr. M. B. Lawrence, upon temperance, hygiene, physiology, etc., in which field she has done much good; but being an earnest Liberal she has decided that she can do a greater amount of good in lecturing exclusively upon scientific and Liberal subjects. Her desire is to do the most good possible to her fellow-beings and she has become satisfied that in no way can she do so to a greater extent than in exposing the errors and fables of theology and showing a better religion for the future than the fictions and fallacies which the world has so long been bound to. We wish her great success in her new field of labor and feel confident that she will both deserve and win it.

The Phrenological Journal for October, 1875, contained a sketch and phrenological examination of Mrs. Lawrence by Mr. Nelson Sizer, from which the following extracts are made:

"Mrs. Lawrence possesses a large brain, strongly marked in the regions of intellect and moral sentiment, and a temperament conducive to emotional susceptibility, energy and endurance. She is well developed in . . positiveness, decision and zeal. . . There is no small degree of go-ahead in her composition; and her warm temperament inspires her expressions with a high degree of enthusiasm. She is buoyant and hopeful. . . She is by no means wanting in sympathy, heartiness of friendship and affection, nor in those inner qualities which contribute to domestic happiness.

"Her language is large and well supplemented by the receptive and retaining intellect, which her prominent brow shows. She holds her stock of information at ready command, and her active observation is constantly acquiring new materials for use at any time she may deem appropriate. . . Mrs. Lawrence's public career as a lecturer began some ten years since, by giving lectures to ladies on health, hygiene and physiology. . . Her voice is very well adapted to her purpose and remarkably strong. . . . Her deep earnestness is, perhaps, her most peculiar characteristic."

Mrs. Lawrence will attend the Watkins Convention and will probably address the assembled multitude, who will doubtless be pleased with her style and ability. She possesses a clear full voice and speaks fluently without notes. Her earnestness of purpose carries conviction to her hearers.

After the Watkins Convention she will devote her time to lectures, and, accompanied by her young son, thirteen years of age, will travel from place to place as friends may desire. We bespeak for her a cordial reception and trust that a hearty welcome and a generous hand may be extended to her.

Michigan Spiritualists and Liberalists.

The semi-annual meeting of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists, for the year 1878, will be held at Grand Rapids, commencing on Thursday, August 29th, and closing Sunday, Sept. 1st. The arrangements that are being made, it is hoped, will make the meeting the largest Liberal demonstration ever held in the State. Some of the best speakers in the Spiritual and Liberal ranks will be present. S. B. McCRACKEN, Secretary.

OUR friend Ella E. Gibson is now on a visit to this city. She has been lecturing in Pennsylvania much of the time for more than a year past. She will attend the Watkins Convention if her health will permit.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

To every ancient Christian writer, who was compiling the deeds of Jesus, these two miracles cannot but have seemed of surpassing weight. They must have been trumpeted to every open ear, and notorious to every disciple. That the three first narrators should have been ignorant of them is simply impossible, that they should not have felt their pre-eminent value is incredible. When they themselves attributed to the Pharisees and others power occasionally to cast out demons, they must have been aware of the comparative weakness of claims founded on the cure of domoniacs. Since they are greedy of this latter class of tales, they could not have omitted these two miracles wrought under the eyes of the rulers, if they had ever heard of them. This is but a circuitous way of saying that these two miracles are certainly false, and an after invention. Moreover, it is to be remembered that those who attribute this gospel to the apostle John, unanimously avow that it was written after all the other apostles were dead, after Jerusalem was destroyed, after all the learned schools of Palestine were broken up, and nearly all the population sold into distant slavery by the bitter cruelty of the Romans. Hence it was written when all the witnesses had disappeared, written also in a foreign language and a foreign country, so as to leave no other check upon free invention than the criticism of learned heathens, if any of these paid attention. Criticism within the Church there was none. Whatever most glorified the crucified savior, most pleased the Church; and the writer of the gospel avows that he writes expressly in order to strengthen faith in the Christ, the son of God. The conscious piety of his purpose, no doubt, overpowered all his scruples, especially when he knew how faint was the likelihood that any Christian would call him to account.

But suppose that his tale was true, and that the narrator was actually John the son of Zebedee, what was the duty of an honest, straight-forward man? what must have been the instinct of a man of ordinary good sense and delicacy, when, under circumstances so suspicious, he announced marvels of 60 or 70 years earlier, which none before had told, and none could confirm? Surely his obvius duty was to give his name, as does John in the Apocalypse—as Paul, as Peter, as James.* He ought to have deposed that he was present at the discourses and at the miracles; likewise, men of ordinary thoughtfulness would have commented to account for the remarkable silence of other writers, of which the apostle John or anyone moving within the churches cannot have been ignorant. Instead of this simple, natural, ingenuous proceedure, we find an evasiveness and subtlety appropriate to one who desires to effect his object indirectly, without committing himself to an avowal which would be equivalent to forging of a signature. He does not say, "I who write am John the son of Zebedee," but brings up a tale unknown to the other gospels, that there was one disciple whom Jesus peculiarly loved,† who leant on his breast at the last supper, who did not desert Jesus (as the other narrators represent all the apostles to have done) but accompanying him, stood firmly under the cross with the mother of Jesus; and that to this favorite disciple Jesus solemnly committed the care of his mother, by an extempore form of adoption. Lastly, from some unknown persons, who call themselves We (John xxi. 24) a supplementary verse declares, that this is he who testified of these things and wrote these things; and that they know that his testimony is true; words certainly ambiguous where the greatest precision was needed. The substantive testimony following the verb testified, suggests the meaning that "they are personally acquainted with the facts which he here writes, and knows them to be true." This was the natural and likely to be the current interpretation. Yet how could they attest, unless they were aged men, who had lived in Palestine during the events? a thing which no modern defender of this gospel ventures to maintain. If we interpret the words "We know this beloved disciple to be veracious," such attestation from anonymous persons is strangely impotent. In none of these circumstantials do the marks appear of an ingenuous, sound, and truthful mind; much less of one who knows the conditions and requirements for the establishment of historical truth.

Space does not allow reiteration of the details by which it is abundantly proved that if this gospel be true the other three are false in cardinal matters, and conversely, but I may insist on a broad fact—the absence in the gospel of the moral teaching which abounds in the others. A contrast will illustrate it. In Matthew, a rich young man asks Jesus what he shall do to inherit eternal life. Jesus replies, he must keep the commandments. He asks, which? and is told, five commandments of the second table of the decalogue, (which enjoin duties of men to men) omitting the *tenth; also, he is to love his neighbor as himself. Mark and Luke, who leave out the love to one's neighbor, may account for the young man promptly answering that he has obeyed these (five) commandments from his youth up. On this Jesus comments: "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come and follow me." This reply is in harmony with the doctrine of the three gospels from end to end, which press the duty of selling estates and giving alms as a prime merit, and almost a necessity. But in the fourth gospel, when a parallel question is asked, "What shall we do, that we may work the works of God?" Jesus replies, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent," and afterwards, when he has announced the coming of the Comforter, which is the Holy Spirit, he adds, that this Spirit "will convince the world of sin, because they believe not on me; of righteousness, because I go to the Father and ye see me no more." No idea of duty owing from man to man is thus attached to sin and righteousness. Mr. John Stuart Mill in his book on Liberty makes the monstrously absurd and ridiculous error of saying that "Christianity" cares only for faith, and not at all for conduct, but if he had limited his remark to the fourth gospel, it would be highly plausible and almost true. Faith, sin, righteousness, wickedness, are there practically swallowed up in transcendental opinions about the son and the father. In a few verses (it may be urged), the highest morality is invoked for his disciples under the words santification and perfection (John xvii. 17, 23). Yet even there the saintliness is made to turn upon the reception of "the truth;" virtually, on a creed concerning the son of God. Now when it is seen how vast a proportion of the preaching in the three gospels refers to duties of man to man, the fact that we literally cannot find such preaching at all in this gospel proves that it comes from a wholly different mind. By no pretence can it be made out that we have the same Jesus in this fourth document. The sins which the Jesus of the three gospels severely rebukes in the rulers, are, oppression of the poor, rabbinical subtleties and hypocritical religion. In he fourth we just gather that they were too punctilious about the sabbath; but the only sin denounced by him is the non-reception of his own personal pretensions. On that he is energetic enough. That which in the other gospels is the transcendent virtue, the way of perfection, the way to eternal life, the merit which is to receive the reward of thrones and crowns in the kingdom of God—"sell that ye have and give alms"—is not in the fourth. That the apostles Andrew, Peter, John, and James made their highly meritorious sacrifice of boats and nets for the sake of Jesus and in obedience to his call, even before he was avowed to be the Messiah, is not alluded to in the fourth gospel. In Matthew and Luke is found one verse (Matt. xi, 27; Luke x, 22) which (unless it be a later interpolation) may have been the nucleus out of which the fourth narrator developed his entire romance. Be this as it may, a romance it is. As Plato has put his own extravagant political theories into the mouth of Socrates, so has this writer put his Alexandrine philosophy and apparently Gnostic diction into the mouth of Jesus. There may have been some elements of the true Socrates in the former, and some of the true Jesus in the latter; but no alchymy will be able to extract the pure essence of Socrates, nor of Jesus.

*Paul tells us, only the tenth commandment convicted him of sin, the others being external.

*The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews is a reasoner, not a narrator; and assumes no position which requires his name. Luther well guessed that it was Apollos; to which some of the moderns assent.

†No hint appears in the three gospels that Jesus had any specially beloved disciple. Peter, James, and John are named as with Jesus apart on some special occasions, but this triplet never is found in the fourth gospel. Mark tells us that Jesus named James and John "Boanerges," which Mark translates "sons of thunder," rightly or wrongly. Great indignation was caused against the two brethren—Matthew says, because their mother—Mark, because they themselves—desired of Jesus supremacy for them "in his kingdom." If John had been a favorite, that might well have come out in one or other gospel.

THE UNIVERSAL REFORM CAMP-MEETING.

To the members of the Universal Reform Association and others interested in the U. R. A. Camp-meeting, I wish to say, that the officers of that society think it not best, in consequence of the stringency of the times, to hold a camp-meeting this year; but instead we would recommend all to attend the main camp-meeting at Etna, which commences on Wednesday, Aug. 28. The platform at that meeting is absolutely free, no question is ignored, and a grand time is expected. Fare from New York to Boston by Stonington line, $1.50, and I will arrange with the Sanford line of steamers from Boston to Bangor for half fare. At Bangor you are 14 miles from Etna, tickets half price.

There will be three or four discourses and two conference meetings each day. Among the speakers chosen to be there are Mattie Sawyer and myself.

Come brothers and sisters of the U. R. A., let us have a good time.

Speling Reform among the White Mountainz.

Reports from the American Institute ov Instrucshon, held from July 9 tu 12th, inclusive, at the Fabyan Hous, White Mountainz, tel us that it waz a grate sucses. Its manajerz contracted with the railrode men and hōtel keeperz tu cary, and loge, and bōrd thoze hoo wūd attend the meeting at about hāf rates; and the funds ov the institute wer replenisht by the assesment, before a tiket cūd be purchest, ov wun dolar on eech person. During the week ov the meeting the hōtelz and bōrding houzez for twenty milez around the Fabyan Hous wer crouded. It iz thaut 5,000 personz wer in the mountainz. A large number attended the meetingz ov the institute, more or less, but a stil grāter number made partyz tu ascend Mount Washington, or visit the Notch, the Glen, the Old Man ov the Mountain, or uther plāsez ov interest, and theez excurshonz wer doubtles az valūable tu the teecherz az the instrucshonz ov the profesorz.

The anūal meeting ov the Speling Reform Assosiashon on Thurzday, July 11th, made a part ov the institute, and waz ālso a sucses. A fine addres, by Prof. March, waz deliverd in the morning, and in the afternoon, amung uther useful wurk, the folōing rezolushonz wer past:

WHEREAZ, Within the memory ov the prezent jenerashon, serten sūperfluous leterz hav bin dropt, e. g., k from such wurdz az music, public, ets.

1. Rezolvd, That authorz and the pres jeneraly ar hereby ernestly solisited tu further aid the cauz ov speling reform by riting and printing the wurdz hav, giv, and liv without the silent e.

2. Rezolvd, That teecherz ar invited tu giv thair help tu the speling reform by omiting tu mark agenst thair pupilz az erorz the riting ov the wurdz hav, giv, and liv without the silent e.

3. Rezolvd, That this assosiashon recomendz all teecherz tu giv thuro training in speling by sound, az an aid tu acūrate pronunciashon and az an introducshon tu an amended orthography.

4. Rezolvd, That the American Institute ov Instrucshon, and uther edūcashonal assosiashonz, be requested tu adopt the foregoing rezolushonz.

The next day the institute tūk up the foregōing rezolūshonz, and after sum considerashon referd them tu a comitee tu be repōrted on at the next anūal meeting.

Anuther rezolushon ov considerabl importance, which past ūnanimusly at the speling reform meeting, waz as folōz:

Rezolvd, That this association recognizez the use ov three diverse, but not nesesarily conflicting, modes ov caryng on this reform. 1. A purely fonetic method on the bāsis ov a sinḡl sound; 2. The method propozed by the comitee on new spelingz, adopted by the assosiashon at Baltimore and recomended for jeneral adopshon; 3. A method without new leterz, in which the best mode iz made ov the tipes ālready found in the printer'z case.

The third method iz that nōn az the Anglo-American, and which is employd in our columnz devōted tu speling reform. We find it perfectly practicabl and occazioning very litl trubl tu our compozitorz. It wād hav bin az wel for the assosiashon tu hav defined the second method propozed by the eminent filolojists hoo form the comitee on new spelingz. We understand, however, that it involvz the use ov a number ov new leterz.

With regard tu droping the silent e in hav, giv, and liv, we ar quite ready tu fall intu line if the press jeneraly asents tu the propozishon.

The Story of Cain and Abel.

The first son of Adam and Eve was named Cain, and the second son was named Abel (Gen. iv, 1). On their attaining manhood each had his pursuit, and they earned their bread by the "sweat of their brow." But unfortunately for them Cain's offering was not acceptable to his God, and he became wroth and quarreled with his brother and slew him. This is the first blood shed in the cause of religion on record. Since that time it has been shed in quantities beyond human comprehension. According to the Bible and the histories of all ages, millions have since been slain in quarrels on this subject alone, even down to the present year in Russia and Turkey. As Abel was nowhere to be seen, the Lord called unto Cain and said, "Where is Abel, thy brother?" Cain answered and said, "I know not; am I my brother's keeper?" Then the Lord cursed him, and drove him out from the face of the earth, and Cain said unto the Lord, "And it shall come to pass that every one that findeth me shall slay me." And the Lord answered him saying, "Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain vengeance shall be taken on him seven fold," which I suppose must mean that he should be slain seven times. "And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him." As to the nature of this mark we are not told, or whether it was stamped on the forehead with a heated iron as was the ancient custom. But right here comes in the query: Who was it that the Lord feared would find and slay him. According to the record of that event the human family in the whole universe at that remote day consisted of Adam, Eve, and Cain, Abel being dead. I suppose that the Lord felt obliged to mark him for fear his own father and mother would not know him and would kill him. "And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord and dwelt in the land of Nod" (Gen. iv, 16). By this it seems that the land of Nod must have been outside of the Lord's domain, as I shall bring more evidence to show farther on.

In this land, I suppose Cain found his wife, (Gen. iv, 17). The record does not give any account of his having as much as a sister in his own land at that time. But as the Lord created only Adam and Eve, it must follow that she was not of the Lord's creation, and an inhabitant of the land of Nod. Then Cain begat a son and named him Enoch, and built a city and named it after him. Now he could not have had a city without inhabitants. This shows that there were many people in Nod while there were few in the Lord's domain. Now, is not this proof enough that the Mosaic God did not create the land of Nod and its people? Now, is not this, taken together with the story of the Mosaic creation a very crude and imperfect story, which shows on its face the ignorance of the people in the age in which it was written.

I should be pleased if some Christian minister would rise and explain: 1. Where Cain found his wife; 2. Who was Cain's wife; 3. Where is the land of Nod? for the edification of many Christians as well as Infidels.

Answer to A. R. C.

MR. EDITOR: I supposed when I wrote my article on "The True Education of Sex" that I should address, through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, those minds which had become emancipated from social and sexual superstition as well as from religious superstition; but it seems I was mistaken, for up from Missouri comes a voice charging Mr. Leland and myself with advocating "lascivious schemes." Now, our critic's first inference, that because we maintain the native purity of sex, and the naturalness of that admiration which every well-sexed man and woman feels for the distinctive sex-charms of the other, we advocate a "civilization without clothes," is all wrong. Health and comfort of body require that we clothe our forms; and, in addition, our artistic sense delights in the use of attractive attire and adornment; but the point is this: had we never been taught by Christian moralists to believe that our sex-life is innately vile and abominable, the most pernicious teaching possible, and the root-cause of nearly all the sexual degradation that exists to-day, we should never have felt a blush of shame tinge our cheeks in presence of our own or another's nakedness, but would have felt that every organ and feature of the "divine temple" was as pure and as rightfully worthy of our admiring gaze as the human face divine. It is because children are taught that all which pertains to sex-nature is vile and low that in after life they so regard it, and naturally their practices are made to correspond, and sexual depravity is the legitimate result.

The gist of my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 18, which my critic dare not assail, is that sex itself, and all its natural manifestations, are just as pure as any other part or expression of the human form divine, and that the general acceptance of this exalted ideal can be secured only through a common sense and scientific method of treating this as all other subjects. Indeed, scientific knowledge on this subject is all that will save the race from complete sexual demoralization, and I shall persist in teaching this view of the question though all the "pure" Liberals of Missouri and the other States continue to throw their sharp-edged thrusts upon me. The idea that the human sex-organs are vile is enough of itself to corrupt human nature and lead man to debase that which is naturally pure and chaste, and such an idea is unworthy of the Liberalism of this century. It belongs to the creed-bound and priest-ridden people of the past, and not to the enlightened Rationalists of to-day.

All this talk about "purity," "virtue," "chastity," and "morality" is without any significance whatever, for the reason that the accepted meanings of these terms are wholly conventional and in conformity with Christian standards, and almost universally at variance with natural law, when the truth is, there can be no true sexual or other morality that is not based on natural or physiological law. All other morality is spurious and an abettor of evil. Any action that is in strict obedience to natural and physical law is virtuous, chaste, and moral, and all the carpings of religious bigots and social conservatives cannot make it anything else. It is a matter of constant surprise to me that men and women who claim to have outgrown religious superstition and the bondage of Christian creeds are still the most earnest defenders of the Christian moralities, all of which are founded on the bed-rock of Bible doctrine. Must we, then, always be enslaved by a cast-iron system of morals that was founded ages ago upon Christian dogmas instead of upon a knowledge of natural laws? There is a social and sexual science, and, as intelligent beings, it is our duty to discover the laws governing in the realms of sex, for when these are understood we have a safe guide to conduct. But such critics as A. R. C. would stop all progress in such discovery, because, forsooth, through his own false education he believes a part of himself so vile and bad that the sight of a woman's nude body would, or might, "transform him into a brute or monster." Our critic would do well to migrate to the frigid zones, where he could cover his vileness in the triple armor of three coats of fur.

In my study of France I do not find it true that it is a "nation of prostitutes," but I do find that in our own country, where the Christian moralities prevail, the large proportion of wives are legal prostitutes, and a large proportion of both married and unmarried men are guilty of a violation of the Bible commandment, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." What says A. R. C. to this? Another thing, and it is a recorded fact, that in Japan both men and women bathe together in a state of nudity, and it is found that their heathenish morals are fully equal to our Christian ones.

The illustrations that A. R. C. uses in favor of the utility of clothing for "decency's" sake we could more logically use as an argument in favor of nakedness. He alludes to the hairy covering of animals, the plumage of birds, and the verdure of the fields. These, dear critic, are all provided by nature. Neither the animals, the birds, nor the fields cover themselves. They weave no fine fabrics with deft fingers to hide an "indecent" exposure of their bodies, and if we follow their example we shall walk the earth in the simple robing of our charms, such as nature provided, and that would be in a state of nudity; but, instead, the utility of comfort—not of "decency"—and the culture of art, inspires us to array our bodies in fine and beautiful raiment. It strikes me that Missouri is very productive of "pure Liberals," as the voices from Ozark and Hannibal go to show. If all the States are as active in the laudable endeavor to "purify Liberalism," we may blossom forth an immaculate company after a while, that is, if the majority of us are not too pure to believe in the "exceeding beauty and holiness of sex," which, to be serious, is the central idea of our social scripture, and one we are proud to stand by and defend.

In conclusion, I will assure my critic that, so long as the world is peopled by men who, like himself, honestly believe a part of their nature vile (the Christian total-depravity idea) and who so often make their practices correspondingly vile, and hence are ashamed of that which is the symbol of their manhood, we shall most carefully conceal our distinctive sex-charms from the gaze of all such by most "chastely adorning" ourselves in becoming apparel. Then, O critic, rest in peace, for we shall make no effort to turn the world topsy turvy by advocating a "civilization without clothes;" for then we should freeze way up here in Wisconsin if we, like the animals, the birds, and the fields, wore only the dress of Nature. ELVIRA WHEELOCK.

Christian Morality Criticised.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: When I read Elvira Wheelock's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 18th, on "True Education Concerning Sex," I instinctively felt that, although her motives might be the highest, her thoughts the purest, and her language the most chaste, yet it was a very hazardous thing for her—a woman—to do. The old adage that "truth must not be spoken at all times," has a show of truth in it if the comfort of the speaker alone is to be considered. It is a dangerous thing to speak the truth before its time, and he or she who does so, or dares to speak openly on a subject tabooed in "polite" society, must expect to be made the target of ignorant and bigoted criticism, must expect to have their arguments misrepresented, and their motives impugned, if not their characters maligned. I do not apprehend that Mrs. Wheelock was ignorant of this when she penned the article referred to, but seeing the light herself she had the moral courage to reflect it through the press, knowing at the same time that "offenses must come." Hypatia once ventured to teach a "true system of education," but she was beaten to death and torn to pieces by a Christian mob. The descendants of that Christian mob still live, but they have adopted a different mode of demonstrating their piety. Now if any one—especially a woman—ventures to suggest that our "Christian civilization" is not the most heavenly thing ever conceived in the imagination of men, they just proceed to knock the intruder down with the club of "obscenity," and tear his good name to pieces with the claws of defamation.

Mrs. Wheelock's first assailant is A. R. C. in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 15th, where, under the caption of "civilization without clothes," he proceeds to demonstrate how illiberal and prejudiced people can be, and still call themselves Liberals.

The whole animus of A. R. C.'s article is so eminently Christian that I at first located him in that camp, and I concluded as a matter of course that he drew his inspiration from that book which declares that Adam was "afraid because he was naked" (Gen. iii, 10), and wherein God says to the high priest, "Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar, that thy nakedness be not discovered thereon," and was satisfied to let it pass, as we do not expect anything else from that quarter. But then I recollected seeing the initials A. R. C. quite frequently in Freethought journals, and became convinced that he really desired to pass for a "Liberal," and of course subscribed to the "Eighth Demand of Liberalism," which reads: "We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'Christian' morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty." Now just how A. R. C. can demand that, and then write in the vein he does, is one of the things (as Lord Dundreary puts it), "that no fellow can ever find out."

A. R. C. says: "Then why those endeavors of Mr. Leland and Mrs. Wheelock to educate us into the belief that the laying aside our clothing will eventually improve our morals." Now Mrs. Wheelock does not advocate any such "absurd scheme" as laying aside our clothing, especially in this latitude, but she does teach that it is wrong to teach our children that clothing is worn for the purpose of hiding something about the person which is essentially degraded and degrading, which all "decent" people are ashamed of, and which it is a sin to uncover.

That is the teaching of "Christian morality," the dregs of asceticism. Natural morality and Mrs. Wheelock are in harmony.

A. R. C. next ventures upon prophecy. Hear him: "I will assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that if the laws of society were such that men and women could publicly commingle in a state of nudity, in less than ten years they would relapse from the most exalted condition of civilization into barbarism."

I admit that it is no mean advantage to be gifted with prescience, yet it cannot always be depended upon. I have even known cases where it absolutely failed. Pro-slavery orators and journals never ceased for years to harrow our imaginations with pictures of rapine, blood, and carnage that would inevitably follow the emancipation of the slaves, but they only succeeded in proving that "the old prophets are all dead, and the young ones are all liars." I fear that A. R. C.'s prophecy would prove equally untrustworthy. Conservatives in politics, religion, and morals are always standing on the watch tower waving a red flag, and screaming at the top of their voices, "Don't touch existing institutions, or everything will go to eternal smash."

"Livingston and hundreds of others who have devoted the best portion of their lives to the exploration of uncivilized continents in the interest of humanity, could never become reconciled to the nudity of those by whom they were surrounded." Of course not. How could you expect it? The natives were undeveloped savages, and David Livingston was a Christian missionary. He, as well as the "hundreds of others" mentioned, was the product of two thousand years of false teaching and false practice, the result of a philosophy as unnatural and a culture as far removed from natural standards as possible. How could they become reconciled in a few short years?

"The moment that passion, uncontrolled by reason, becomes the mainspring to marriage," etc. Indeed! who disputes that dictum? Who advocates "passion uncontrolled by reason?"

"But let such sentiments as those above quoted prevail, and we will have lustful desires for our teachers, and animal passions for our masters, fit advocates for the nudity of woman's body to excite the vilest passions of men, transforming them into brutes, and from brutes into monsters."

I am here forcibly reminded of what Dr. Johnson said when a lady congratulated him on having excluded all the "naughty" words from his dictionary. "Ah! Madam, I see you have been looking for them." I apprehend that the "indecency" of words will, upon close examination, be found to consist in "the intention of him who speaks and the depravity of him who hears."

"We instinctively shrink from the indecent exposure of our persons," etc., etc.

Mr. Editor, it occurs to me that the logic of A. R. C.'s concluding paragraph is just the least bit inconclusive, and by your permission I would like to propound a few questions to him.

Why do you instinctively shrink? etc. Is not that feeling, as well as your opinions on the subject treated, the result of your education? Are "other animals governed" by the feelings of shame, and is that the reason why they cover themselves with hair? If so, why does not the hair grow most profusely "where it will do the most good"? Does Darwin agree with you about "the brilliant plumage of birds"?

If the rose-bud covers itself for shame, should the rose ever be allowed to blush into maturity?

Is it not easier to call other people "lascivious schemers" than to disprove their statements or answer their arguments?

The denizen of a garret may throw slops upon a lady passing on the pavement below, but that fact will fail to convince people who have laid aside their theological spectacles, that the motives and principles which guide A. R. C. through the journey of life, are any higher or purer than those that inspire Elvira Wheelock.

June 17, 1878. Yours for natural morality, H.

THE author, D. M. Bennett, of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, will please accept our thanks for a copy of his magnificent work entitled "The Champions of the Church." Want of time and space prevents us giving in this issue more than a cursory notice of this really valuable addition to Freethought literature, but in a future number we will devote the time and space to it which it really deserves. The main portion of the book (of over 1,100 pages) is devoted to biographical sketches of nearly one hundred and fifty of the most eminent Christians who have lived from the time of Jesus of Nazareth to Anthony Comstock of New York. The crimes committed by these ornaments of the Christian Church are set forth by the author in his well-known vigorous and forcible style, and as we read we are filled with indignation and shame. With indignation that such monsters should have been allowed to live; with shame for our race that it has produced such men. The crimes of one man, or a dozen men, would not prove that the religion which they professed was the cause of such crime, or that the religion itself was untrue, but when we see that in all ages and in all countries where the Christian has been the dominant religion, cruelty, hatred, intolerance, and persecution have been an effect, we may justly conclude that Christianity has been the cause. What surprises us most in the book is the wonderful acquaintance Mr. Bennett has with the best authors, and the great amount of labor involved in producing a work like this in so short a time. Mr. Bennett is known to be an able writer, but this latest effort of his surpasses all his previous ones. The book is not only intensely interesting from first to last, but contains information that one would have to ransack the whole of a very considerable library to obtain. "The Champions of the Church" should find a place in the library of every Liberal in Great Britain and America. It furnishes a host of facts with which they should be acquainted; in fact there are few books published which are so necessary to the skeptic. It is a perfect cyclopede of Christian history. It is a large volume of 1,119 pages, well printed and handsomely bound, and is sold at the low price of $3, post-paid. —Toronto Freethought Journal.

IT appears from the circular of Dun, Barlow & Co., that in the first six months of 1878 there have been 5,825 business failures in the United States, the aggregate liability being $130,000,000. In the same six months of last year the total number of failures was 4,749 and the aggregate liability $99,000,000. At first sight this increase of nearly twenty-five per cent in the number of insolvent firms is certainly discouraging. But the American Exchange suggests that a large percentage of these firms have been really insolvent for years, and that the appearance of a good many others in the list at this time is to be referred to the recent action of Congress on the Bankrupt law.

Letters from Friends.

MR. CHARLES ELLIS TO BE AT WATKINS.

This able Liberal lecturer joins the multitude going to the Watkins Convention. He writes :

"H. L. Green, Sec., etc.: Your invitation to attend the Watkins Convention in August, and to take part in the same, is received. In reply I would say that I shall be there, Deus volens or not, and if I can do anything to add to the success of the meeting you may command me. I am in fullest accord with the objects of your meeting, and think that the Liberal League is the most practical movement before the unchurched people of the country, and deserves the heartiest co-operation of every friend of liberty in the land.

"Respectfully yours, CHARLES ELLIS."

HOTELS.

The Lake View Hotel, one of the finest at Watkins, opened to the public the 25th of May last, has agreed to entertain Convention people at $2 per day. Those who desire a clean, cheap, well kept house can put up at the Cottage Home. Persons desiring to stop at a boarding-house will please write to G. C. Hibbard, Esq., Watkins, N. Y. Friends should order their rooms at once, as many are already being taken.

ELDER F. W. EVANS.

The Liberals of central and western New York who listened to the words of wisdom uttered by Elder Evans at the National Liberal League Convention at Rochester, and at the Freethinker's Convention at Randolph, will be pleased to know that he is to be one of the speakers at the Watkins Convention. Will you give place in THE TRUTH SEEKER for his letter expressing his peculiar views?

"MT. LEBANON, July 11, 1878.

"H. L. Green, Esteemed Friend: I have just received your cordial invitation to attend the Liberal Convention to be held at Watkins, in August next. Upon this subject of national reform my whole soul is moved with deep emotion, caused by influx from the inner spheres of the spirit world which is, at this time, acting upon the earth spheres to inaugurate the second cycle of the great American Revolution. The founders of the first cycle—the signers—are all in the spirit world. They rest not day nor night, until their revolutional, prophetical ideal of a civil government is incarnated upon earth. It is the hope of humanity, their trust in God, that the judge of all the earth will do right, and cause those who rule their fellows to do right. The list of speakers invited to your Convention indicates the existence in our country of true sons and daughters of the signers, Infidels all, Infidel to false, oppressive systems of Church and State religions and civil institutions that make men and women, capital and labor enemies to each other, enacting organic laws that sin as with a cart rope. Let us begin the second cycle where the signers began the first—at the bottom. Put the axe of reform to the root of society evils. They declared the inalienable rights of man, independent of all existing laws of Great Britain, and her thousand years of political and religious experience. Let us declare the right of man and woman, of labor and capital, the right of human beings, not to the pursuit of happiness only, but to its permanent possession, that all government should tend towards that end—the good of all. As Jefferson, Payne, and coadjutors removed one class of evils, so let us remove another class. We have made a good beginning. Slavery is abolished. Imprisonment for debt is abolished. Public lands are free to actual settlers; homesteads are inalienable; women have some rights besides that of being chastised with a whip not larger than a broom-stick by their lord. Let us make women citizens, limit the quantity of land to be owned by a citizen, thus increasing the number of freeholders, and decreasing the material for armies and navies—landless people. Abolish all laws for collecting debts. Each town establish a homestead, where all the weary and homeless can find rest, and all tramps plenty of work on the farm, in the garden or shops, and have a communistic, unitary home of their own, with brains to manage it. In a word, educate men and women to take care of themselves, and educate one class to take care of the class that will not do it, and all will be cared for. Success to the coming great Watkins Convention as a means of effecting a peaceful revolution. F. W. EVANS."

CENTRAL, S. C., July 8, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by your paper that another victim is to be sacrificed upon the hellish altar of religious despotism, and that our worthy brother and co-worker in the great struggle for mental freedom, E. H. Heywood, is to be the martyr. Oh! when will these persecutions cease? How long will the patriots and lovers of liberty tolerate the ravages of Comstock & Co.? When will forbearance cease to be a virtue? Surely the time has already come; we have been run over rough shod long enough. Let every Liberal in the land rise in the majesty of outraged innocence, and come to the rescue; we cannot, we must not, stand with folded arms and see the best, the noblest of our citizens dragged from homes and families, thrust into loathsome dungeons, and forever ruined for no other offense than uttering and writing their honest convictions. I am proud to see you have taken steps to have a petition gotten up for brother Heywood's pardon, and I do hope the effort may be a successful one; but I would suggest that you send out a number of those blank petitions disconnected from THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think its being printed on one side will be an objection with a great many. Of course you can't afford to print and send out several hundreds of these petitions gratuitously, but I am certain that the friends of brother Heywood, and all lovers of Freethought, will be willing to more than remunerate you for the work. I am, no doubt, the poorest man on your subscription list, but I can and will contribute something in support of the proceeding. If my suggestion meets your approval, send me one of the petitions, also one to my son, and one to my brother at Seneca City, and we will do all we can to get a good number of signers, and I flatter myself that we can procure the signatures of many of the best citizens of the country. True it is, there are but few, very few, professed Infidels in this part of the country. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of Freethought sentiment, and an increasing desire for liberty. The light of reason is growing brighter, and the dark shades of religious cruelty are gradually giving way. Oh, if we here in the South could get one Liberal lecturer to come among us and stir up the Liberal element, what a howl and a consternation there would be among the clergy! It was reported not long since that Col. Ingersoll was going to visit Atlanta this Summer, and you don't know what a quaking it caused among the good shepherds. Some of them went into sackcloth and ashes, and I do believe they would rather see a full crop of grasshoppers than Col. Ingersoll.

Well, my good brother, I hope you will push Mr. Heywood's case forward as speedily as possible. You have been our leader so long that we Liberals all look for you in the van of the army, and I hope, and even believe that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will dare to follow where you dare to lead, for we never found you wrong, and it is to be regretted that men calling themselves Liberals, possessing wealth, and boasting of culture and literary attainments superior to you, should fall so far behind you in the great struggle for human liberty. Oh, is it not deplorable that such men as Abbot and Underwood should suffer themselves to be overrun by popular prejudice, and actually go back on their word and principles! This they have done, and are now, if not directly, yet indirectly, aiding and abetting Comstock in his damnable persecutions. "Save us from our friends," and we will take care of our enemies.

R. M. CASEY.

PENTWATER, MICH., July 7, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Hard times has been trying to make me believe I must stop THE TRUTH SEEKER, but the more I think of it the less I think I can do it, for it's the most fearless advocate of truth and liberty, and is doing as much to elevate mankind and show him his true position in life as any paper in the land, and I can't well get along without it; but it's not for my benefit alone, it's for the good it is doing in the world. It has emancipated many a soul from bondage and superstition, and knowing that every dollar helps you to bear the burden and the self-sacrifices you have to make, and with feelings of friendship and esteem for your labors, I send you one more dollar, hoping to be able to keep sending while THE TRUTH SEEKER lives.

Yours for friendship, love, and truth,

A. TINKLEPAUGH.

WILKSBARRE, PA., July 8, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: I am happy to acknowledge the receipt of the "Champions," which I have no doubt will prove an excellent acquisition to my library and a splendid companion to the "World's Sages, Thinkers and Reformers".

Yours respectfully, ROBERT J. JAMES.

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 7, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: If the great body of Liberals all over the country feel their obligations towards thee deeply as I do, for thygood work in publishing so many truly excellent books, tracts, and pamphlets, and as often bless thy name, thy self, and thy great life-work, thee must surely be a very happy and self-contented individual. If others have done well in the getting up of good, interesting, and useful books, thee has done vastly better and more of it. I have just been reviewing "The Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier," who was for thirty years a Roman Catholic priest.

I read the work with a great deal of interest as it came out week by week in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am sure thee has done a good deed in giving it to us in pamphlet form. Poor Jean. No one can ever realize the anguish he suffered, or what cruel remorse tortured his gentle, loving soul as he taught the "pious lies that, in his heart of hearts, he abhorred." His legacy to the world—the fruits of a lifetime of careful study, deep thought, and conscientious earnestness of purpose—is truly a great work; and as all the ideas embraced in it are his own independent thoughts, deduced simply from a perusal of the Bible and the holy father's writings, and are not the fruits of a long series of Infidel reading, we have here a purely original work, and one by a hand competent to perform it well. None but a priest who has taught the old mythology for years could see all its shortcomings as Jean did. There is no class of men who can as fully understand all the ins and outs of a question as can teachers, for to impart knowledge to others requires a perfect understanding of the subject from its initial to its finality. In closing the remarkable Will, he says, emphatically and earnestly, "The end of my earthly course is drawing very near, and, to resume all the experience of my life and career in a few words, I would that the last of the kings were strangled with the intestines of the last of the priests."

Respectfully, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

LAWRENCE, MASS., July 4, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Respected Sir: Your noble TRUTH SEEKER is still a welcome visitor at my house, and a regular one. It is A No. 1—"culture" to the contrary, notwithstanding. But under the pressure of hard times I have been compelled to withhold from you your due from me until now, at which time I am prepared to pay you. You will therefore please find post-office order for $3.00, which will pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER up to January 1, 1879.

Yours for truth, A. A. LEWIS.

MT. PLEASANT, PA., July 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: "The Champions" came to hand. If you have not already mailed "Volney's Ruins," you may take the postage on "The Champions" out of the money in your hands, and send me some other cheap book for the balance, you to select the book. I had a letter in my pocket ready to mail to you when I received "The Champions," changing the order from leather to morocco binding, leaving the balance for postage. I have been reading "The Champions," and am well pleased with it. Think it is hot shot into the Christian camp, and that it will do an immense amount of damage to their cause. I have almost come to think there should be a hell to punish such fiends and monsters as those portrayed in the pages of your book. I do not wonder much at the Christian's fear of hell, for if there are any persons deserving such a punishment, they must feel that it was the propagators and leaders of the Church. I can scarcely see how they are to get their just dues outside some such place as the orthodox hell.

Yours truly, P. H. LOBINGUL

DEL NORTE, COL., July 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Enclosed is a P. O. money order for $5.00, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to B. Bardmass, Del Norte, Rio Grande Co., Col. He wants back numbers from April 1 if you can accommodate him, therefore the year will run out that much sooner. For the other two dollars please send me Mrs. Besant's new book on the "Law of Population," in cloth, and Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason;" and if there is money enough put in a copy of E. D. Blakeman's book about eggs and chickens.

While I am writing, I must express myself as highly pleased with the articles in the late TRUTH SEEKERS, from the very able and bold pen of T. C. Leland. I am rejoiced to know that you have so powerful a helper in your unequal fight with Comstock and Mrs. Grundy, and her editorial ally, the weak-kneed, truckling Abbot. The Liberal cause can spare him truly. He belongs to orthodoxy, and I believe can do much good among them, for there are lots of Christians with one foot out of the Church to whom he can cater admirably; but he ought not to pretend to belong to the Liberals, when from the first real brush he turns back.

The words of Theron C. Leland have the clear, silvery ring of a bugle, and to my ear are sweet music. I am rejoiced to find some few souls ready to strike out from the fenced pastures of the respectable Mrs. Grundy into the broad prairies of genuine Liberal Freethought. It is a matter of great hope to find them getting plentier than when we were boys. Long may he continue to wield his pen in the interest of truth and THE TRUTH SEEKER is my best wish. Truly yours, W. R. RICHARDSON.

PROSPECT PARK, ILL., N. Y., July 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I received my copy of "The Champions of the Church." It is the book of all books to show the corrupt and devilish career of the holy Christian Church. Every man, women, and child ought to read it. I will try to get subscribers for it. Go on with the good work. Yours, E. W. MINER.

FOUNTAIN FARM, PA., July 7, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: I suggested to E. E. Gibson to request you to put in tract form all or what number of Comstock's arrests you might think best, as I think they might be put in circulation to very good advantage towards the repeal of the obnoxious law and a furtherance of the Liberal cause. I wish you to send me one hundred of said tracts and price, which I will remit. I think it would be well to state who A. Comstock is at the head of the tract, as there are thousands of people who know nothing about such a person being in existence, much less his diabolical acts. I showed his last act on those three women to a young man who is a member of the Methodist Church and of the Y. M. C. A. He did not know there was such a person, and would not credit the act, but has written to the Christian Enquirer for information.

I requested E. E. Gibson to send for a copy of "The Champions," which has come to hand, and I am highly gratified with the contents, quality of paper, and binding at so very low a price. May thousands send on their orders and be enlightened and wholly compensated from its contents. I have a strong desire, with some others, to attend the Watkins Convention. There came a despatch of the death of Charles C. Burleigh, and as he was one of the founders of that meeting, and a pioneer in the Abolition movement, and a worker all his life for the elevation of downtrodden humanity, there were several eulogies given in behalf of his many virtues. Dr. S. Stebens stated that he had been acquainted with him for forty-four years, and he considered him a better man than Jesus Christ, and it was received without any objection; so you see we are getting out of the woods. I could freely say amen, as Burleigh I knew, and Christ I did not. I think if you would give us some information through THE TRUTH SEEKER as to the most direct route from Philadelphia, and whether we would have reduced fare in case we would make up a certain number, it would be to our advantage.

The progressive meeting at Long Wood, which closed a few days since, went off very pleasantly. E. E. Gibson attended the meeting, and spoke several times. I very much desired that you would attend that meeting, but it seemed not to suit your convenience while in session.

Yours in love, R. J. LAMBORN.

PITTSBURGH, PA., July 14, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: "The Champions" came duly to hand. On opening the book, the first to draw my attention was the engraving that graces its page in front. Indeed, I wish I could grasp you by the hand. 'Tis truly fine, but the man in real must be truly finer. I can but say may he "live long and prosperity attend all his undertakings." Bennett, I am yet young, but since I've been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER (this last three or four months only) you have shown up the false colors under which many are sailing. The next to draw my attention was the history of Anthony Comstock, which—well, words will not express my feeling towards him. That's right, show him up. Am now reading the balance, which, no doubt, will prove more interesting.

No doubt you will give Abbot another lift next week. A man of common sense who reads that letter of McKesson & Robbins in The Index this week will notice something bogus about it. I, for one, am under the impression it is; anyhow, note the worthy signature, "per Secretary." If the firm have a secretary to write that up—well, I wait for new developments. Though I have gone over the intended bounds for this letter, I will only state the price of the book I enclose P. O. order for $3.00, which, I believe, is the price of one sent me. If I am not asking too much (and I will pay you at my earliest convenience) you may send me "The World's Sages," "Interrogatories to Jehovah," and "What I Don't Believe," or the books per title enclosed, and, as above stated, I will remit you a "V" at my earliest convenience. Yours for enlightenment,

H. E. JUERGENS.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 18, 1878.

Having lately received a letter from a lady in Ohio, enclosing my photograph (purchased from D. M. Bennett), with a request that I would say whether it was genuine or not, I herewith take the opportunity to make it publicly known that the picture sold as mine by said Bennett is as good and correct a one as can be made of an old woman of fifty, who has never heard the word "good looking" ever applied to her; and who, moreover, on being pointed out to a literary admirer and a mutual friend at a picnic as the author of certain articles and stories in the Virginia People, was commented on thusly: "My God, but she's ugly!" Now this notice is written not only to say that said pictures are genuine, but also to warn all who might hereafter feel inclined to waste money on any more of them what they may expect in the way of beauty. I am very sorry to be obliged to put such a damper on the sale of the photos, but I do not wish to have any one deceived into thinking they will have an ornament for their albums by investing in Elmina's shadow; and to secure Mr. Bennett from loss in consequence of his generosity in publishing this, I hope all who would have purchased the pictures will be so kind as to send twice the money for some other and get one a hundred times prettier. The lady might have felt assured that had a false one been palmed off by either artist or dealer, it would have been certainly handsome or attractive, if not both, so it would sell at sight, rather than this one, which has only the name and fame of the original as its claim to the admiration of unknown friends afar off.

Respectfully, earnestly, and honestly,

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

YOUNG'S POINT, MONT., July 3, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It is simply impossible for me to go to Bozeman at present, for the accursed Indians are liable to trap us at any time now. I will commence sending you a dollar at a time, for a dollar isn't much to lose; and will enclose a postage stamp for you to let me know if you receive it. The first three apply to my paper for a year, and the total to what I'm owing you on other matter. The Indians are getting their backs up on every side, and our hair may rise this time, thanks to the Christian Indian Commission. If I do have to pass in my checks all earthly bills will be paid anyhow. Yours, hoping for the better,

A. J. YOUNG.

ST. JOSEPH, MISSOURI, July 13, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed find two stamps, for which send me that "Open Letter to J. H. Christ." I heard that you slandered the old man outrageously. I want to see to this. My grandfather often told me that his great-grandfather had told him that Jesus was a very quiet and peaceable sort of a fellow, and perfectly harmless. I being the only descendant living of the old Christ stock, it is my place to see that his character is vindicated. You will hear from me again.

Not your servant, HENRY CHRIST.

OSKALOOSA, IOWA, July 10, 1878.

All hail to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its noble Editor! Truth is what we want, regardless of Spiritualists, Materialists, or any shade or grade of would-be leaders in liberal ranks. Brother L. V. Pinney's private letter has the ring of true manhood in it. I endorse all R. M. Casey has said in the Abbot affair. That Petition has brought to the surface a mawkish sentimentalism that is no part of true manhood. With but little effort there can be three times seventy thousand signatures got to that "Terrible Petition." Yours for Liberty, Justice and Equality,

G. B. NELSON.

920 F STREET, WASHINGTON, D. C.

BROTHER BENNETT: As the indications are that the Convention at Watkins, in August, will be memorable, and as this nation has for so long suffered by the treatment of one who did so much to achieve our independence, I hope they will make an effort to atone in a small measure for the base ingratitude which is as much of a crime in a nation as in an individual.

It seems to be only a question of time when the clergy will cease to persecute the nation's benefactor which they have done ignorantly. There are seven lives here in the Congressional library of Thos. Paine, part of which were written in the interest of the Church, from which they have got their information. As the States have been invited to put in marble at the Capitol two of their foremost men, and as the name of Paine belongs to no State, I suggest that the Watkins Convention make the preliminary movement for posterity to view the statue of Paine among other great men, sent there from the District of Columbia.

Yours, S. M. BALDWIN.

ST. CHARLES, IOWA, July 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: I enclose two dollars on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which ought to have been sent in before, but owing to ill health since last fall it was neglected. The other dollar for the present year I will send on as soon as I get about again. I don't want THE TRUTH SEEKER to fail. It is the only game cock in the pit. Put on a little longer and sharper gaffs and go for 'em—reach for the vitals of superstition and toadyism, and let them shriek. We are assuredly gaining on the old ecclesiastical craft, and sooner or later the old hulk will go under—it is only a matter of time. This is a benighted precinct, but the light of truth will find crevices through which to send occasional rays of emancipation and progress.

Respectfully and fraternally yours, J. P. E. WHEDON.

BUFFALO, KANSAS, July 5, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: Perhaps you will think that I am intruding, as I am not a subscriber, but I shall venture, nevertheless. I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for months; am a subscriber to The Boston Investigator and have been for seven years. Am indebted to it for what knowledge I have of what the religion of humanity is. When I first commenced reading, I was told that such things were vile and corrupting, but experience has taught me otherwise, and I now am far happier in doing all the good I can for the purpose of making this life happy and pleasant to all around me than I ever was in striving for a crown that I should get away off in the dim future.

How happy it must make you when you think of the good work you are doing. In my opinion, the work you are doing is greater than that accomplished by the Revolution, and such men as Ingersoll and Underwood are soldiers of the right kind. I regard you and Seaver as heroes of the highest type, and if prayers did any good I should pray daily for your protection. I enjoy myself more in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER and The Investigator than in any other reading I can find. My daughter and I find them a perfect mine. She is but twelve years old, but has read The Investigator for four of them, and the result is, she is not frightened by ghosts and hobgoblins.

She thinks that at some future time she may be of great use as a Liberal lecturer, and reads all Freethought books and papers she can get. Good, pious mothers roll their eyes with holy horror when she tells them so, but I only laugh at their fears and let her read. Such papers as yours cannot harm an angel, and I hope that you will still live and publish it as long as life is pleasant to you.

Yours truly, ARMITTIE WILLIAMS.

SALINA, KAN., July 11, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Allow me to extend to you my cordial support, in a sympathetic way, at least, for I have no means at present to help you financially, or I would willingly. What matters it if men, be they ever so great, forsake us in the hour of our greatest trials! If our principles are correct and our motives are pure, we shall surely be victorious in the end. I was somewhat surprised at Mr. Underwood's decision in the petition matter, for I had counted on Mr. Underwood as the most careful reasoner in the Liberal ranks; and I shall still hold for him the highest respect as a Liberal reasoner and co-worker, but must always think he has acted wrong in upholding Abbot. What attractions and obligations a "mutual admiration society" have I know not. My mind is fully made up now for repeal, and, I think, the most of the seventy thousand, after mature deliberation, will come to the same conclusion.

I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Jamieson will lecture at Sabetha this month. This was accomplished by hard work and after many rebuffs by Ida Sweetland and the writer. There are a great many Liberals in Sabetha, but they are not awakened to the real issues of the day. They are afraid of the frowns of society. Jamieson, I think, will stir them up somewhat. Respectfully yours,

S. PARIS DAVIS.

PORTLAND, ME., July 14, 1878.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I enjoy reading your paper very much, and I believe it to be among the best papers in any part of the civilized world. It is carrying truths to thousands—just such truths as millions have longed to know. You may rest assured that you are doing a good work, a work in which millions of the unborn children of the green old earth will rise up and call you blessed. I am happy to inform you, at this time, that there are many here in Maine waking from their long night of slumber, and opening their eyes, and gazing upon the dawn of the new day—the day in which dogmas and creeds are fast rolling back into the dark night of oblivion; and the eternal truths, as they emanate from the god of Nature, are taking their place. The true men here in Portland are coming to the front and inquiring the way to a higher and better life. On the ninth of last June I hired a nice hall here in the city and opened a Free Liberal meeting. Every Sunday, notwithstanding the hot weather, the hall has been well filled, and I assure you that we have some smart speakers, able to show to the people that what has been called Christianity has cursed and blighted the world for more than eighteen hundred years. H. A. LAMB, M. D.

BELLEVUE, IOWA. July 10, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: Enclosed please find P. O. money order for $5.00, for which you will please give me credit. I cannot do without your paper. I am what is called here a man of strange beliefs, yet I am credited with possessing many virtues. Strange, I believe man to be a superior being, and the national laws, whether good or bad, to be supreme. I do not believe in the divine right of kings, emperors, or any other rulers, either temporal or spiritual, unless they derive their rights from the people. Spiritualism, and divine inspiration I know nothing about, and care as little. I think enough good laws and maxims can be created by man for his own comfort and happiness, and for his protection against bigots, zealots, fanatics, and those who know no law. Do unto others as you would they should do unto you. Live thus and there is nothing to fear except the persecution of fanaticism from fanatics.

I do not like the action of our rulers as regards money. I think money is a creature of law, and as money is as essential to the life of a nation as the air we breathe is to our animal life, it should be as pure and as wholesome; the latter being created by the supreme power of the universe, the former should be created by the supreme power of the nation, and should be made of such material as is most convenient and possessing the least intrinsic value. I abominate the idea of our nation paying interest to wealthy individuals or corporations. In time of war it might become necessary to borrow; then hunt up some friendly nation and make of it an ally, but raise all the money necessary by taxation and pay all alike their just dues. The nation should never pay interest; leave that matter to the people in their dealings with each other. The nation should give away nothing; neither favor anything to rich nor poor, but should create and establish all that it needs. Excuse the foregoing jumble; as it is in my mind so I have expressed it.

Yours, JOHN STUART.

SMITH CENTRE, KAN., July 5, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just one dollar and ten cents that I will send you for your discussion with G. H. Humphrey, "Christianity and Infidelity." It is all I have at present, or I would send you $3 00 for a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Will try to send in the money for a year's subscription before the paid-up time expires, for I don't want to miss a number. My leisure time being too much taken up with other reading matter, I have not read Mrs. Slenker's story, only a sketch here and there, but my wife is very much interested in it, and several of the neighbor women are anxious to borrow my papers, when the story is ended, that they may read it. No doubt the story will do great good, for the author's logic may be presented in the form of a romance to minds that would take no interest in plain matters of fact. Let us adopt any and all honorable means within our power to open the eyes of the weaker sex, for it is now upon them chiefly that the church must rely for support. Their minds are more ready to be captivated by superstitious excitement, and are less capable of logical exertion. The work of emancipation goes steadily on, and Spiritualists are contributors, and deserve our respect at least. Fraternally yours,

WM. A. GARRETSON.

WOODWORTH, WIS., March 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear sir: Although not a subscriber for your paper (reason, not able) I must express my admiration for it, and sense of gratitude for the editor and founder. It is the trump of all liberal papers. Your "Interrogatories to Jehovah" are perfect gems; the "Letters from the Devil" are very interesting, and the short paragraphs from correspondents add spice, variety, and interest, all combined. You have been accused of vanity; well, you have a right and ought to be proud of your paper and the success you have achieved. Without pride in the matter you could never so well succeed. Of course, I think there is sometimes room for improvement.

The Investigator has always had some very learned and able correspondents, such for instance, as Margaret Chappellsmith, Anti-Christ, and a dozen more that might be mentioned. Although they are very learned and able, I am confident they are not generally read, being beyond the depth of common readers, while such articles as "John's Way" and "The Darwins" by that very attractive writer—a thousand thanks to her—Elmina D. Slenker, are sought after and by all appreciated. It is my delight to read them to my Christian friends who have sense and reason, and I know they have a good and lasting impression in favor of truth. Do not fail to publish "The Darwins" in pamphlet form. Although Mrs. S. is very able, yet her articles are clothed in an attractive garb, and in such plain language that they are brought within the comprehension of all of us; but as much as I love and venerate her writings, speaking for myself, they might be amended. I skip portions that dwell so much and long on flowers and their history and hard names, yet I have intelligent female acquaintances who, like Mrs. Slenkers, are perfectly delighted and interested in the flower subject. To my mind, altogether to much house-room is taken up with them. That shows how tastes differ. In conclusion I will entreat sister Slenker to go on with her "Darwins" and "John's Way," for I know they have a powerful influence for good. Most respectfully,

R. FRANK MILLS.

SAGINAW CITY, MICH., July 6, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: I have been an earnest seeker after truth for fifty years, and I commenced reading your paper as soon as I learned that you had enemies who wished to crush you. If I could write anything to help you to extend knowledge, happiness, and liberty to the remotest bounds of the earth, it would give me pleasure; but as I cannot contribute anything to add to your usefulness in this way, I can enclose a postal order for three dollars, which will help you to conduct your own business and please your readers full as well. I do not want to wait until the time expires for which I paid, because I am afraid too many are careless and are delaying too long, and thereby doing a great injury to you, to themselves, and last, but not least, to the cause for which all are made better by maintaining. I signed the petition, and feel proud to belong to that noble band of humanitarians who would have Comstockism shown up and erased from every book on earth. I am, sincerely and truly, your well-wisher, W. G. ELMER.

KIPTON, O., July 7, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Will you eventually publish Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker's beautiful story of "The Darwins" in book form? I think it would sell briskly. I am selfish, don't you see? I have missed some parts, and would greatly like it complete. It is a noble production, fascinating in the extreme, and thoroughly instructive. She impregnates the utterances of each and all of her characters with her own rich, wise, and affectionate thoughts, expressive of her noble womanhood and her deep discernment of human nature, which tenders to enlighten the reason and inspire the better thoughts of the reader. I see by the Index of the 27th of June that Editor Abbot is going to get up a petition of his own to have the Comstock laws altered slust a leetle speck; and he is going to get, oh, so many signers to it! mor'n two huntred towsand. DR. ANDREWS.

["The Darwins" will be published in book form as soon as completed.—ED. T. S.]

YPSILANTI, MICH., July 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Allow me to suggest that female suffrage would absolutely defeat the best efforts of Liberals, for the reason that a great majority of the members of orthodox churches are females, and are of a nature that priests could influence. For popularity they would if they could put God in the Constitution; and more than that, I think would make strong efforts to establish religion by law in the United States. Please don't let universal suffrage be advocated in THE TRUTH SEEKER for the present.

Let me ask, are not "Senex" and others, in their condemnation of "Sturm" for saying "stop my paper," equally intolerant themselves? I fear so, and to such I would say, be consistent.

Again, Mr. A. P. Bradt advises that a part of THE TRUTH SEEKER be dedicated to the advocacy of temperance. Please don't do it. Though temperance is one of the great virtues, the pages of our paper should not be used for that cause, because Infidels are mostly temperate, and besides, almost every newspaper is full of that reading, and that kind of food is furnished three times a day if that number of daily papers are taken. Most respectfully.

J. W. BABBITT, M.D.

"SEQUEL TO ESSAYS" is the title of a little work of one hundred pages, by our friend Charles E. Townsend, author of "Essays on Mind, Matter, Force, Theology," etc. Published by Chas. P. Somerby, 139 Eighth St. The subjects treated are "God in Nature, or Mind Force," "Nature, Religion, and Science," "A Trinity Impossible," "Origin of Life," "Production of Mind," "The Soul and Future Life," "Materiality of Mind and Effects," "Food as a Mind Power," "Letters to Numerous Friends," etc., etc. The author enters into the discussion of the above subjects with much earnestness, and if we cannot agree with him in all his positions we must acknowledge his sincerity.

Lines Suggested on Being Called an Infidel.

"An Infidel!" how easy said,
But wherefore comes the name?
What is "an Infidel?" I ask,
And is it cause for shame?

Is it to take for Truth and Right,
What reason has weighed well?
To "prove all things, hold fast the good"?
Then am I Infidel.

Is it to trust with fearless faith
The God within the soul;
Heeding the voice that speaks therein,
Spurning all false control?

Trusting in inspiration past,
In inspiration now—
Selecting wheat from out the chaff,
Where'r it comes or how?

Believing heaven oft fills the soul
With promptings pure and high?
If this, all this, be Infidel,
Then Infidel am I.

Unflinchingly I face the scorn,
Freely accept the shame;
For, if "an Infidel" mean this,
I glory in the name.

With angels breathing round me oft,
With hopes most high to cheer,
With earnest strivings after truth,
I cannot stoop to fear.

Tho' oft I meet with those I deem Fast bound in Error's thrall,
I pray that charity be mine,
For we are erring all.

With love to God and love to man,
To Justice, Truth, and Right,
Heaven grant I ne'er be infidel
To past or present light.

To creed-bound dogmas, false tho' old,
I've bid a last adieu:
Your fetters ne'er can bind my soul—
I'm Infidel to you. —Author unknown.

"Champions of the Church."

We are glad to copy from the Investigator what our esteemed friend Miss Susan H. Wixon says about our new book. We thank her sincerely for her complimentary notice of it:

Mr. Editor: During these hot days that may be aptly termed the roasting season, with a thermometer among the nineties, and no rain for ever so long, I have felt disposed on every possible occasion to seek the shady side of the house, and beneath the cooling shelter of a wide-spreading tree, to spend many precious moments in meditation and perusal of the bright thoughts of the age that, like sparkling streams from the well of Truth, refresh and invigorate the mind of man, and woman also.

As a recital of all I have read might weary you, I will just mention the last volume which I have this moment closed with a benediction, viz.: "The Champions of the Church, their Crimes and Persecutions," one of the several important works of that earnest thinker and most industrious and indefatigable toiler in the Liberal vineyard, D. M. Bennett, of New York. Mr. B., as if not to be impartial, after giving the world the book entitled, "The World's Sages, Thinkers and Reformers," has now placed another offering, of no less value, before a generous, and, I am sure, appreciative public.

In the introduction, he has given a succinct account of the principal religions prior to Christianity, from ancient Fetish worship down to modern Christ worship, showing conclusively that Christianity is but an imitation and outcome of the older idolatries. This is a fitting and important adjunct to the work, which contains brief biographical sketches of all the prominent, noted, and notorious leading religionists of Christendom, from Jesus to Anthony Comstock, from the dawn of the Christian religion to the present day, correctly delineating the career of those, who, with soul of zeal or heart of hate towards their opponents, have championed the cause of the Church during the past sixteen centuries, noting the terrible and revolting crimes, persecutions, and hypocrisies that are the legitimate out-croppings of an age of semi-barbarism and ignorance whose gloomy shadows extend even to the present hour.

Mr. Bennett has done a good and praiseworthy act in the compilation of facts that should be known by everybody, and especially by those who ignorantly believe that the Christian religion has been borne to the children of earth on golden wings from regions above the starry skies. If they would have their eyes opened to the truth as it is, let them examine this compendium of authentic and valuable knowledge. It is a thick volume of eleven hundred pages, handsomely bound, and is embellished with an elegant portrait of its accomplished and deservedly distinguished author.

Without going into minute detail, I will only say now that the "Champions of the Church" is a worthy and extemely interesting book, important to the Liberal and Christian as well. Neither can afford to do without it, for it is valuable as a reliable book of reference, as well as for its vast fund of information and candid presentation of facts relating to the cruel religious wars, the history of Jesuitism, the infamous acts of the Inquisition, the awful crimes and persecutions of the Christian Church, as well as the bold sketching of the noted upholders of Christianity; and, as its price is in accordance with the times, it deserves a circulation wide as the world.

Yours, Susan H. Wixon.

Heywood in Jail.

How the Reformer takes his enforced retirement.—Bitter denunciation of Comstock and the law.

As considerable interest is manifested by a certain class of our citizens in reference to the imprisonment of E. H. Heywood for sending "Cupid's Yokes" through the mails, and as it is proposed to hold a meeting in Fanueil Hall to protest against his incarceration, a Globe representative visited Mr. Heywood at his new residence at Dedham Jail in order to give him an opportunity to present his views on his present position. Sheriff Wood very courteously granted the request for an interview, and he was brought into the guard-room. He was attired in prison garb and had his hair neatly trimmed A week of prison life had effected but little change in his personal appearance. Thoroughly radical in his ideas and of an intelligent cast of countenance, he appeared to be resigned to the decree of the court.

Heywood said: "I was born in Princeton, Massachusetts; was bred a farmer, and graduated from Brown University. I studied for the duties of an Orthodox minister, and leaving the Church to save my soul, I became a heretic. I served with Garrison and Phillips until Lincoln's emancipation proclamation ended slavery. Since then my time has been mainly devoted to labor reform, doing what I can meanwhile for woman suffrage, temperance, freelove and other progressive movements. Although not a first-class believer in Spiritualism, yet I am favorable to it, and believe that it embodies all the great truths there are in Christianity, and more too. Since my incarceration I have received letters daily from all over the country, and from prominent men and women, endorsing my position, if not my views, as a martyr to free speech and the liberty of the press. The sentence was not unexpected on my part, and I requested to be sent to Dedham Jail, as I heard it was the best governed prison in the State. I was told so by convicts who have served in nearly if not all the penal institutions in this and some other States. I find since arriving here that their estimate is correct. Sheriff Wood, Turnkey Henry White, and others treat their charges as though they were human beings and capable of appreciating good treatment. Now, as to my imprisonment: I regard it as a persecution of opinion; an invasion of freedom of conscience in love; the right of private judgment in morality guaranteed by the Constitution and Bill of Rights of Massachusetts. As the English Government in 1794, in the cases of Tooke, Hardy, Thelwell, and others, attempted to make "constructive treason" a capital offense, but was overwhelmingly beaten by Erskine's great genius, so the Comstock movement in this country is an effort to fine and imprison people for "constructive immorality." The statutes under which he acts are as plainly unconstitutional as were the fugitive slave laws, and will be swept out of existence by the rising indignation of an intelligent people. The petitions, bearing seventy thousand names, thrown into Congress for its repeal since Comstock's assault upon me in Nassau Hall, and upon Mr. Bennett of New York, November last, are but the zephyr of the coming tornado of rebuke to this ignoble persecution of opinion to which the United States Government now stoops, and which disgraces the American name. The Freelovers seek to remove obscenity by education, the only possible means of redemption.

Freelove is a conscientious endeavor to bring the whole matter of love and parentage within the domain of reason and natural, moral obligations. It is high time that citizens were as intelligent and sensible regarding the generation of their offspring as farmers are relative to their stock. Elizur Wright says that "to indict such books as Trall's 'Sexual Physiology' and Heywood's 'Cupid's Yokes' is to indict God. If there is any such thing as obscenity, it consists in want of respect for the sexual nature." Wright also said, "Celibacy is the greatest evil that Christianity inflicted upon the human race." Althought not a Freelover, Wright believes that the Comstock law attempts an arrogant and repulsive censorship of the press regarding morals. The Rev. Dr. Bartol is not a Freelover, yet he thinks it "absurd and wicked to attempt to punish Freelovers for their opinions; that Comstock and his crew are the worst foes of marriage, because, in attempting to silence Freelovers by violence, they admit that marriage will not bear examination." The Hon. H. W. Paine, another opponent of the Comstock law, says, "There is perfect liberty in this country to do everything but right; that is always criminal and dangerous." The Rev. M. J. Savage, not a Freelover, thinks "the population question of paramount importance to be discussed; that the Bradlaugh-Besant prosecution was a disgrace to the English Government and people." He does not agree with my views, but yet strongly endorses my right to discuss the social question and send my books through the mails. Amongst many other endorsers of my position I may mention as outspoken men the Hon. Charles W. Slack, H. N. Stone, J. S. Rogers, Lyman S. Hapgood, of Boston; the Rev. J. M. L. Babcock, Benjamin R. Tucker and J. S. Verity of Cambridge; J. Q. A. Clifton and J. F. Pickering of East Boston; Professor Toohey and S. B. Spinney, of Chelsea; Horace Seaver, J. P. Mendum, Henry Damon, of Boston. Amongst the women, the wife of the Rev. Mr. Vibbert, Mrs. S. A. Vibbert, M.D., publicly denounces my persecutors. Mrs. E. M. F. Denton, Mrs. Martha Williams, M.D., Laura Kendrick, and Mrs H. N. Stone, are my supporters.

This proposed meeting in Faneuil Hall is a part of a general movement over the country to repudiate the infamous censorship of the press now imposed on the American people by Brooklyn. The Pope and Church of Rome favor a censorship of the press, but it is respectable and responsible compared with the lying, vulgar, stupid, and treacherous supervision which Comstock, as special agent of the Post Office Department, prosecuted. I have been made a victim to his malice, and I am here for two years, but I would stay here during life rather than abandon an iota of my principles or of the right of free speech and free press. I work ten hours per day at bottoming cane-seat chairs. They have not got the eight-hour law in this jail yet. It is the first time that I have earned my bread by working at a trade. I regard the great battle of the right of opinion on the love question as preparing the minds of the people for the greater conflict impending between capital and labor. A labor reformer for fifteen years, I advocated money-reform years before Wendell Phillips thought it was worth noticing, and called the first meeting in Massachusetts which led to the formation of the Greenback party.

Heywood, in talking the Freelove and labor-reform with Sheriff Wood, suggested to that official that if the prisoners were allowed co-operation, a share in the earnings of their labor, there would be a strong inducement for them to labor diligently. The Sheriff intimated that when criminals were sent to prison at hard labor it was meant as a means of punishment and reform, not for the purpose of their making a fortune out of their labor. If convicts failed to work diligently, there were means of compelling them to do so or suffer the consequences.—Boston Globe.

A Visit to Mr. E. H. Heywood.

Mr. Editor: I visited Mr. E. H. Heywood in Dedham jail on Monday afternoon, July 8, and found him in excellent spirits and looking well. He thinks that his health would hold out through years of such confinement. His head is not shaven, nor is his hair and whiskers so very short, while his jail attire, contrasted with his noble, honest personal appearance, seems like a farce. I had a look into his cell, containing a brick floor, and a bed that looks quite comfortable (although I am informed that it is a little hard). Over the head of the bed was a rack containing a book, papers, etc., and in an opposite corner was a stand, on which were some refreshments, etc., mostly or wholly from friends. He claims that the ventilation is good, as it really seems to be, and that the officers are very kind to him. He receives all letters addressed to him (subject, of course, when required, to an examination), and can answer them, so far as his time will permit, he being required to work 9¾ hours per day.

Government could not have selected a better man to have imprisoned, for the promulgation of Freethought and human rights, than Mr. E. H. Heywood; and as imprisonment for the exercise of natural rights must continue until society says, "Enough!" the more frequent it occurs, other things being equal, the sooner it will be over, and all laws unholding such tyranny will either be repealed or wholly rejected by society. I still assert that—all publications, whether "blasphemous," "obscene," or not, should be freely read and circulated, that the people may judge for themselves what they need. I have the right to read any publication that I choose, and also to furnish them to others who wish to read them, and vice versa.

Yours, C. Waite.

We clip the following from the Investigator and agree with what the editor says. It is to be hoped the Liberal League was not started to patronize The Index exclusively. The principles it advocates are good, but they are not new as the Investigator says. The Index man would hardly be able to get out a patent for them:

"The National Liberal League, (through its Finance Committee), has issued a circular, in which the following rather illiberal passage occurs:

'Above all, we would urge that you form a club of as many members as possible to subscribe for The Index, . . . the only paper in the country that gives due attention to this most important movement.'

"The Index is doing good service for the Liberal League, but it is not the only paper which is thus engaged, for we notice that The Truth Seeker, anner of Light, Common Sense, Seymour (Ind.) Weekly Times, and Investigator, are all working in the same cause, and therefore deserve honorable mention.

"The principles of the Liberal League, although of the utmost importance, are by no means new. Forty odd years ago, Abner Kneeland advocated every one of them in the columns of this paper, yet he has never had much credit given him by more modern Liberals for being a pioneer in the great work."

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

KIDDER'S

SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents.

E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

THE

Law of Population,

ITS CONSEQUENCES

AND

Its Bearing upon Human Conduct and Morals.

BY ANNIE BESANT.

A Scientific and Medical Work every way superior to any similar. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. Adapted to the wants of the married, and to the consideration of all mature persons, as it points out the only feasible escape from the evils of celibacy or overburdened parentage. This is the work for which the eloquent author is now suffering persecution in England. It is not the "Fruits of Philosophy," but is more modern and and every way better.

Gems of Thought.

WITHOUT a rich heart wealth is an ugly beggar.—Emerson.

HAPPINESS is the legal tender of the soul. Joy is wealth.—Ingersoll.

KINDNESS in woman, not her beauteous looks, shall win my love.—Shakspere.

TO PLOW is to pray; to plant is to prophesy, and the harvest answers and fulfills.—Ingersoll.

MORE hearts pine away in secret anguish for unkindness from those who should be their comforters than for any other calamity in life. —Young.

IT IS beauty that doth oft make women proud; it is virtue that doth make them most admired; it is modesty that makes them seem divine.—Shakspere.

I HATE anything that occupies more space than it is worth. I hate to see a load of bandboxes go along the street, and I hate to see a parcel of big words without anything in them. —Hazlitt.

POWER, unless managed with gentleness and discretion, does but make a man the more hated. No intervals of good humor, no starts of bounty, will atone for tyranny and oppression.—Jeremy Collier.

OF all parts of wisdom, the practice is the best. Socrates was esteemed the wisest man of his time because he turned his acquired knowledge into morality, and aimed at goodness more than greatness.—Tillotson.

IT does not become the spirit which characterizes the present age, distrustfully to reject every generalization of views, and every attempt to examine into the nature of things by the process of reason and induction.—Humboldt.

"WORDS, words, words!" says Hamlet, disparagingly. But God preserve us from the destructive power of words! There are words which can separate hearts sooner than sharp swords. There are words whose sting can remain through a whole life!—Mary Howitt.

THE true end, scope, or office of knowledge, I have set down to consist not in any plausible, delectable, reverend, or admired discourse, or any satisfactory arguments, but in effecting and working, and in discovery of particulars not revealed before, for the better endowment and help of man's life.—Bacon.

NUMBERS of people are always standing with open mouths in a silly wonderment, enveloped in an obscurity to which they bow with respect. They admire nature only because they believe it to be a kind of magic which nobody understands; and we may be sure that a thing loses its value in their eyes as soon as it can be explained.—Fontenelle.

BIGOTRY in all ages has been the same. Christianity simply transferred the brutality of the Colosseum to the Inquisition. For the murderous combat of the gladiators, the saints substituted the auto da fe. What has been called religion is, after all, but the organization of the wild beast in man. The perfumed blossom of arrogance is heaven. Hell is the consummation of revenge.—Ingersoll.

THE modest virgin, the prudent wife, or the careful matron are much more serviceable in life than petticoated philosophers, blustering heroines, or virago queens. She who makes her husband and her children happy, who reclaims the one from vice, and trains up the other to virtue, is a much greater character than ladies described in romance, whose whole occupation is to murder mankind with shafts from their eyes.—Goldsmith.

THE idea of immortality, that like a sea, has ebbed and flowed in the human heart, with its countless waves of hope and fear, beating against the shores and rocks of time and fate, was not born of any book, nor of any creed, nor of any religion. It was born of human affection, and it will continue to ebb and flow beneath the mists and clouds of doubt and darkness as long as love kisses the lips of death.—Ingersoll.

THE state of the speculative faculties, the character of the propositions assented to, essentially determine the moral and political state of the community, as we have already seen that it determines the physical. Every considerable change historically known to us in the condition of any portion of mankind has been preceded by a change of proportional extent in the state of their knowledge, or in their prevalent beliefs.—John Stuart Mill.

WE live in a world which is full of misery and ignorance, and the plain duty of each and all of us is to try and make the little corner he can influence somewhat less miserable and somewhat less ignorant than it was before he entered it. To do this effectually, it is necessary to be fully possessed of only two beliefs: the first, that the order of nature is ascertainable by our faculties to an extent which is practically unlimited; the second, that our volition counts for something as a condition of the course of events.—Huxley.

THE deep philosopher sees chains of causes and effect so wonderfully and strangely linked together, that he is usually the last person to decide upon the impossibility of any two series of events being independent of each other; but in science, so many natural miracles, as it were, have been brought to light that the physical inquirer is seldom disposed to assert, confidently, on any abstruse subjects belonging to the order of natural things, and still less so on those relating to the more mysterious relations of moral events and intellectual natures.—Sir Humphrey Davy.

Odds and Ends.

"TOM, what in the world put matrimony in your head?" "Well, the fact is, Joe, I was getting short of shirts."

A HARD-DRINKING man who went into the saloon business explained that he could make enough off his own drinks to pay the rent.

LITTLE boy at the opening of a proposed spelling match: "Let's start fair, grandmother. You take Nebuchadnezzar and I'll take cat."

WE saw a young man with two heads on his shoulders the other day, but did'nt consider it much of a curiosity. One belonged to his girl.

A LITTLE Florida boy tamed an alligator, and the ugly reptile learned to like the little fellow —not, however, until the little fellow was all gone.

MRS. STODGER—"How be your wife a-gettin' on, Mr. Henpeckin?" Henpeckin—"I be mortal glad, Stodger, to say she's a-recoverin' very slowly."

"HAVE you ever read 'The Tale of a Bumble-Bee?'" asked George of Sarah Jane. "No," said she, as she turned the color of red paint, "but I've felt 'em."

WE are glad to learn, even at this late day, that Thomas Jefferson would turn aside rather than step on a bumble-bee. He was barefooted when he felt that way, of course.

A WOMAN will face a frowning world and cling to the man she loves through the most bitter adversity, but she wouldn't wear a hat three weeks behind the style to save the government.

BEFORE Boston goes entirely crazy over that female barber, she ought to pause a little between beans and ruminate upon the trouble Samson got into by letting a woman cut his hair.

WHEN you hear a country church choir singing, "There will be no more sorrow there," you conclude at once that either the aforesaid choir will not be there, or they will not be permitted to sing.

A SHOOTING-MATCH took place in Bridgeport last week between five single and five married men. The Farmer says the single men won. Of course they did. Married men are better at dodging than aiming.

A YOUNG man of twenty recently took to wife a Pennsylvania widow of fifty, the sole proprietress of a couple of paying petroleum wells. Of him it may truly be said that "he loved not wisely but two wells."

A YOUNG lady correspondent (poetic) desires to know if we have seen anything sweeter than "A Chaplet Alone." Certainly; we have seen a chap let a girl kiss him, which was ever so much sweeter.

"ENGLAND, sir! England rules the seas; Britannia rules the waves," pompously remarked an Englishman to an American. "That's nothing," was the reply, "every Yankee has a notion of his own."

UNCLE JASON asked Spikes one day "Wat dat enjuneer mean by say dat I'se done 'most sprout into an angul?" "Don't ask me," said Spike, "ask him." It was subsequently inferred that he had done so, as he went around the mill muttering, "Dat's no sign of an anjul kase a man's ears look like wings."

THE Supreme Court of Massachusetts has decided that a note given for a church subscription does not carry with it an obligation to pay, since it is given without consideration. We don't know anything about the obligation, but that it is quite frequently given without any consideration whatever is evident enough.

A YANKEE minister, being threatened with deprivation, said to some of his flock that if he were "deprived" it would cost a hundred men their lives. On being asked what he meant by such a threat, he explained that if he lost his benefice he should set up as a quack doctor, and, if so, he had no doubt he should be the death of at least a hundred patients.

CANTALOPES will soon make their appearance, and we may expect to see that reverend, bald-headed, toothless, lame, and impotent circus joke about the girl that can't elope going the rounds of the provincial press. We print this observation because it is paid for by a subscriber, and because we hope it may serve as a warning to our exchanges.

"SOUND," said the schoolmaster, "is what you hear. For instance, you cannot feel a sound." "Oh yes, you can," said a smart boy. "Johnny Wilson," retorted the pedagogue, "how do you make that out? What sound can you feel?" "A sound thrashing," quickly replied the smart boy. "Correct," said the schoolmaster. "Come up." And that smart boy felt and smarted.

A YOUNG man in an Austin (Nev.) barber-shop was particular to have his moustache nicely perfumed. "Going to call on a young lady, I suppose?" the barber asked. "The young man, with much dignity, replied: "See here, my friend, do you suppose I put perfumery on my moustache because I'm going to see a man or a boy, or an old woman, or a baby in arms? Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?"

BE kind to the book agent. He has a father, perhaps, and a mother who knew him in his innocent youth. Perhaps even now in some peaceful New England village fond hearts are beating for him and sweet lips breathe love's dearest prayers for his welfare. Therefore lay him down tenderly, fold his hands peacefully on his breast, and close his eyes gently as you put him to rest under the branches of the weeping willow, where the birds carol all through the summer days their softest songs. But plant him deep—plant him deep!

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Vol. 5. No. 31. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, August 3, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

Voltaire is the title of a new daily paper which was to appear in Paris about the 10th ult.

REPORTS from Cork aver that the potato disease is universal over the south of Ireland.

THE diameter of Pallas does not much exceed seventy-nine miles, so that an inhabitant of that planet might go round his world by rail in a few hours.

A CLERGYMAN of Bath created consternation at a funeral by praying earnestly in behalf of "the bereaved husband and the one to come who shall fill the place made vacant by the death of our deceased sister."

IN fifteen years from now, according to Wendell Phillips, "woman will hold the spear and shield in her own hands." To many men the spear will be a no more formidable weapon than the present poker or tongs.

THE cotton crop of the present year will be the largest since the war, and is estimated at 4,700,000 bales. In 1859-'60 the crop amounted to 4,861,000 bales; 1870-'71, 4,437,000 bales; 1875-'6, 4,632,000 bales; 1876-'7, 4,474,000 bales.

"CAN you give me the music of 'The Song of Solomon?'" said a fashionably dressed gentleman to the clerk behind the counter of a musical publishing house last Monday. "Our minister says it is a gem, and my wife wants to learn to play it."

BREAKING THE SABBATH ALL TO PIECES.—On Sunday last forty-eight steamboat loads of people and one hundred and fifty trains of cars, well filled, were taken to Coney Island, to say nothing of Rockaway and the numerous other places of resort.

TWO VACATIONS of six months each within two years ought to be enough to satisfy any pastor. Yet the offer was not enough to tempt Pastor Reed to remain with the First Congregational Church at Springfield, Mass., and so he comes to the Madison Avenue church, which gave Brother Lloyd a perpetual holiday.

IT was maintained by the famous chemist Liebig that drunkenness could be cured by a change of food. A Leipsic woman whom he had advised to try it in the case of her husband, a confirmed sot, came to him a week later. "How did it work?" asked Liebig. "Not at all," she answered; "he gets just as drunk on rice and milk."

AT Odessa three Wesleyan missionaries were three years ago arrested by Russians for attempting to teach their religion. After protracted legal delays they have had a jury trial, which resulted in their acquittal. But the Russians follow up the verdict by kindly advising the three Wesleyans to go somewhere else with their Wesleyanism.

JUSTICE TO ADAM.—Eve never caught cold hanging over the front gate till nine o'clock at night, but we suspect the reason was a melancholy absence of young men.—Buffalo Express. Seems to us you take a good deal for granted. If there ever was a girl who had her full, square share of the average young men of the period, it was Eve.—Phila. Bulletin.

THE Rev. J. B. Mann is a Methodist minister in Delaware, who is endeavoring to discourage his flock from the practice of dancing. He says that some of the brethren are giving the dancing master $75 or $100 a year, and contributing only $5 a year to the church. There is where the great difficulty is. It is very unpleasant to have the money diverted from the church which ought to flow into its treasury.

ATLANTA negroes are wonderfully excited by a religious revival. During an entire week meetings were held every hour, night and day, and the floors of the churches were strewn with persons unconscious from exhaustion. Many extravagances are indulged in, such as the relation of visions of heaven. All the ordinary features of Methodist revivalism are magnified. One of the foremost women in the movement died. Just before she breathed her last, she cried: "Glory, de Lord send his ladder fur me," and began to point to a ladder from heaven, which all the negroes about her bed solemnly declared they saw. After the woman died, all the negroes in the house saw angels and chariots right through the roof. The story of these revelations went all over the city and caused the wildest excitement among the negroes, who flocked to the house of visions. At one time there were five hundred around the house, shouting and singing. It was almost impossible in that part of the city to get a negro to do anything. A merchant asked a drayman to haul a load, and he replied, "No, bless de Lord de kingdom is too nigh. Halleluiah!"

AN alleged smart saying is reported to have been uttered by Dean Stanley. After lecturing on "Presence of Mind," he was complimented with a vote of thanks. He replied: "I am very much obliged to you. I shall show my presence of mind by silence." This is not quite so smart as it at first sight appears. Had the Dean wanted to give his friends a lesson on silence, he would have done better to bow to them with his finger on his lips, and silence would not have been broken.

CHINA is not the only great empire afflicted by famine. From Brazil comes the news that in three important provinces the springs, brooks, and rivers have been dried up for many months; the crops do not grow, and that people are perishing by many thousands. In the city of Aracaty, from the 10th of February to the 18th no less than 664 persons died of hunger, and at least 10,000 people have perished in the province of Cara alone since the beginning of the calamity.

THE Rev. Dr. Reichel, Archdeacon of Meath, at the recent meeting of the Board of Trinity College, Dublin, denounced "the increasing preponderance of athleticism" as an unmixed evil. God and the devil are, of course, the principal stock-in-trade with clergymen. If they are set aside as myths and figments of the brain, the occupation of clergymen is gone—no longer any use for them. If there is no God to placate, the placaters and appeasers will have nothing to do.

AT a recent college commencement a bouquet was thrown to a clergyman who offered prayer at the conclusion of the exercise. The director of ceremonies promptly rebuked the youth who threw it. The youth defended himself by saying that he didn't know the clergyman had been praying, but thought he was making a few remarks. That young man will not again be put in charge of the bouquet business on commencement day. The venerable clergyman looked with great disdain on the bouquet, and refused to touch it.

THE Sabbath Alliance of Scotland is raising a breeze over Queen Victoria's Sunday visit to the island in Loch Maree, where she was visiting last year. It is considered that her Majesty committed an act of Sabbath desecration in being rowed over to the island in a small boat. In the protest which was adopted by the Alliance the lament is expressed "that they cannot but feel deeply grieved that the royal family should so frequently manifest disregard, as they consider it, for the sacred day of rest, which must inevitably encourage others to do so."

SOME of the English religious papers have even more curious ways of putting things than those which prevail in the religious press of this country. The London Globe speaks about the people of God, and says "there is no devil in hell that can pluck them out of his hand. They are perfectly safe, for they are washed in the blood of the Lamb." The next paragraph is to the effect that bugs, fleas, moths, beetles, and all other insects are destroyed by a certain powder which can be had of all chemists for one shilling or two shillings and sixpence, according to the size of the package.

A SIMPLE REMEDY FOR DIPHTHERIA.—Put a teaspoonful of powdered sulphur into a wine glass of water, stir well with finger to mix it, then gargle the throat, and swallow the same. In extreme cases, where the fungus in the throat will not permit gargling, blow the sulphur through a quill into the throat. This will cause the fungus to shrink, then gargle. Also, put a live coal on a shovel, and sprinkle it with a spoonful of sulpher. Let the patient hold his head over it to inhale the fumes, or the room may be filled with the fumes almost to suffocation, the patient inhaling the same. Brimstone kills every species of fungus in man, beast, or plant, and no patient ever was lost on which we tried this remedy.—Dr. M. Field.

THE Methodist theological schools are turning out plenty of raw material for ministers. Evanston graduates twenty-two theologues, Madison thirty-two, and Boston twenty-six. And all this while one of the leading authorities of the Methodist Church says that two thousand applicants for the ministry are knocking at the door of the church, and there is no room for them to enter. What do the brethren mean by leading all these young men forward in the vain hope of finding something to do? Would it not be far more sensible to teach them avocations that would be of some real use to themselves and of some benefit to the world?

IF brother John Jasper feels at all unsettled in Richmond, he ought to consider the work in Japan. In Yokohama there has just been a riot over the preaching of two Buddhist priests who declared the doctrine which has made Jasper famous. Some students of what the Japs consider new-fangled theology ventured a suggestion that it is the earth which goes round the sun, and not the sun which goes round the earth. The people maintained the old doctrines by knocking some of the students on the head and fatally wounding them. The cordial right hand of fellowship would be extended to Jasper on his arrival in Japan and his announcement of a discourse on "de sun do move."

THE Rev. I. S. Kalloch, of San Francisco, in a recent sermon, cried: "No promises or positions will cause me to swerve from my principles, and I solemnly avow to my people, that so long as I am sustained by them I will never leave them or my church for any civil or ecclesiastical office within the gift of the people. If the monopoly organs do not call off their dogs at the next election, I will go through this State like a second Peter the Hermit, and bury them in oblivion." The Rev. I. S. Kalloch going through California like Peter the Hermit would be an interesting spectacle, especially to his former parishioners in Boston.—Sun.

THEY have peculiar ideas about camp-meetings down in Southern New Jersey. Three young men were recently arrested on charge of disturbing the exercises of the Primitive Mission Camp-Meeting at Pamrapo. The complainant, who was the minister in charge, said that the young men had interrupted the services with unreasonable and unseasonable shouting and singing. Their counsel raised the point that all camp-meeting exhorters, being without visible means of support, are vagrants in the eye of the law, and unentitled to its protection. The court held that the point was well taken, and discharged the prisoners.

MORE than a year ago an exploration was made across the Isthmus of Darien by an expedition under Lieutenant Wyse of the French Navy, with a view to an interoceanic canal. The project originated with a company having its seat in France, and after careful exploration Wyse reported in favor of a line from the point of Gandi on the Atlantic, along the valleys of the Tupisa and Tiati, to the river Tuyra, near where it discharges in the Gulf of San Miguel. Recently he went to Bogota to negotiate with the Colombian Government, and news has been received that a contract has been concluded. The canal will be neutral, and free to the commerce of the world. The company is to receive a grant of the land for 600 feet on each side of the canal, and a million acres in any part of the country they choose. The work is to be completed before 1895.

BROTHER JOSEPH HILLMAN of Troy is one of the most zealous of Methodists. The persuasive power that enabled him to amass a fortune in life insurance qualifies him as an effective revivalist. Great business tact, which also had much to do with his fortune-getting, makes him an able manager of religious enterprises. Our Round Lake correspondent credits him with the remarkable success of that place of Methodist summer resort; but it seems that, in an effort to combine the show business with religious meetings, he has made a miscalculation. He provided costly attractions—such as revivalists Murphy and Hammond, a wonderful model of Palestine, and lectures illustrated with magic lantern views—and charged a fee for admission. So violent, yet practical, was the opposition to this measure that a concession was necessary. In fact, the project of a remunerative show was a failure, because of the people's prejudice in favor of the without-money-and-without-price doctrine.—Sun.
